

The Israel of the Alps.

A HISTORY OF

the Waldenses.

— — — — —

VOL. II.

Sam. Long

J. Richardson

IN EACH VOLUME

THE MOUNTAINS OF THE ALPS AFTER THEIR PRESENT STATE

Blackwood and Sons,

RAISBOW, EDINBURGH AND LONDON

THE ISRAEL OF THE ALPS.

A COMPLETE
HISTORY OF THE WALDENSES AND THEIR COLONIES;

PREPARED IN GREAT PART FROM UNPUBLISHED DOCUMENTS.

By ALEXIS MUSTON, D.D.,

PASTOR OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH AT BOURDEAUX, DRÔME, FRANCE.

TRANSLATED

By THE REV. JOHN MONTGOMERY, A.M.

WITH A DOCUMENTARY APPENDIX ON THE ORIGIN OF THE WALDENSES,

BY THE TRANSLATOR.

VOL. II.

LONDON:
BLACKIE & SON, PATERNOSTER BUILDINGS, E.C.;
GLASGOW AND EDINBURGH.
1875.

THE FLOODING OF THE VALLEY
BY THE GREAT RIVER

GLASGOW:
W. G. BLACKIE AND CO., PRINTERS,
VILLAFIELD.

CONTENTS.

VOL. II.

PART THIRD.

FROM THE RETURN OF THE VAUDOIS INTO THEIR OWN COUNTRY, TO THEIR CIVIL AND POLITICAL EMANCIPATION IN PIEDMONT.

Page

CHAPTER I.—CONDITION OF THE EXILED VAUDOIS IN SWITZERLAND, BRANDENBURG, WÜRTENBERG, AND THE PALATINATE. (A.D. 1687 to A.D. 1688.)—Frederic William the Great, Elector of Brandenburg, gives an asylum to Vaudois exiles—His generosity towards them—Their arrival in Brandenburg—Refugees of Pragela—Negotiations: the Swiss Cantons and the Elector—Refugees of the Piedmontese valleys—Their progress to Brandenburg—Hardships and difficulties—Settlement of a portion of the Vaudois at Stendal—Settlements at Burg and Spandau—Difficulties created by the people of Stendal and Burg—Uncharitableness of bigoted Lutheran ministers in Würtemberg towards the Vaudois—Greater liberality of the laity and of the duke—Further difficulties and trials—A number of the Vaudois compelled to return from Würtemberg to Switzerland.....1

CHAPTER II.—THE STATE OF THE VALLEYS IN THE ABSENCE OF THEIR INHABITANTS; AND FIRST ATTEMPTS OF THE EXILED VAUDOIS TO RETURN TO THEIR OWN COUNTRY. (A.D. 1686 to 1689.)—The Vaudois who had become Catholics—The faithful witnesses in the prisons of Piedmont—Sale of the forfeited lands—Tabular view—The new purchasers—Neglect and desolation—The exiled Vaudois conceive the project of returning to their valleys—The first attempt of a small number frustrated by the Bernese government—Three persons sent by the Vaudois to explore the route to the valleys—Secret consultations in Janavel's house—Plan of a new expedition agreed upon—The secret having transpired, the expedition is relinquished—The situation of the Vaudois in Switzerland becomes more uncomfortable in consequence of this abortive project—State of feeling amongst them—They receive encouragement from the Prince of Orange and others—Janavel, foreseeing a rupture between France and Savoy, recommends the time as a favourable one for their enterprise—Captain Bourgeois—Janavel's instructions to his compatriots .. 17

CHAPTER III.—THE GLORIOUS RETURN OF THE VAUDOIS, UNDER THE CON-

DUCT OF ARNAUD, AND ACCORDING TO THE DIRECTIONS OF JANAVEL. (August to September, 1689.)—The Vaud is assemble on the shore of the Lake of Geneva, and embark by night—The precautions employed to divert attention from their proceedings—Numbers, however, arrested by the Swiss governments—The embarkation—Arnaud and Turrel, leaders of the expedition—The march begun—The pastor Chyon taken prisoner—The Vaudois seize hostages—They pass without impediment by Yvoire, Vin, and St. Joire—A show of opposition at Cluse is soon overcome—They carry the bridge at Salanches by force—They pass over the mountains of Le Praz and Haute Luce—Sufferings from incessant rain—The Col Bonhomme—Scez—St. Foi—Mount Iseran—They capture a cardinal's equipages—Sufferings in crossing Mount Cenis—Combat with the garrison of Exilles—Some fall behind through fatigue and exhaustion, and are taken prisoners—Combat and victory at Salabertrans—The exiles obtain the first view of their native mountains—They arrive at the Balsille—A half company of Piedmontese soldiers taken prisoners and put to the sword—Public worship at Pral—Victory at the Col Julian—Public worship and solemn covenant on the hill of Sibaoud.....	33
CHAPTER IV.—STRUGGLE OF THE VAUDOIS, IN THEIR OWN VALLEYS, AGAINST THE UNITED FORCES OF VICTOR AMADEUS II. AND LOUIS XIV. (SIEGE OF THE BALSILLE.) (September, 1689, to June, 1690.)—Expedition of the Vaudois against Le Villar—Destruction of Bobi by the enemy—The Vaudois take Rora—Their generous conduct—Hardships and privations—Their cause seems to become more desperate than ever—They are deserted by many of the French refugees—Turrel, their commander, withdraws from them in despair—Firmness and courage of Arnaud—Council of war at Rodoret—The Vaudois retire to the Balsille—Unfavourable reports of their expedition in the journals of the time—Description of the Balsille—Efforts of the Vaudois to secure provisions for winter—Corn, which has been covered with snow all winter, is reaped by the Vaudois in spring—Peter Philip Odin chosen a leader—Piety of the Vaudois—The Marquis D'Ombraillies approaches the Balsille and retires—Courageous refusal of all terms of capitulation—Death of three Vaudois captives—The Balsille assailed by Catinat and the Marquis De Parelles—Sufferings of the assailants from severity of weather—Complete failure of the attack on the fort—Renewed attack by the Marquis De Fenquières—The Vaudois retire from intrenchment to intrenchment, and at last make a wonderful retreat by night to the higher parts of the mountains—They overcome a detachment of troops at Pramol—Political events favourable to the Vaudois—Separation of Piedmont from the alliance of France—War declared against France—The Vaudois are received into favour by the Duke of Savoy—Continued struggles with the French troops.....	54
CHAPTER V.—RUPTURE BETWEEN FRANCE AND SAVOY, WAR WHICH FOLLOWED IT, AND NEW SITUATION OF THE VAUDOIS, NOW BECOME DEFENDERS OF VICTOR AMADEUS II. (June, 1690, to September, 1691.)—Exorbitant demands of France upon Piedmont—Victor Amadeus concludes an alliance with Austria, and goes to war with France—He favours the Vaudois, in order to enjoy the support of their arms—He encourages French Protestant refugees in Piedmont—Return of Vaudois from Brandenburg with their families—Generosity of the Elector of Brandenburg—the Vaudois

regiment in Piedmont—Successful incursion into the valley of the Guille in Dauphiny—Expeditions and combats—The Vaudois leaders in the presence of Victor Amadeus—Gallantry of the Vaudois at the capture of the fort of St. Michael, near Lucerna—Victory over the French at Briqueras—The French abandon the valley of St. Martin—Defeat of Victor Amadeus at Staffarde—Savoy subjected to France—The French again make themselves masters of the valley of St. Martin—They are repulsed from that of Lucerna—Faithful adherence of the Vaudois to Victor Amadeus—Their incursions into Dauphiny—M. De Feuquières, the French general, suffers severe loss at Lucerna—Various conflicts and events of war.....75

CHAPTER VI.—CONTINUATION AND CONCLUSION OF THE WAR BETWEEN LOUIS XIV. AND VICTOR AMADEUS; PARTICIPATION OF THE VAUDOIS IN THESE EVENTS, AND THEIR FORMAL RE-ESTABLISHMENT IN THE VALLEYS.—Reverses sustained by the Duke of Savoy in the war—Prince Eugene and the Duke of Schonberg come to his assistance—Decree of rehabilitation in favour of the Vaudois in 1692—Invasion of Dauphiny by the forces of the Piedmontese and their allies—Siege and capture of Embrun—Surrender of Gap—Illness of the Duke of Savoy, and close of the campaign of 1692—Catinat, the French commander, assumes the offensive in the beginning of 1693—The Duke of Savoy defeated in the plains of Marseille—Catinat desolates Piedmont—The Vaudois harass the French army—Victor Amadeus publishes a new edict in favour of the Vaudois, in May, 1694—Successful enterprises of the Vaudois against the French—Victor Amadeus is detached from the league against the King of France, and enters into a new alliance with France.....89

CHAPTER VII.—PROTEST OF THE COURT OF ROME AGAINST THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF THE VAUDOIS; FIRMNESS OF VICTOR AMADEUS II.; RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE VAUDOIS CHURCH; NEW EDICT OF EXPULSION IN 1698.—Analysis of the edict of May 23, 1694—Artful reservations of tyranny—Irritation of the court of Rome—Papal condemnation, and pretended abrogation of the edict—The Duke of Savoy resists this usurpation of Rome, and the senate of Turin annuls the papal decree—Efforts of the Vaudois for the re-organization of their church—Pensions granted to the Vaudois pastors and schoolmasters by Queen Mary II. of England—Assistance obtained also from Holland—Acts of the Vaudois Synod concerning the observance of the Sabbath—Other acts and proceedings of the Synod—Church government and discipline—The Duke of Savoy refuses to permit the incorporation of the Vaudois of Pérouse with the church of the valleys—Fresh acts of injustice and severity against the Vaudois—Secret article in the treaty of peace between France and Piedmont—Edict requiring all French Protestants to leave the dominions of the Duke of Savoy—Emigration of more than 3000 persons.....100

CHAPTER VIII.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS COLONIES FOUNDED IN WÜRTTEMBERG AFTER THE EXPULSION OF 1698.—PART FIRST. (A.D. 1698 to A.D. 1699.)—Expulsion of ministers and people not natives of the valleys—Emigration from the valley of Pragela—Proposal for the establishment of a Vaudois colony near Gochsheim, in Würtemberg—Generous conduct and enlightened views of the Count of Neustadt—He resists attempted intolerance—Three thousand Protestants leave the valleys—Their reception in Switzerland—Their negotiations with the government of Würtemberg—Difficulties—Energy and activity of Arnaud—Walkenier negotiates for the exiles with the government of Würtemberg, as plenipotentiary of Holland and other Protestant powers—Terms agreed upon—Pensions for pastors and schoolmasters obtained from England 111

CHAPTER IX.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS COLONIES FOUNDED IN WÜRTEMBERG AFTER THE EXPULSION OF 1698.—PART SECOND. (A.D. 1689 to A.D. 1824.)—The Vaudois settlers in the bailiwick of Maulbronn—The settlement at Pérouse, in the bailiwick of Leonberg—Pinache, in the bailiwick of Wiermsheim—Lucerna or Wurmberg—Serres—Chorres and Sengach, in the bailiwick of Dürmentz—Mülaere—Schönberg—Reminiscences of Arnaud—Grand Villar, near Knittlingen—Disinclination of some of the exiles to settle in any place away from their own valleys—Remonstrances of Walkenier—New Engstedt, in the bailiwick of Calw—Another emigration from the valley of Pragela—Settlement at Nordhausen—Habits of the people—Endeavours made to induce the Vaudois churches to unite themselves with the National Lutheran Church—Introduction of the German language in their public services—The union with the National Church is finally accomplished 123

CHAPTER X.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS COLONIES FOUNDED IN HESSE-DARMSTADT AND OTHER PARTS OF GERMANY, IN CONSEQUENCE OF THE EXPULSION OF 1698, AND SUBSEQUENT EMIGRATIONS. (A.D. 1698 to A.D. 1818.)—Application to the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt in 1696—Letters-patent authorizing the settlement of Vaudois in Hesse-Darmstadt in 1699—Description of the Vaudois valleys—Painful consequences of the French Revolution—Emigrations to America—Vaudois settlements in the grand duchy of Baden—Vaudois settlement of Waldensberg, in Hanau—Vaudois colony of Dornholzhausen, near Homburg—Minor settlements 138

CHAPTER XI.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.—FIRST PERIOD.—THE VALLEYS OF BARDONÈCHE AND OF THE CLUSON UNDER THE REIGN OF CHARLES IX. (Introduction; commencing with the Middle Ages. History down to 1574.)—Description of the valley of Pragela—Flourishing state of the church there before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes—The church in Pragela in earlier times—The Synod of Le Laus before 1332—Vaudois missionaries in France—Temporal condition of the inhabitants of Pragela—Pragela under the Dauphins—Inquisitors and persecution in the fourteenth century—Persecutions in the sixteenth century—The Vaudois of France and Piedmont mutually support one another—The religious wars in France—The Baron Des Adrets disgraces the Protestant cause by his proceedings in Pragela—Unhappy consequences to the Protestants of the valley—Combats and massacres—Exploits of the Vaudois at Exilles—The Edict of Amboise—New dangers—Fast—St. Bartholomew's Day—Conversion of the people of Pramol to Protestantism—The Vaudois defend themselves against Birague, the French governor of Pignerol—The "War of La Rade."—Accession of Henry III. to the throne of France 157

CHAPTER XII.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.—SECOND PERIOD.—LES DIGUIÈRES IN PRAGELA. (A.D. 1574 to A.D. 1601.)—Reign of Henry III. in France—THE LEAGUE—Agitations in the French Vaudois valleys—Assassins—Jesuits—Rumours of impending danger—Settlement of Popish priests in the parishes of the Phebanie of

Oulx—Progress of the Protestant cause—Death of La Cazette—Lesdiguières invades Piedmont—Various events of the war—Unjust attempt to deprive the Vaudois of Pinache of their place of worship—Attempt to massacre them—Polemical discussions—Letter of Lesdiguières to the Piedmontese Vaudois, promising them protection—Apostasy of Captain Jahier of Pramol—His miserable death—Peace of 1601 between France and Savoy.....174

CHAPTER XIII.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.—THIRD PERIOD.—THE VALLEY OF PÉROUSE UNDER THE DOMINION OF CHARLES EMMANUEL. (A.D. 1601 to A.D. 1628.)—The privilege of public worship denied to the inhabitants of Pragela—United declaration of the Vaudois—Efforts of the Romish clergy to make proselytes—The Duke of Savoy himself endeavours to induce some of the principal inhabitants of Pinache to join the Church of Rome—Decrees of the parliament of Grenoble—Inoperative edict of the Duke of Savoy—The Vaudois of Pérouse are induced, by crafty counsel, to separate themselves from the common union of the Vaudois, and to refuse payment of their share of a sum which the valleys were to pay for confirmation of privileges—They soon find that they have fallen into a dangerous snare—Orders given for the demolition of six of their places of worship—The Vaudois attacked by French troops at St. Germain—They assemble in such formidable numbers that the troops retire—An amnesty—Political relations of France and Savoy....185

CHAPTER XIV.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND OF THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.—FOURTH PERIOD.—FROM THE CONQUEST OF PIEDMONT BY LOUIS XIII. TO THE PIEDMONTESE EASTER. (A.D. 1629 to A.D. 1655.)—The last religious war in France—Fall of Rochelle—Invasion of Piedmont by Louis XIII.—His edict in 1629 for the establishment of Romish worship in the valleys of Exilles, Bardonnèche, Sezane, and Pragela—Great triumphs of the French arms—Charles Emmanuel dies of grief, and Victor Amadeus becomes Duke of Savoy—Peace—Prosperity of the Vaudois Church in Pragela after these events—New restrictions imposed—The Vaudois obtain the extension of their privileges in terms of the Edict of Nantes—They still increase in numbers and prosperity—Accession of Louis XIV.—The Piedmontese Vaudois take refuge in the French valleys after the Piedmontese Easter—The Vaudois in the French dominions are subjected to new hardships.....193

CHAPTER XV.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.—FIFTH PERIOD.—FROM THE INTRODUCTION OF THE JESUITS TO THE DEMOLITION OF THE PROTESTANT PLACES OF WORSHIP IN PRAGELA. (A.D. 1656 to A.D. 1685.)—Jesuit missionaries in Pragela—Controversies—Odious means employed to secure the success of the Jesuit missions—Apostasy and subsequent melancholy history of Captain Guyot—Bribes and every kind of influence used to procure abjurations—Dragonnades—New restrictions imposed upon the Vaudois—Increasing hardships—Strange quotations from documents of the time, illustrative of the character of its events and parties—Settlement of six priests in the parishes of Pragela in 1678—The utmost fervour of proselytism—The exercise of the Protestant religion prohibited in Pragela five months before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes—Demolition of places of worship—Extensive Emigration 203

CHAPTER XVI.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND OF THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.—SIXTH PERIOD.—FROM THE REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES TO THE TREATY OF UTRECHT. SUFFERINGS AND TEMPORARY RESTORATION OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN PRAGELA. (A.D. 1685 to A.D. 1713.)—Le Tellier—Bossuet—The Vandois who remain in Pragela frequent places of worship within the Piedmontese territory—Persecution in Pragela—The persecuting church enriched by the spoils of the persecuted people and the properties of the exiles—Part of Pragela devastated by the troops of the Duke of Savoy—Successive emigrations—Protestantism revives a little in Pragela in the beginning of the 18th century—The valley of St. Martin, and part of that of Pérouse, are induced to constitute themselves into a republic, under the illusory protection of Louis XIV., which subsists for four years—The Vandois of Pragela enjoy better prospects for a time after the valley has become part of the Piedmontese dominions—Deputies from Pragela at the Vaudois synod of 1709—The government refuses to recognize their incorporation with the rest of the Vaudois church—The Vandois of all the valleys partake of the Lord's Supper at Usseaux—Severe measures adopted by the Piedmontese government against the Vandois of Pragela—Political arrangements unfavourable to them between the governments of Piedmont and France.....	221
CHAPTER XVII.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.—SEVENTH PERIOD: FROM THE TREATY OF UTRECHT, IN 1713, TO THE FIRST EMIGRATIONS CAUSED BY THE EDICTS WHICH PRECEDED THAT OF 1730.—Obligations incurred by Victor Amadeus in his treaties, in favour of the Vandois—How he got quit of these obligations—Measures adopted against the Vandois of Pragela during his absence in Sicily—Exertions of the King of Prussia on their behalf—Beneficial interference of the English ambassador at Turin—The pastors of the other parishes prevented from entering Pragela to minister—Severities employed against the elders of Pragela, to prevent their conducting religious meetings—Famine—Advantage taken of it for proselytism—Prohibition of all religious meetings—The case of Peter Ronchail and his family—The people of Pragela forbidden to attend public worship in the other valleys—Other tyrannical measures—All the inhabitants of the valleys acquired by the treaty of Utrecht are ordained to have their children baptized in the Church of Rome—Iniquitous law regarding inheritance—Compulsory observance of festivals—Illustrative instances of persecution—Victor Amadeus shows the most ungrateful forgetfulness of the former services of the Vandois—Friendship shown to them by Mr. Edges, the British ambassador—Gradual increase of intolerance; emigrations, and wearing out of the Vaudois church in Pragela.....	236
CHAPTER XVIII.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS. EIGHTH PERIOD: EXTINCTION OF THE VAUDOIS CHURCH IN PRAGELA. (A.D. 1729 to A.D. 1733.)—Famine of 1729—Base advantage taken of it for the advancement of the work of proselytism—Conversation between a Vaudois and a Jesuit—Edict of 20th June, 1730—Immorality of the persecuting king—Instances illustrative of the persecution—The case of Jacob Perron—Many go into exile—Attempts to prevent emigration—Victor Amadeus resists the remonstrances of the King of Prussia—Continued annoyances to which the Vandois are subjected, and especially those who had been baptized in the Church of Rome —Trials and difficulties of the Vaudois pastors—Traces of lingering Protestantism in Pragela—Burning of Bibles there in 1838.....251

CHAPTER XIX.—HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS FROM THE EXPULSION OF 1698
TO THAT OF 1730. THE DUKE OF SAVOY IN THE VALLEY OF LUCERNA—
THE REPUBLIC IN THAT OF ST. MARTIN.—Results of the edicts of expulsion—Good brought out of evil—Pastors obtained from Switzerland—Zeal of the ministers—Loyalty of the people—Political events—Disputes concerning the succession to the throne of Spain—Political perfidy of Victor Amadeus—War between France and Savoy—Victor Amadeus seeks again to win the support of the Vaudois—Services rendered to him by their militia—New French refugees arrive in the valleys—Events of the war—Successes of the French—Exploits of the Vaudois—The valley of St. Martin becomes a republic under French protection—Brief and unfortunate existence of the republic of St. Martin—Continued triumphs of the French—The Duke of Savoy finds refuge amongst the Vaudois—He makes further efforts to conciliate them—Final defeat of the French at Turin—The Duke of Savoy regains possession of his lost territories—Further progress of the war—Treaty of Utrecht—Afflicted condition of the Vaudois, after the termination of the war—The Vaudois subjected to many vexations, through the influence of the Propaganda—Expulsion of Protestants of foreign birth, in 1730—Religious and moral condition of the Vaudois at this period.....266

CHAPTER XX.—INFLUENCE OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE EIGHTEENTH CEN-TURY ON THE VAUDOIS CHURCH, AND PROGRESS OF EVENTS DOWN TO THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. (A.D. 1730 to A.D. 1792.)—Persecution continued in many forms of vexation—Growth and effects of new ideas—Children seized and retained by Papists—Popish missions in the valleys—Insincerity in replies to remonstrances of the British Government—Vexatious prohibitions and restrictions—Poverty and distress of the Vaudois—Their services to the King of Sardinia in his wars—Battle of Assiette—Continued vexations on the part of the Popish clergy—The Refuge of Virtue
—The Vaudois Table instituted—Origin of the Vaudois congregation at Turin—The Vaudois churches of the French Alps begin to display signs of life—Unhappy effects of the infidel philosophy of the period on the spiritual character of the Vaudois pastors and church.....291

CHAPTER XXI.—THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS DURING THE WARS WHICH THE FRENCH REVOLUTION CAUSED IN ITALY. (A.D. 1789 to A.D. 1801.)— Prudent reserve of the Vaudois at the outbreaking of the French Revolution—Piedmont, allied with Austria, at war with France—The Vaudois troops on the frontier under General Gaudin—Popish conspiracy for a massacre of the defenceless Vaudois families—It is discovered and defeated by General Gaudin—Odious conduct of the Piedmontese government upon this occasion—Fidelity of the Vaudois to their sovereign—Jealous tyranny of the government—General Zimmerman intercedes for the Vaudois—Pretended favours granted by the government—Continued friendship of Zimmerman—Accession of Charles Emmanuel IV.—Petition of the Vaudois and reply of the king—Attempts to conciliate the Vaudois when their support became very important—Some ameliorations of their condition—Their treatment varies with political circumstances—Abdication of Charles Emmanuel IV.—Suwarrow and the Russian army in Piedmont—Great kindness of M. Rostan, pastor of Bobi, to wounded French soldiers—Suchet's public acknowledgment of it—Characteristic proclamation of Suwarrow—The valleys threatened with pillage and devastation by Russian troops—Successful appeal of M. Appia to the Russian commanders—Illustrative anecdotes of Suwarrow, Prince Bagration, and other Russian officers—The manners and habits of the Russian troops—Hatred of the Popish priests against the Vaudois exhibited in malicious falsehoods assiduously told to the Russian generals—Napoleon's victories—The battle of Marengo—The Cis-alpine Republic—The Vaudois become possessed of equal rights with other citizens.....308

Page

CHAPTER XXII.—STATE OF THE VAUDOIS UNDER THE DOMINION OF FRANCE. (A.D. 1799 to A.D. 1814.)—The two periods of French dominion in Piedmont—Ridiculous proclamation of the provisional government of 1798—The new organization and political arrangements—Changes favourable to the Vaudois and to liberty—Addresses of Paul Appia to his Vaudois brethren—The English subsidies withdrawn from the Vaudois—Distress of the pastors—Peyrani chosen moderator—Napoleon at Milan—Interview of Peyrani with the emperor—New ecclesiastical arrangements—Congratulatory address of the Vaudois to Napoleon—Official installation of pastors under the new French law—Earthquake of 1808—Downfall of Napoleon, and of the French Empire.....331

CHAPTER XXIII.—STATE OF THE VAUDOIS SINCE THE RESTORATION. (A.D. 1814 to A.D. 1842.)—The restoration of the house of Savoy in 1814—Victor Emmanuel IV. lands at Genoa—Deputation of the Vaudois—Their petition—Revival of old edicts unfavourable to the Vaudois—Servile subjection of the king to the priesthood—His benevolent dispositions counteracted by their influence—Deputations—Restrictions and mitigations of them—Friendly interposition of the British ambassador—The Congress of Vienna—Enforcement of observance of festivals of the Church of Rome—Napoleon leaves Elba—The loyalty of the Vaudois suspected—Friendship shown by Count Crotti—Conduct of the Piedmontese government, with regard to persons who had held office under the French government—Case of M. Geymet—The ecclesiastical domains restored to the Church of Rome—Question as to the rents for the time during which the Vaudois had enjoyed them—Poverty of the Vaudois pastors—Edict of 1806, affording some relief to the Vaudois—Social progress, increasing liberality of the government, and improvement of the condition of the Vaudois.....349

CHAPTER XXIV.—RELIGIOUS REVIVAL AND FOUNDATION OF VARIOUS INSTITUTIONS IN THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS. (A.D. 1824 to A.D. 1847.) FELIX NEFF—THE HOSPITAL—THE COLLEGE—THE DISCIPLINE—THE SCHOOLS—BECKWITH.—Circumstances providentially conspiring to preserve the unity of the Vaudois body—Felix Neff—Temporary separation of some zealous Christians from the general body of the Vaudois church—Revival of religion throughout the whole of that church—New and valuable institutions—Kindness of Christian friends—Vaudois hospital—Count de Waldburg Truchsess—General Beckwith—Schools founded by his exertions—Dr. Gilly—Code of Discipline—Confession of Faith—The Protestant congregation at Turin formally admitted as a Vaudois parish—Establishment of two new parishes, Macel and Rodoret—Other ecclesiastical arrangements—Collections for religious and charitable purposes—Bianqui's legacy.....	365

CHAPTER XXV.—CIVIL AND POLITICAL EMANCIPATION OF THE VAUDOIS DURING THE REIGN OF CHARLES ALBERT. (A.D. 1847 to A.D. 1850.)—The political changes in the kingdom of Sardinia were begun before the revolutionary explosion of 1848—Change of tactics on the part of the Popish clergy, upon the change of policy by the government—Polemical pastorals and other controversial publications—Charles Albert visits the valleys in 1844—His generous confidence in the Vaudois, and enthusiastic reception by them—Demonstrations of the gratitude of the Vaudois to General Beckwith—Amelioration of their political condition—The Marquis d'Azeglio— The Statute , or Constitutional Charter of the Kingdom of Sardinia, 8th February, 1848—Admission of the Vaudois to all the civil privileges of their countrymen, 17th February, 1848—Great rejoicings—French Revolution of 1848—Consequent revolutions and wars in Italy—Defeat, abdication, and death of Charles Albert—Charles Emmanuel V. succeeds to the crown—Present state of the Vaudois.....		333

APPENDIX No. I., BIBLIOGRAPHY.

PART I.—PUBLISHED WORKS.

Section I. Original authors who have treated specially of the history of the Vaudois.—§ 1. Vaudois authors.—§ 2. Anonymous Vaudois Authors.—§ 3. Original authors, not natives of the valleys, who have written in a spirit favourable to the Vaudois.—§ 4. Original authors, not natives of the valleys, who have written in a spirit unfavourable to the Vaudois.....

333

Section II. Authors who have occupied themselves with inquiries on particular points connected with the history of the Vaudois.—§ 1. Latin Treatises (mostly contra Valdenses, and generally relating to the disciples of Valdo, rather than to the Vaudois of Piedmont).—§ 2. Academic Theses.—§ 3. Various authors.....

412

Section III. Historic works on the Vaudois, derived from original sources, and contributing to the more complete elucidation of the subject...

422

Section IV. Polemical Works.—§ 1. Against the Vaudois.—§ 2. In defence of the Vaudois.....

424

Section V. Periodical, artistic, descriptive, scientific, and literary works, relative to the Vaudois.—§ 1. Books of Travels.—§ 2. Descriptive works.—§ 3. Illustrated works.—§ 4. Tales and Poems.—§ 5. Journals.....

427

Section VI. Historical works, in which the Vaudois are only incidentally treated of, but which embody particular views or documents. Chapter I. Works on special subjects.—§ 1. Local History.—§ 2. Memoirs and Biographies. Chapter II. Works of a general character.—§ 1. Ecclesiastical Histories.—§ 2. Profane Histories.....

432

Section VII. Detached Documents.—§ 1. Collections of Official Papers.—§ 2. Collections of Various Documents.....

438

PART II.—MANUSCRIPT WORKS.

Section I. Ancient Vaudois MSS. in the Romance language.—§ 1. Origin of these MSS.—§ 2. Biblical MSS.—§ 3. MSS. of Geneva.—

	Page
§ 4. MSS. of Dublin.—§ 5. MSS. of Cambridge.—§ 6. A note of what has been published of these MSS.....	141
Section II. MSS. deposited in different archives.—§ 1. Public.—§ 2. Private.....	478
PART III.—DETACHED PIECES, PUBLISHED AND MANUSCRIPT.
Chapter I. Confessions of faith, published by the Vaudois or in their name, in different languages.....	478
Chapter II. Historic pieces, anterior to the Bull of Innocent VIII. against the Vaudois (1487)....	483

APPENDIX No. II.

NOTE ON THESE PASSAGES OF PART I., CHAP. IV. (Vol. i. p. 50), "The victorious Protestants incurred the guilt of bloody reprisals," and (Vol. i. p. 51) "Cruelties and spoliations, unworthy of their name, were perpetrated by the Protestants".....	490
--	-----

APPENDIX No. III.

JOURNAL OF A VAUDOIS OFFICER, CONCERNING THE MILITARY OPERATIONS WHICH FOLLOWED THE RETURN OF THE VAUDOIS TO THEIR OWN COUNTRY IN 1689, AND PARTICULARLY THE SIEGE OF THE BALSILLE IN 1690.. ...	491
--	-----

APPENDIX No. IV.

NOTE, BY THE TRANSLATOR, ON THE PRESENT STATE OF THE CONTROVERSY RESPECTING THE ORIGIN OF THE VAUDOIS.. ..	506
--	-----

LIST OF ENGRAVINGS.

VOL. II.

	PAGE
THE RETURN OF THE VAUDOIS,	Frontispiece.
This scene represents the embarkation of the Vaudois, at Nyon, north-west shore of the Lake of Geneva, on 17th August, 1689, to return to their native land, under the guidance of their pastor, Henri Arnaud.
LA BALSILLE, THE CITADEL OF THE VAUDOIS,	Engraved Title.
Viewed from Mont Gunivert. This conical mass of rocks is seen in the centre of the picture, with the village of Balsille at its foot. Here the Vaudois successfully maintained their position, in 1689 and 1691, against an opposing army infinitely their superior in numbers, commanded by Catinat and Feuquières.
MAP OF THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS OF PIEDMONT, OR COUNTRY OF THE WALDENSES,	21
Compiled from the best Sardinian maps, together with original materials supplied by Dr. Muston.
VIEW FROM MOUNT MOUIASSA,	59
In the centre is Mount Placier and the valley of Rodoret; on the left is the valley of Pral, and to the right the valley of Balsille. These localities formed the theatre of the gallant exploits of the Vaudois in 1689-90.
THE COL LA CROIX, AND SOURCE OF THE PÉLIS,	92
From the pass of the Cochia. To the right is the Col La Croix, one of the longest and most difficult passes of the Alps. In the background, to the left, is the valley of the Pra, with the Lake of Marconseil, the source of the Pélis; and in the distance is Mont Viso, one of the highest of the Alps, so called from the magnificent view which it commands.
THE VALLEY OF PÉROUSE, LOOKING UP THE VALLEY OF THE CLÛSON,	187
To the right is seen the town of Pérouse, at the entrance of the valley of the Clûson or Pragela, which was formerly defended here by a strong castle, the ruins of which still remain. On the left is the town of Pomaret, picturesquely situated in the midst of precipices and vineyards, at the entrance of the Val St. Martin. It is noted as the residence of the celebrated John Rodolph Peyrani, moderator of the Waldensian Church, who died here in 1823.

	PAGE
THE VILLAGE OF ST. JOHN, VALLEY OF LUCERNA, . . .	345

To the left, on an eminence overlooking the village, is the Protestant church, surmounted by two towers—the handsomest of the Waldensian places of worship. On the rising ground, to the right, is the Roman Catholic church, with one tower.

OPENING OF THE VALLEY OF LUCERNA, FROM ABOVE THE VAU- DOIS HOSPITAL,	371
---	-----

In the foreground, to the left, is the hospital of the Vaudois valleys, erected by subscription; and on the rising ground behind it, the village of Copiers, in which is the ancient Protestant church of La Tour. In the centre are the villages of St. Marguerite and Les Dagots; and beyond them, to the left, is the town of La Tour, the Waldensian capital. The pyramidal rook of Cavour is seen in the extreme distance.

Engraving by W. W. Wall

THE MOUNTAIN OF THE FUTURE

THE MOUNTAIN OF THE FUTURE

THE MOUNTAIN OF THE FUTURE

View of the Valley of the Rhine from a sketch by R. M. Mason

VALLEY OF THE RHINE, LOOKING UP THE VALLEY OF THE RHINE TO THE NORTH, IN THE DISTANCE AND TO THE SOUTH

Engraved by R. M. Mason from a sketch by R. M. Mason

THE ISRAEL OF THE ALPS.

PART THIRD.

FROM THE RETURN OF THE VAUDOIS INTO THEIR OWN COUNTRY, TO THEIR CIVIL AND POLITICAL EMANCIPA-TION IN PIEDMONT.

CHAPTER I.

CONDITION OF THE EXILED VAUDOIS IN SWITZERLAND, BRAN-DENBURG, WURTEMBERG, AND THE PALATINATE.¹

(A.D. 1687 TO A.D. 1688.)

Frederic William the Great, Elector of Brandenburg, gives an asylum to Vaudois exiles—His generosity towards them—Their arrival in Brandenburg—Refugees of Pragela—Negotiations: the Swiss Cantons and the Elector—Refugees of the Piedmontese valleys—Their progress to Brandenburg—Hardships and difficulties—Settlement of a portion of the Vaudois at Stendal—Settlements at Burg and Spandau—Difficulties created by the people of Stendal and Burg—Uncharitableness of bigoted Lutheran ministers in Wurtemberg towards the Vaudois—Greater liberality of the laity and of the duke—Further difficulties and trials—A number of the Vaudois compelled to return from Wurtemberg to Switzerland.

THE Vaudois had been completely expelled from their native valleys. The limits of this work do not permit us to follow out, in all their details, the protracted and numerous negotiations which at this period took place amongst the different European powers, to provide either aid or an asylum for the proscribed people. Frederic William of Brandenburg granted them both.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—In general, the works which treat of the Vaudois colonies in Germany (see the Authorities of Chap. VIII. of this Third Part);—in particular, Dieterici, "Die Waldenser und ihre Verhältnisse zu dem brandenburgisch-preussischen Staate," Berlin, 1831; a work of xx and 415 pages, specially devoted to the subject of a part of this chapter (the arrival of the Vaudois at Stendal);—also, the sixth volume of the "Contributions to the History of the French Refugees in Brandenburg," by Erman and Reclam (a German work, Berlin, 1786, seven vols. 8vo), and the "Memorie di me Bartolomco Salvajot," the auth. r of which was of the number of
VOL. II.

This excellent old man¹ possessed all the qualities which make men great—magnanimous, persevering, simple and kind; he was the true founder of the power of Brandenburg, which was so rapidly to increase under the tutelary shade of his glorious memory. He was at once his own minister and his own general, and succeeded in rendering the state a flourishing one, though he had found it buried in ruins.² His virtues made him an arbiter among his equals: the talents of his son exchanged the electoral scarf for a royal crown. But the greatness of the son³ and the virtues of the father did more than found a state, they created a nation.

Already, since the year 1685, twenty thousand French, driven from their native country by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, had repaired, at the invitation of Frederic William, to districts of Brandenburg, which had been depopulated by previous wars; and they soon restored to new life these languishing and impoverished provinces. The numerous sacrifices which the illustrious elector imposed upon himself, in order to favour their settlement, were amply compensated in the course of a few years by the rapid advance of learning, commerce, and industry in that country.

It was not so, however, in the case of the Vaudois. When all the expenses of their settlement had been paid, and all difficulties overcome—even before these new colonists had gathered the first crops which they had sown, the news came that the Vaudois valleys were opened again to their banished children. Then it was that the elector gave evidence of a rare generosity. Far from seeking forcibly to retain the Vaudois, or demanding from them the repayment of the advances which he had made for them, he still the exiles who took part in that exploring visit of two years made by the Vaudois to the banks of the Elbe.—Hahn, "Geschichte der Ketzer im Mittelalter," vol. ii. "History of the Vaudois:" the notes are interesting.—Mayerhoff, "Inquiry into the Origin of the Vaudois in the Church of Mecklenburg;" Berlin, 1834 (a small volume).—Particulars given in the Introduction of Arnaud's "Glorieuse rentrée" (reprinted at Neuchâtel in 1845); and in Acland, "The Glorious Recovery," &c. (London, 1827, 8vo, with engravings).—Besides documents derived from the Archives of Geneva, Berne, Zurich, Darmstadt, and Stuttgart, and various memoranda collected in the places to which the narrative relates.

¹ The Elector Frederic William II., surnamed the Great, the grandfather of Frederic the Great, was then 67 years of age. He died in the following year, April 22, 1688.

² Memoires de Brandebourg. Art de vérifier les dates, &c.

³ Frederic III., at first elector, afterwards king (crowned 18th January, 1701), had not the true greatness of a statesman, like his father. He made his court a very splendid one, lived in magnificence, and adorned Berlin, but impoverished his people. (From L'Art de vérifier les dates.)

imposed upon himself additional personal sacrifices, to enable these unproductive colonists, the poor emigrants of the valleys, the more easily to abandon his lands, of which they had scarcely broken the soil, and to return from so far to the country which their daring brethren had re-conquered.

They arrived in Brandenburg, to the number of 700 persons, divided into three small caravans. The first, to which Salvajot belonged, after having sojourned at Geneva fourteen days, left that city again on the 24th of March, 1687, and on the same day proceeded as far as Nyon,—the place where, three years afterwards, the Vaudois were to assemble in secret, to commence their marvellous expedition for the conquest of their native valleys. “The next day,” says the exile above named, in his memoirs, “we came to Morges, where they kept us two days. On the 27th of March we slept at Lausanne, on the 28th at Moudon, and on the 29th at Payerne. This was a Saturday, and we remained there next day, and there we had the privilege of being present at the distribution of the Lord’s Supper, which was a great consolation for our souls. On Monday we went to Morat, where they had the courtesy to accommodate all of us in lodging-houses.” From the 1st to the 5th of April they journeyed on to Alberfeld, and next day, which also was a Sabbath, they rested; but on the Wednesday following they arrived at St. Gall.¹ “The inhabitants of this town,” adds the exile, “always most generously supplied us with food, clothing, and shoes; they took great care of our sick, and bestowed upon each of us three crowns on our departure.”²

But the Vaudois did not all depart; it being proposed that they should go to Brandenburg, many of them refused to undertake so long a journey, preferring to remain in Switzerland, in order that they might be ready to return to their own country if an opportunity should present itself. Of 200 persons who arrived at St. Gall with Salvajot, there were not more than fifty who consented to this new emigration. Embarking on the Lake of Constance, on the second of August, 1688, they arrived at Basle nine days after,³ and united themselves to other Vaudois who were already assembled in that city, with the intention of proceeding to the electorate of Brandenburg.

¹ For greater exactness, I subjoin the names and precise dates of these different stages:—31st March, Morat; 1st and 2d April, at Arberg; 3d, Wanighe; 4th, Brugli; 5th and 6th, at Alberfeld; 7th, Wintherthour; 8th, Reichbach; 9th, St. Gall.

² “I Signori Singalesi hanno sempre noi nutriti, vestiti, calzatti; e hanno datti ogni cosa agli annalatti, per la buona assistenza. . . . E quando partiremo . . . hanno datti a noi per limosina la somma di tre scudi caduno.” The author of these lines was not aware that the collections which had come from England, Holland, and Hesse, had enabled the Swiss to supply more liberally the wants of the Vaudois.

³ The following is the order of their stages:—From St. Gall to the Lake of Constance, 2d August, 1688. Traversed the lake, and arrived at Stein on the 3d. Were at Schaffhausen from the 4th to the 9th, and entered Basle on the 11th.

The total number of these various bands of emigrants did not amount to more than 365. It might have been expected, certainly, that these poor emigrants would have shown more eagerness to profit by the favourable dispositions of the elector towards them; for many of their compatriots were already settled in his dominions, and they themselves had made application to him to secure an asylum in case of proscription. So long before as the year 1685, the Vaudois of Pragela, affected by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, had sent three deputies to Germany for this purpose.¹ In January, 1686, there were already nearly 600 refugees in Switzerland, and an almost equal number shortly afterwards to arrive. Their commissioners, fully empowered to treat concerning their settlement, and bearing a certificate from the magistrates of Zurich, presented themselves before Mr. Mendelshobe, the representative of Brandenburg in the Palatinate. Their request was transmitted to Berlin by that diplomatic agent, in the following terms:—"These worthy people desire above all things that a district should be given them in which they might remain united, and that they should be the immediate vassals of the sovereign, and not, as in France, of the nobles. There are few artisans or manufacturing operatives among them; they therefore need nothing but lands to cultivate, and especially pastures. They would particularly like a territory proper for the culture of the mulberry, because they have long been accustomed to the rearing of silk-worms, and by this means could more easily provide for their own subsistence. His electoral highness may be assured of finding them obedient subjects, and of inflexible fidelity. They are a simple and laborious people; but they have ways of their own, and their manners and habits have much resemblance to those of the Swiss; for which reason they would not like to be intermixed with the other French refugees, whose lively and brisk humour would not perhaps accord with their tranquil disposition and their quite patriarchal mode of life."³ The elector immediately replied that they would be made very welcome in his dominions ;¹ and they repaired thither, whilst the other Vaudois valleys were still hotly engaged in the contest by which they were to be depopulated in their turn.

¹ The pastor Jaques Papon, and two laymen, Jaques Pastre and Sean Pastre-court, country merchants.

² From 15th to 25th January, 1686. (Archives of Berlin.)

³ Erman and Reclam, tom. vi. These authors have ascribed to the Vaudois of the Piedmontese valleys, who were expelled towards the end of 1636, the steps which are here mentioned as having been taken by the Vaudois of Pragela, and of the other valleys under the dominion of France, who, in 1635, had already taken refuge in Switzerland, to the number of 600 persons, whilst those of the Piedmontese valleys did not leave their native country till a year after. Moser and Dieterici have fallen into the same error.

The Protestant cantons of Switzerland soon addressed to Frederic William a new request, in favour of new refugees desiring to settle in his dominions ;² and the elector expressed himself as willing to receive another colony of 300 or 400 honest and industrious persons, on condition that their other friends should bear the expense of bringing them to his frontiers, and provide for their subsistence until their settlement on the lands assigned to them.³ The abundant collections which Switzerland then received from foreign countries⁴ for the relief of the persecuted, enabled it to undertake this on their behalf ; and an ambassador⁵ was accordingly sent to Berlin to bring this affair to a conclusion ; but the negotiations being protracted, the Vaudois meanwhile became more confirmed in the idea of soon returning to their native land.

In the beginning of the year 1688, the Swiss cantons wrote to the elector :⁶ "Our projects have been in some measure interfered with by the difficulty of obtaining passports from the Duke of Savoy, and by the more and more decided repugnance of the Vaudois to remove so far from their own country."⁷ However, we hope to be able to overcome these difficulties, and shortly to embark on the Rhine a certain number of Vaudois families, in order to conduct them to Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and to Gernesheim in the electorate of Mayence." At the same time, they requested Frederic William to send commissioners to meet them. That prince sent M. De Bondely, one of his privy councillors, who wrote from Zurich, "In place of 1500 Vaudois, we will not have more than 700 or 800 of them, the rest are Libertins" (patriots jealous of their

¹ Rescript of 31st January, 1686. (Archives of Berlin.)

² September 18, 1686. The elector replied on 29th October, 1686.

³ The patent which authorizes the settlement of this colony, is dated 12th March, 1687.

⁴ Switzerland itself had already furnished more than 4000 crowns to the Vaudois ; and having made an appeal for assistance to the other Protestant nations, met with a refusal from none. Holland furnished 17,000 crowns. The free city of Bremen nobly replied, on the 9th of July, 1687, that it knew its duties ; that it was not enough to contemplate and deplore the misfortunes of our oppressed brethren, but that they must be relieved, and that a general collection would accordingly be made within its walls on the 14th of July, 1687. This collection produced 407 crowns.

⁵ David Holzhalt, of Zurich.

⁶ 21st February, 1688.

⁷ The electoral resident at Frankfort (Remigius Merian) wrote :—"These poor people are very undecided ; sometimes they would go, and sometimes they would remain ; and, meanwhile, time is passing away," &c.

liberty), "who allow themselves to be blinded by an incredible love for their native country, and who are determined at all hazards to return to it."¹ The elector was not the less disposed to receive generously those who came to him: but that excellent prince was not to enjoy the fruits of his own good deeds. He died a few days after the departure of his envoy.

His successor² prosecuted the work which he had commenced. Frederic III. furnished the arms, money, and passports necessary for the transport of the Vaudois, who set out from Basle on the 1st of August, 1688, according to the Old Style, the 11th, according to the New.³ They were embarked in eight merchant boats, containing each fifty passengers. M. De Bondely had been careful to exhibit the safe-conducts beforehand to the governors of provinces and commandants of fortresses by which the exiles must pass;⁴ but the commandant of the French garrison of Brissac, "animated probably by a blind zeal for religion," say the Memoirs concerning the Introduction of the Refugees into Brandenburg, "caused thirty cannon shots to be fired at the boats when they were about half-a-league from the town." This last circumstance proves that he cannot have intended any act of serious hostility. No ball struck the boats, but the terror of the unfortunate Vaudois was so great, that a number of pregnant women were taken with the pains of childbirth, and were delivered in the boats. M. Charles, afterwards pastor at Berlin, baptized their children not far from the town. The commandant of Brissac being reproached, as he deserved, for his cruelty, made a poor enough excuse for himself, by saying that he had no other object in view than to try his cannons.

At Strasburg the Vaudois received another alarm. The king's lieutenant having been apprised of their arrival, took them for French refugees from Dauphiny, who had fled contrary to the rigorous edicts of Louis XIV., and resolved to arrest them. The

¹ Letters of 11th and 15th May, 1688.

² Frederic William, surnamed the Great, who died Elector of Brandenburg in 1688, was succeeded by Frederic III., Elector, afterwards King of Prussia, who died in 1713. Frederic William II., second King of Prussia, died in 1740, and Frederic II., called Frederic the Great, third King of Prussia, died in 1786. This chronology must be kept in view, in order to understand how Frederic III. could reign before Frederic II.—"I am resolved," wrote Frederic III. to Bondely, "to prosecute the work commenced by my venerable father." (Despatch of 12th June, 1688.)

³ These diversities in the dates have sometimes led to the supposition of different events or documents, causing obscurities which it is necessary to clear up.

⁴ The elector had himself written for this purpose to the Landgrave of Hesse, and to the Elector of Pfalz.

passengers had already been compelled to disembark upon French ground, and little respect had been shown to the authority of the Elector of Brandenburg, or the reclamations of his officer, when, recourse having been had to the commandant of the place, he came and inquired into the business, and did not hesitate to take a decided part, by saying to the Vaudois, "Go, poor people! return to your boats, and may God be your guide!" Nay, having remarked among them many sick and feeble persons, he sent them woollen cloaks, which were distributed among those who suffered most. Such traits of humanity, amidst the many cruelties to which the Reformed Church was then subjected, are pleasant to the mind, as flowers which bloom among ruins.

From the 7th to the 17th of August, the Vaudois disembarked at Gernesheim, in the electorate of Mayence. Waggoners were hired to convey them to Frankfort, where they were waited for by the Brandenburg commissioners appointed to receive them. The hospitable inhabitants of the banks of the Maine received the exiles with the most affectionate welcome. They were lodged for some days in the village of Bockenheim, situated half a league from Frankfort. The magistrates of that city sent them supplies of bread, wine, and meat. The Princess of Tarentum,¹ who had quitted France in order to remain faithful to the reformed religion, then resided at Frankfort. She sent additional assistance in linen and eatables, and invited the Vaudois to come to a large garden, where a numerous meeting was assembled, when her chaplain, M. Roy, delivered so pathetic a discourse with reference to the exiles, that a collection which was made for them upon the spot produced the sum of fifty crowns. To this the German and French reformed churches of the place added twice as much more, so that, through this assistance, the Vaudois were enabled to entertain the hope of reaching their destination, with a little in hand to aid them in establishing themselves.

They travelled in waggons to the frontiers of Hesse,² where the commissioner of the landgrave waited for them, who provided them with all that was necessary for the prosecution of their journey. From thence they proceeded to Marbourg, Cassel, and Sondershausen.

¹ Daughter of William IV., Count of Hesse-Cassel, born 12th February, 1626, married in 1648 to Charles de la Trémouille, Prince of Tarentum. (Her grandfather's sister had married the Prince of Condé.) The Prince of Tarentum died in 1672; his widow, Emilia, then retired to Frankfort, where she died, in 1693.

² In passing through the electorate of Mayence, they were detained at Voelpel, the sheriff of that place refusing to permit their waggons to pass, on the pretext that the waggoners belonged to Frankfort, and had no passports. The commissioner Maillette was under the necessity of returning to procure them.

sen, and so to Alberstadt, where they rested for a day; after which they set out again, passed through Vauzeleben and Mardebourg, and on the 31st of August, 1688, arrived at Stendal. This town was almost entirely depopulated. A terrible fire had ravaged it in 1687; it had several times been subjected to the disasters of war; and having been previously the scene of a great conflagration in 1680, it had not been able to recover from this rapid succession of calamities, which had driven away from it its wealthy inhabitants, imbittered the spirit of the poor, and rendered the whole population miserable.¹ The Vaudois were ushered into a large forsaken house, where bread and beer were distributed to them. Some of them were afterwards lodged with private families; the rest were left in this great edifice, where they continued to receive the same nourishment. "But," says one of them, "the brewers made such bad beer for us, that many of us could not bear to use it."²

The winter now approached, and the exiles still had no fixed abodes; the establishment of the colony was obstructed by a multitude of difficulties, caused chiefly by the inhabitants of the country. The local authorities were unwilling to permit the newcomers to take wood for building purposes from the public forests. Upon this the Vaudois sent a deputation to Berlin,³ to entreat the elector to interpose on their behalf, and not to restrict the terms of their settlement in the territory of Stendal.

Their petition asked, in substance⁴—

I. Full and entire liberty of conscience, places of worship with bells, a college and schools, and the maintenance of their pastors and schoolmasters by the state.

II. Authority to have their councils and magistrates elected by universal suffrage among the members of the colony.

III. A grant of lands proper for the cultivation of the vine; and that flocks and instruments of husbandry, to be afterwards repaid, should be provided for them to begin with.

IV. Habitations, with gardens, exempt from taxes for a number of years, to be granted to them in absolute property, and separate from the German houses.

¹ The population at that time amounted to no more than 1600 souls. (Dieterici, § vii. G.) In 1819, Stendal reckoned 906 houses, and 5252 inhabitants.

² These details are still taken from the Memoirs of Salvajot.

³ The deputies were Jacques Baile, pastor; Paul Bluchon, Jean Turin, Daniel Pasquet, Jean Tron, and Jean Rambaud. Their mandate is dated 4th September, 1688, and was drawn up as a public deed by DANIEL FORNERON, Piedmontese notary, in presence of twenty-nine witnesses, among whom appears Barthélemy Salvajot.

⁴ This document never having been published, I think it right to give a complete analysis of it.

V. Beds, bed-clothes, garments, and stoves; because, the petition says, the poor suppliants, coming from a southern country, are more sensible of the cold and storms.

VI. "May it also please your electoral highness to give us some other food besides bread and beer, which are our sole nourishment, or some money in proportion to our families, and likewise some furniture, of which we are absolutely devoid." They ask also for medicines, and the attendance of a physician upon the sick.

VII. That the Vaudois might be permitted to exercise freely all sorts of trades or professions, without being obliged to pay for any authorization.

VIII. That they should have the rights of fishing and hunting.

IX. That his electoral highness would be pleased to found some bursaries for the education of the young Vaudois who should devote themselves to the holy ministry.

X. That he would be pleased to solicit a statement of the collections made in Holland, that they might be able to avail themselves of them in their first settlement.

XI. That the elector would be pleased to employ his powerful mediation to obtain from the Duke of Savoy the liberation of all their pastors who were still detained prisoners, and the restitution of all their children who had been taken from them.

This petition remained some time unanswered, after which the elector sent commissioners to the spot, to do what was requisite in the most pressing matters to which it referred. These commissioners informed the Vaudois that the sum of six batzen¹ a-day would be allowed to each of them for their support. "But," observes Salvajot, "two weeks passed, during which we received no more beer, and as yet no money had come. The six batzen did not begin to be paid us till the commencement of December. On this we could live, and those who ate little could even save something."

A second division of Vaudois emigrants had arrived at Stendal on the 5th of September, under the conduct of Messieurs De Gremma and Charles Ancillon.² It was in much worse condition than the first, not having received the same assistance by the way, whether it was that charity had cooled, or that the means were exhausted.

The Vaudois at Stendal now amounted to 1300 persons.³ The

¹ Not quite 19 sous [or about 9*d.* sterling]. The batz is worth 16 centimes [or about 1½*d.* sterling]. Adult persons alone were to receive six batzen, children were only to receive two. This small allowance was continued to them till the month of August, 1689.

² The first had been conducted by Messieurs Maillette De Buy and Jacob Sandoz.

³ Viz., 52 who came from St. Gall, 313 who were joined with the first troop at commissioners¹ sent by the elector to settle them on the same footing with the French colonies, represented that it would be impossible to place at Stendal alone so great a number of colonists. The elector consented that some of them should be sent also to Burg, to Spandau, and to Magdeburg.² Four hundred and six of them remained at Stendal, where the church of St. Catherine was given them for their religious services, to be used by them alternately with the Germans. They had Mr. Peter Bayle for their pastor, Jacob Sandon was their governor, and their justice of the peace was Blanchon, all of whom were exiles like themselves.³ All these civil and ecclesiastical functionaries were paid by the state, which likewise provided for the maintenance of their schoolmasters; and the elector even caused houses to be built for the new settlers, and granted them the advances necessary to procure for them the implements of labour. At the same time, he opened the ranks of his army to young Vaudois capable of bearing arms; and a small Vaudois legion was soon admitted into it,⁴ which distinguished itself at the siege of Bonn, in 1689.⁵

The colonization movement began to assume a more regular character. Only 205 Vaudois had at first been sent to Burg; the commissioner Willmann proposed to augment the number, and having obtained authority for so doing, he proceeded to the town, to have accommodations prepared for the new-comers.⁶ "It is my opinion," he wrote to Berlin, "that more resources will be found here than at Stendal; the markets are better supplied, the lands permit the culture of the vine, and many branches of manufacture are in a flourishing state. The Vaudois will be able to employ themselves in the manufacture of woollen cloths and of pottery."

They found means also of turning their industry to good account in a silk thread manufactory established at Spandau.⁷ Not more

Basle, 335 who arrived on 5th September, 1688, and 600 who had left Pragela in 1685, remained in Switzerland in 1686, and came to Brandenburg in 1687.

¹ These were Messieurs Merian and Willmann.

² Some of them were also planted at Templin and at Angermünde. The numbers of the colonists having undergone frequent changes in the earlier periods of these settlements, I will no longer give precise numbers.

³ At Burg, they had for pastors Messieurs Dumas and Javel, and for director Moses Cornuël.—Peter Bayle, the son of the pastor at Stendal, was pastor at Spandau.

⁴ It was composed of 150 men.

⁵ In the month of September there returned from the siege 143 men.

⁶ They were to the number of 303, viz., 80 families, comprising 232 persons, besides 49 unmarried operatives, and 22 old men.

⁷ According to a report of the commissioners, dated 23th January, 1689, the Vau-

than fifty-two families remained at Stendal. Of all these different groups of settlers, those who were occupied in the dressing of silk seem to have enjoyed the greatest share of prosperity.¹ At Stendal, where the exiles had no other abode than an old castle, and the houses of the town's-people, their condition became daily more and more painful. They were sent from one to another, as persons who were felt to be troublesome. In many cases they were not permitted to enter the family apartment, which alone was warmed; and when it was proposed that houses should be built for them, the sheriff of the village opposed their taking the necessary timber from the forests belonging to the community, as the elector had hoped that they might. After protracted negotiations, the elector ordered the timber to be delivered to them free of expense. The commissioner Willmann put the country people under requisition to transport it; but the nobles and farmers refused; and it was found necessary to float it on the Elbe to the point nearest to Stendal, and to go thither for it with carts.

At Burg the state of matters was still worse; the inhabitants refused to admit any of the strangers into their houses. There was in this town a street of which the houses were almost all falling into ruin: the elector offered, on the recommendation of the commissioners, to purchase this street, and to have it rebuilt for dwellings for the Vaudois. It was a proposal in every point of view favourable to the town; but the proprietors of these untenable shops put a multitude of difficulties in the way; and when these were removed, the same opposition arose as at Stendal, on the subject of timber for building.

To complete this picture, it remains only to be stated that the Vaudois who had remained in the electorate of Kurpfalz² and in Wurtemberg, in the hope of being able to devote themselves to the cultivation of the vine, were obliged to leave these countries again on account of similar obstacles. They returned to Switzerland; and Switzerland, unable to accommodate them, wrote to the elector, asking him to receive them also into his territories.³ The elector dois were thus distributed:—At Burg, 303; at Spandau (or Spandou), 155; at Stendal, 136. To this must be added 100 persons settled at Magdeburg, and the 150 men who had put on the Prussian uniform.

¹ The great manufactory for spinning and working silks, which made the fortune of Spandau, was established in that town, about 1570, by Count Leynau. His heirs abandoned it to Frederic William in 1687. The workers received eight great sous weekly (but they were also lodged and fed). The Vaudois were installed here on 27th October, 1688, and upon this occasion the elector caused a gratuity of 200 crowns to be distributed among them. At Burg, the sum of 2170 crowns was paid in 1689 for the regular wages of the Vaudois workers.

² [The Palatinate.]

³ Despatch of 22d October, 1688.

replied¹ that his dominions were already encumbered with refugees of every description, the greater part of them destitute of resources; but that, nevertheless, he would do all that was in his power to receive these unfortunate exiles. He only requested the evangelical cantons to keep them for a short time, till he should be able to provide a suitable place for their abode. Swiss hospitality consented to maintain them till the spring of 1689, the very time when the heroic expedition took place by which they recovered possession of their own valleys. A small number of them had remained in the Palatinate, where the Elector Philip William of Neuburg had offered them an asylum, which they were compelled to abandon in 1689, on the invasion of that country by the devastating troops of Louvois. Some of them retired to the Grisons, and some to the country of Hesse-Darmstadt, where they found themselves in circumstances equally remote from tranquillity.

Finally, in Wurtemberg they were cruelly repulsed by the very parties who ought to have been the first to welcome them. The ministers of the gospel belonging to the confession of Augsburg treated the Vaudois as heterodox, because ever since the Reformation they had been followers of rigid Calvinistic doctrine; and instead of exercising charity, plunged into theological discussions. On the 25th of April, 1687, the protectors of the Vaudois in Switzerland had requested an asylum for them from the Duke of Wurtemberg,² who nominated a commission to examine into this application;³ but the commission, grievously embarrassed with a multitude of questions, of which, at the present day, we would think the grave discussion puerile, could not venture to decide anything without taking the advice of the faculties of theology. Two days after, a new meeting took place, no longer composed of theological doctors, but of laymen, and they did not hesitate to say that the Vaudois ought to be received. The Swiss envoy departed from Stuttgart the bearer of this good news; but during his absence, a theologian of Tubingen, named Osiander, wrote to the duke a letter full of intolerance against the Vandois,⁴ whom he called Crypto-Calvinists, resolving in the negative the questions an and quomodo, which had been raised on the subject of their admission. It seems as if in this case the language of theology was as barba-

¹ On 11th November, 1688.

² Frederic Charles. He was not reigning duke, but administrator of the duchy, being uncle and tutor of Eberhard Louis, who received the Vaudois in 1699. The conditions on which their admission was proposed in 1687 are mentioned by Moser, § 29.

³ The commission met on 4th May, 1687. Moser has published the minute of this meeting, § 30.

⁴ This letter is dated 3d June, 1687.

rous as its sentiments, and we are the more surprised to find such expressions in the mouth of Osiander, as his family belonged to the Jewish race, so long oppressed, and his father, although a Lutheran, was, however, merely a Jew who had adopted the religion of the state.

The Duke of Wurtemberg would not decide without consulting the faculty of law of Tubingen. Like the laymen, it concluded in favour of the admission of the Vaudois, adding, in order to satisfy the theologians, that it would be proper to ask these refugees themselves for a statement of their doctrines. Meanwhile the Swiss delegate, Wertmüller, wrote ¹ that 100 of the Vaudois were ready to set out, and wished to arrive in Wurtemberg before the approaching harvest, in order to be able to get employment as reapers. To this it was replied ² that they might come, and the bailiwick of Kirchheim-under-Teck was assigned them for their residence. It was even proposed to purchase for them the old castle of Salzburg, but the proposal was not carried into effect.³ In the beginning of July, 1687, fifty Piedmontese exiles set out for Wurtemberg, taking with them religious books in which the doctrine of their church was exhibited.

Particular reports were required from the bailiffs of the different villages⁴ situated in the country to which the immigrants were to proceed, concerning the means which existed for receiving them. It appeared from these reports that the Vaudois might easily procure uncultivated lands at a cheap rate, or even gratis, but that it would be necessary for them to have the means of building houses. As the exiles were destitute of means for this, the duke proposed to receive them on his own private domain of Freudenthal, but this project remained unexecuted. The principle of their admission was, however, recognized by the decree of 29th August, 1687,⁵ the basis upon which they were subsequently established.⁶ A decree of the 31st referred to the synod of Wurtemberg the question relative to the Vaudois doctrines.⁷ The synod concluded that they ought to be admitted under certain reservations, tending to restrain their religious influence, and provisionally recommended the con-

¹ On the 24th of May.

² On the 10th of June. The reply is signed by M. De Rüe.

³ Because of the high price which was demanded. To this castle there appertained a great extent of very ill-cultivated lands. Six thousand florins were offered for it.

⁴ Kirchheim, Urach, Guglingen, Maulbronn, Derdingen, Brackenheim, Boeblingen, Pfaffenhofen, Gindelfingen, &c.

⁵ Moser, § 36.

⁶ In 1700.

⁷ The long and wearisome deliberation of this synod is to be seen in Moser, § 38.

sultation of the faculty of theology of Tübingen. The opinion of this faculty was known beforehand; as intolerant at that period as Catholicism in its palmy days had ever been, but with less advantage of logic; for the intolerance of the Holy See is based upon the denial of individual liberty, whilst the intolerance of Protestantism exhibits this monstrous anomaly, that it starts from the ground of free examination. The faculty, therefore, was not consulted, which, like every body interested in the maintenance of a legal belief, had become a focus of resistance to the very progress of Christianity. The superior council, united with the consistory, supplied the want of the faculty's deliberation, by resolutions set forth with the reasons for them, and decided absolutely in favour of the immediate admission of the exiles.¹

But it was desired that Switzerland should guarantee to the new-comers the means of providing themselves with dwellings, and with the necessaries of life in the country into which they should be received, under reservations which will shortly appear. On the part of Switzerland, it was replied² that no such engagements could be entered into, the more especially as the amount of the collections promised from foreign countries was not yet known. The Vaudois likewise refused to accept the conditions which were proposed to them, and of which a statement is contained in the original manuscript of the Return, by Arnaud, but on a page deleted by two strokes of a pen, and suppressed in the printed work.³ The following is this unpublished page:—"God, who knew for what he had reserved them, permitted the clergy of Vitemberg,⁴ who are entirely Lutheran, . . . to make use of an artifice which eluded the good-will of the prince towards them. They⁵ gave him to understand that they were delighted to have the opportunity of welcoming among them the remains of that poor people; and in order so much the more to testify the care which they were disposed to take of them, they added that each pastor of their body should take a certain number of them, proportionate to the extent of his parish, and this throughout the whole duchy. . . . The Vaudois, whose object was to remain always united, were at no loss to understand that in this way they were really refused; and the duke

¹ Moser gives a long statement of the reasons upon which this decision is rested, § 39.

² On 22d November, 1687. This reply was made by M. Wertmüller.

³ The original is now at Berlin. This manuscript was found in 1782, in the pastor's house of Gros Villar, a Vaudois colony, of which the son of Arnaud was pastor till 1750, at a short distance from Schoenberg, where his father died. It was put into my hands in 1833.

⁴ According to the orthography of the manuscript.

⁵ The clergy.

administrator, who had only the authority of a regent, liable to be one day called to account, did not choose to do violence to the wishes of these ecclesiastics. Thus the Vaudois, not well knowing whither to go, and seeing their projects in this direction frustrated, entreated the authorities of Zurich and of Schaffhausen to permit them to spend the winter in their country."¹

This request was granted. But after the abortive expedition shortly to be mentioned, and which took place in June, 1688, the Swiss cantons themselves, on political grounds, felt a necessity for the removal of these unfortunate refugees from their country, which they might involve in danger by their presence; and it was upon this that a part of them consented to retire to Brandenburg. The Swiss authorities urged them the more at that time to adopt this resolution, because, ever since the beginning of the year, complaints had begun to arise concerning the heavy charges which this multitude, destitute of resources, entailed upon the state.² Ere long they went so far as to signify to the Vaudois, that if they persisted in rejecting all the proposals which were made to them of settlement in other countries, they would be under the necessity of removing them by force.³

Hereupon some of the exiles consented to make yet another effort towards settling in Wurtemberg, where they would be less remote from their native country than on the banks of the Spree. M. Wertmüller undertook to obtain for them the requisite permission.⁴ In the month of May the Vaudois sent delegates,⁵ commissioned to visit the bailiwicks of Maulbronn and Freudenthal, which were assigned them. Afterwards they arrived there to the number of 100. Shortly after, the produce of the collections made for them was sent from Holland.⁶ A few small troops of exiles

¹ "MM. de Zurich et de Chaffouse."

² As long as Switzerland took the charge of them, it did not suffer them to want for anything. "At Arnberg," says a traveller, "there are 250 of them. They give them very good ammunition bread. Wine is drawn for them from the cellars of the town's house; it is carried to them in pails. They have each a half pot, and this is filled with soup, and half a pound of beef or mutton given to each on a little plate, and half a pound of cheese. Such is their daily allowance." Relation de Voyage (Archives of Turin).

³ I would hesitate to admit the mention of this severe measure on the authority of Moser; but in the original manuscript of Arnaud occurs this sentence, which has been suppressed in the published work:—"They caused those who were in their canton to be informed that they must leave it by a fixed time, and that if they did not, they would be under the necessity of compelling them." The words which I have put in italics are erased in the manuscript (p. 17).

⁴ In March, 1688. See the details in Moser.

⁵ They were three in number; the pastor, Audibert Daud D'Olympies (such is the name as given by Moser), and two laymen.

⁶ In July, 1688.

subsequently arrived; but now the difficulties began. A number of bailiwicks absolutely refused to receive them within their borders. "Why should we receive these wretched creatures?" said they. "They will be a burden upon the community. They will embarrass the hospitals and pious foundations. They will cause provisions to become dear, by purchasing them in great quantities in the markets. They will prove a mere multitude of marauders." Such were the reasons for which they were repelled. However, the bailiff of Maulbronn, who had distributed in different villages the seventy-eight Vaudois whom he was required to provide with lodgings, said in his report: "They are laborious and decent people, working diligently, and doing their utmost honourably to maintain themselves. Nobody has any complaint of them. They receive, through the pastor D'Olympies,¹ four kreutzers and a half a-day for every man above the age of fifteen years, three kreutzers for every woman, and two kreutzers for the children."² This money was paid every ten days, and was taken from the collections sent from Holland.

In the month of September, 1688, the bailiwick of Stuttgart, which had manifested the greatest hostility to the introduction of the Vaudois, made new complaints, on the ground that these pretended French people had been a burden upon it for eight weeks, and declared an absolute resolution to be quit of them before winter. These complaints were communicated to the pastor, who requested a delay of two weeks, to conclude a definite treaty of colonization, or to renounce the idea of that settlement, and proceed elsewhere. This period having passed without any change in the position of the Vaudois, they received orders to quit the country within the space of eight days.³

It is necessary, in order to explain the harshness of this measure, to call to mind that the Vaudois were confounded in Germany with the other victims of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and were therefore considered as French. But the diet of Ratisbon had just declared France and the Cardinal of Furstemberg to be enemies of the empire, as they were contending for the archbishopric of Cologne with the Prince of Bavaria, whom the emperor supported. To this provocation France replied by a declaration of war, the consequence of which was the savage devastation of the Palatinate by Louvois.⁴ The duchy of Wurtemberg was afraid

¹ Arnaud calls him M. Daude, refugee pastor of Languedoc, better known by the name of Olympe. (First edition, p. 31.)

² Moser, § 41. The kreutzer is worth about four centimes [about $1\frac{1}{2}$ farthing].

³ This order was addressed, on 23th September, 1688, to the bailiff of Stuttgart, who intimated it to the refugees.

⁴ In February and March, 1639.

of drawing on itself the like wrath of the French king, by giving refuge to those whom he had proscribed. Hence the new exile of the Vaudois, who returned to Switzerland, that land of inexhaustible and generous hospitality. They returned to it more wretched than they had been before, but more resolute than ever to brave everything in order to regain possession of their native valleys, out of which there was no country for them upon earth.

In permitting them thus to be driven out of Wurtemberg, where at a later period they were to find a permanent asylum, Providence was preparing, in its mysterious designs, to bring about that heroic expedition in which they were to engage, in order to return victorious to the Vaudois Alps. Let us now see what had taken place in these mountains after their departure, and what was now the condition of that land of martyrs, which was soon to become the prize of heroes.

CHAPTER II.

THE STATE OF THE VALLEYS IN THE ABSENCE OF THEIR INHABITANTS; AND FIRST ATTEMPTS OF THE EXILED VAUDOIS TO RETURN TO THEIR OWN COUNTRY.¹

(A.D. 1636 TO 1689.)

The Vaudois who had become Catholics—The faithful witnesses in the prisons of Piedmont—Sale of the forfeited lands—Tabular view—The new purchasers—Neglect and desolation—The exiled Vaudois conceive the project of returning to their valleys—The first attempt of a small number frustrated by the Bernese government—Three persons sent by the Vaudois to explore the route to the valleys—Secret consultations in Janavel's house—Plan of a new expedition agreed upon—The secret having transpired, the expedition is relinquished—The situation of the Vaudois in Switzerland becomes more uncomfortable in consequence of this abortive project—State of feeling amongst them—They receive encouragement from the Prince of Orange and others—Janavel, foreseeing a rupture between France and Savoy, recommends the time as a favourable one for their enterprise—Captain Bourgeois—Janavel's instructions to his compatriots.

THE documents which exist on the subject of this chapter,² particularly on the state of the Vaudois valleys during the absence of their exiled inhabitants, would of themselves afford materials for a considerable volume; but according to the proportion of other parts of the present work, this subject can have only a very limited space assigned to it here. It must suffice to treat of it by general statements, cursory, though exact, and by noticing a few of the principal facts.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—The first pages of ARNAUD: La glorieuse rentrée; and, more especially, the Archives of the Court of Accounts at Turin, which contain matter for a number of volumes on this subject; also the Archives of the State, called Archives of the Court, which contain thirty documents. Something has also been found in the Archives of the Valleys; amongst others, in those of Lucerna and Le Villar.

² The greater part of these documents are at Turin, in the ARCHIVES OF THE VOL. II.

Whilst the Vaudois still pined in the prisons of the Duke of Savoy, new inhabitants were already invited to settle in their valleys. It had been at first proposed to establish upon these deserted lands the exiled Irish, who led a wandering life in the district of Montferrat; but two reasons prevailed against this proposal; 1st, the unlaborious habits of these islanders, through whose carelessness the regions, recently so flourishing, would soon have become waste and sterile; 2d, the greater advantage which there would be in selling the lands than in giving them away. It was therefore resolved that they should be offered for sale, and that those which were not sold should be let. The richest domains were united to the private domain of Victor Amadeus, and some others given to his officers or to pious foundations. The Vaudois who had become Catholics were permitted to remain for a few months longer on their lands, in order to dispose of them as they best could, after which they were to be transferred to the province of Verceil.¹ This period was prolonged, in the case of most of them, to almost a year; and when the difficulty of re-peopling the Vaudois territory was discovered, the few families still there were permitted to remain.

COURT OF ACCOUNTS: Ordini, No. 103, fol. 33, and 104, fol. 6. Mazzo, No. 563. — Inventarii, from No. 566 to No. 573 inclusive. — Also, the Registri di sottomissioni passate da diverse communita particolari delle valli di Luserna. Ordini, No. 97, fol. 91, and No. 105, fol. 3. Contracts of sale and inventories, No. 559, 1st Reg. Nos. 560, 561, 562. — Stati di particolari compratori, &c. . . . No. 564. Other documents, Nos. 567, 563, &c. In the ARCHIVES OF THE STATE, called ARCHIVES OF THE COURT, are, amongst others — “Memorie concernenti li religionarii resi, e beni loro.” — “Parere degli delegati sopra gl'occorrenti delle Valli.” — “Ordine delli delegati da S. A. R. per la consegna de beni, redditi, vestiarii, etc., delli religionarii, devoluti a S. A. R. per la rebellione d'essi.” — Memoir, entitled “Stato presente delle Valli.” — Another, “Progetto per l'alienatione de beni che sono nelle Valli di Luserna.” Statistical, &c.

¹ This appears from an order of 15th June, 1639, which enjoined all the Vaudois who had become Catholics to remove to a distance of ten miles from the valleys, under pain of five years of the galleys. (Archives of the Court of Accounts, No. 185. Reg. contr. Gen., fol. 64, right-hand page.) The reason assigned for this order was the return of the exiled Vaudois, who set out from Switzerland two months after. This date also proves that the design of these latter was known, or at least suspected, beforehand. Other documents concur to establish this fact. See, for example, the Records of the Council of State of Geneva, sittings of 10th and 23th May, 1639.

But their faithful compatriots were martyrs in the prisons, and scarcely had they passed beyond the confines of their valleys, when the following proclamation was published throughout all the dominions of the Duke of Savoy:¹—

“Be it known to all men, that by the notorious rebellion² of the religionaries of the valleys,³ all the properties which they possessed have absolutely fallen to the royal domain. Accordingly, those who desire possession of them are apprised that the foresaid properties, with the fruits hanging on the trees, and the crops which happen to be in the fields, will be exposed to sale at Lucerna, from the 15th to the 24th of the current month, in presence of the procurator of his royal highness,⁴ who will receive all proposals for the purchase of them, in large or small lots, collectively or individually, in order to repeople the said valleys as soon as possible, and all to the greatest advantage of his royal highness.”

At the bottom of this placard, which was widely circulated, and was pasted up on all the public pillars of the towns of Piedmont, was annexed a list of the properties offered for sale in the different Vaudois communes—if the name can be applied to a vast solitude, in which there were now only a few dwellings to be seen, inhabited by Catholics, recently unobserved amidst the more numerous Vaudois, and now themselves forming the whole population.

In this state of things the municipal councils had to be everywhere formed anew. In more than one commune, the whole of the families remaining could scarcely furnish materials for a council. The commune of St. Jean, not being able to make out an independent organization, was incorporated with that of Lucerna, and ceased to exist until the return of the Vaudois.

The Catholics of the district were the first to seek after the confiscated lands; but as they could not of themselves supply in any measure the place of the population which had disappeared, the condition was imposed upon the highest bidders of bringing a certain number of families from other districts to be occupied in the cultivation of the soil, and to be settled upon the properties so purchased, otherwise the sale to be held null. Then came speculators of every description, seeking to turn to account for their own gain that vast forfeiture of the properties of a whole people. Some of these were themselves possessed of wealth; others, acting on behalf of anonymous societies, owed to the associations which they represented the means of becoming bidders. They mostly belonged to Suza, Chambéry, and Saluces, and the largest lots were purchased by them. All the lands of Angrogna, for example, were sold in a single lot. Those of Bobi were adjudged to bidders from Suza, for the sum total of 44,000 livres. Those of Le Villar fell into the hands of ten individuals belonging to Saluces. But in this sale the preference was generally given to Savoyards, because, as they were accustomed to mountains, and came from a very populous country, there seemed to be the greatest security for a speedy and advantageous colonization.

¹ It is dated 1st July, 1686. ² Per la notoria ribellione. The document is printed.

³ Here follow their names.

⁴ Signor Conte, auditore e patrimoniale generale Fecia di Cossato.

But this hope was far from being realized, for the purchasers were not able to introduce a sufficient number of farmers into their new domains. In vain were numerous injunctions addressed to them to this effect: the greater part of the families who were to come to cultivate the soil had not yet arrived; and when the exiled Vaudois returned to their native country, it still seemed, in its neglected condition, to mourn for the children whom it had lost.

Notwithstanding the dryness which is generally experienced in statistics, I think it necessary, in order to abridge this statement, to present here a table of the entire population of the valleys before and after the expulsion of their inhabitants, showing also the lands sold or to be occupied, and the number of families from other quarters whom the new proprietors were bound to introduce. This table is prepared from a great number of documents derived from the archives of the Court of Accounts and of the senate at Turin, and also from the royal library and the archives of the state in the same city.¹

The Vaudois valleys, therefore, were not yet repeopled, and everywhere presented the saddest possible aspect—lands unculti-

¹ The materials of the following table are derived from a great number of different documents, of which some contain only approximate indications. The figures in the first and third groups of columns are derived from two papers in the Archives of the State at Turin, of which one is entitled, "Stato presente delle valli, che d'ordine di V. A. R. si trasmette hoggi sei settembre, 1686." The other paper, annexed to the former, has the following title:—" Ristretto delle famiglie religionarie, ch'erano nelle valli; di quelle da introdursi; della già venute; delle mancanti, e delle catholicizzate." There seems to be reason for believing these figures to be exact and official.

The last column of this table, entitled "Extent in journals of the lands sold or to be occupied," presents information obtained from the same source, viz., from a paper belonging to the Archives of State of Piedmont, and bearing this title: "Stato delle valli e beni compressi nella riduzione, secondo le notizie che sin al presente si non potute havere." This document is without date, and is inscribed with the number 607 of the series. The two above mentioned bear the numbers 267 and 268.

Only the figures in the intermediate group of columns are for the most part apvated—hamlets ravaged—cottages standing open and half fallen to ruins—walls still blackened by fire—rural inclosures falling or thrown down—fruit-trees in some places torn up by the roots—the vines, undressed, trailing their shoots along the ground—the mulberry-trees not stripped, the leaves of which covered every bough with dense and wild luxuriance—the limits of properties partially effaced by brambles, or by the hands of the new purchasers—and these coming as strangers into districts unknown to them, and displaying a negligence and inattention,¹ which neither promises² nor threats³ could overcome—all spoke of past violence, present injustice, and uncertainty concerning the future.

proximations, but based upon careful investigations, and rules of proportion most scrupulously carried out.

NAMES OF THE COMMUNES.	Vaudois Families.		INDIVIDUALS.						Families of Strangers.		Extent in journals of the lands sold or to be occupied.
	Were in the valleys before 1686.	Became Catholic in 1686.	Alive in 1686, before the war.	Died in 1686 (chiefly in the prisons).	Left the country in regular bands.	Dispersed or irregularly emigrated.	Disappeared or carried off (mostly children).	To be introduced into the valleys.	Already introduced in 1687.
St. Jean	217	49	1485	671	287	143	47	80	58	1029
Angrogna	327	12	2237	1250	539	269	65	200	105	1750
La Tour	200	50	1369	598	356	128	50	85	57	925½
Villar	163	66	1115	389	164	83	33	130	95	1559½
Bobì	118	10	907	432	185	92	28	110	10	1103
Rora	30	20	205	112	84	4	5	25	13	624
St. Germain	66	23	451	159	68	34	11	30	17	5225
Pramol	75	4	513	283	122	61	20	20	3
Pinache	35	25	239	53	23	9	3	20	8	1200
Villar-Pinache	13	4	89	35	18	7	2	6	2
Portes	32	17	219	59	31	12	4	20	3	2500
Pérouse, Pomaret	56	4	383	207	98	44	12	25	...
Pral	100	13	634	347	154	75	18	80	58	23,000
Faët	80	32	547	186	82	41	13	40	21
Rioclaret	100	13	692	349	166	74	21	60	37	8100
Traverse	30	16	211	76	18	12	4	20	4
Bouille	15	13	102	34	3	2	1	10	5	23,000
Maneille	40	19	273	100	21	18	5	6	...
Macel	80	8	547	287	149	62	11	50	41	8100
Salze	30	13	193	68	24	14	3	20	9
Rodoret	35	12	239	91	38	20	6	25	8	8100
St. Martin	20	20	137	22	6	4
Prarusting	80	3	542	284	132	64	25	80	...	8100
Rocheplate	81	3	212	96	43	23	9

¹ Vedendo noi quanto sù grande la transunagine e negligenza . . . de novi acquisitori de beni di queste valli, &c. . . Order of the Intendant Frichignono, dated Lucerna, 1st March, 1688. (Turin. Archives of the Court of Accounts, No. 574.)

² Exemptions from burdens, promised to the new proprietors and depopulated communes. Edict of 26th January, 1688. (From the same.)

³ Ingiunzione . . . agli acquisitori de beni delle valli . . . all' adempimento de loro contratti. (From the same. Ordini, No. 91, fol. 91, and No. 105, fol. 3.)

On the other hand, the people who had been exiled from Piedmont had not been able to establish themselves in a permanent and satisfactory manner anywhere. Driven from the Palatinate by war, and from Wurtemberg by the politic desire of maintaining peace—wandering about the banks of the Rhine or among the mountains of Switzerland—their regretful longings, their distress, a sense of the burden which they entailed upon their foreign brethren, and the very uncertainty of their own circumstances—all combined to give form and consistency to the patriotic design, which many of them had conceived, of returning, at whatever cost, to their own country. In the eyes of Janavel this heroic attempt was more than the mere satisfaction of a patriotic feeling—it was a duty binding on the conscience—and it was not difficult for him, by his exhortations, to render the Vaudois unanimous on this point.

A certain number of the more impatient and determined among them, amounting to about 300, had already assembled in the neighbourhood of Lausanne, and attempted to embark at Ouchi, in order to pass into Savoy; but the Bernese authorities, whose jurisdiction then extended over the Pays de Vaud, opposed this design, and, without doubt, prevented the inevitable destruction which would have overtaken these unfortunate people in the territories of the Duke of Savoy, if they had entered them with so little consideration. "This first attempt," says Arnaud,¹ was without due preparation, without a leader, without arms, and without even the concurrence of those who took the direction of their affairs; so that having been made on a mere sudden impulse, and without the adoption of the measures necessary for such an enterprise, it can be no wonder that their design failed." Moreover, the Helvetic cantons were under obligation to the Duke of Savoy to prevent any attempt on the part of the Vaudois contrary to the tranquillity of his dominions. Perceiving how they were situated, the exiles returned to their places of abode, without, however, renouncing the project of recovering possession of their own country, which from that time forth became the sole earthly object of their lives.

That they might be able the better to mature and the more confidently to execute this design, they secretly sent prudent emissaries to investigate beforehand, to sound the dispositions of their former fellow-countrymen, to examine the whole country, and particularly the by-ways by which they might arrive at the valleys; for they deemed it of great importance to avoid the centres of population, where they might have been opposed by considerable forces. The devoted men who undertook this dangerous mission were three in number—one belonging to Pragela, another to the valley of St. Martin, and the third to Queyras.

¹ Pages 6 and 7. First edition.

"These three travellers," says Arnaud, "were sufficiently fortunate in going, but they were not equally so in returning; for, not being able to keep the great roads, and making their way across the mountains, two of them were apprehended as robbers, in a narrow and savage valley of the Tarentaise.¹ Being questioned why they did not keep the ordinary roads, they replied that, being traders in lace, and knowing that it was manufactured in that country, they went from one place to another to purchase it. This reply seeming plausible enough, various pieces of lace were presented to them, to see if they were well acquainted with the kind of goods in which they said that they dealt—a trial which had almost been their destruction, for the envoy from Pragela having offered six crowns for a piece which was not worth three, the lord of the manor and people of the place stripped them and imprisoned them as spies. After eight days they underwent another examination; and the envoy who belonged to Queyras having formerly carried on the trade of a foreign merchant in the south of France, gave so many particulars concerning the localities in which he had done business, that his declaration obtained credit; and in order to explain the mistake which had cost them so much, he added that his companion, who knew little about lace, was only his servant, and not his partner. There was in the neighbourhood a man belonging to Lunel; he was brought, and recognized the correctness of the topographical details given by the prisoner, and the two travellers were at last released, but in a state of complete destitution, for their captors refused to give them back the money which they had taken from them, so that they left the place robbed, after having been apprehended as robbers."

They found means, however, of making their way to Geneva. There a secret council was held in the house of Janavel, who seems to have been the soul of all the schemes attempted by the Vaudois for returning to their native country. For this, indeed, he was expelled from Geneva.² His endeavours were seconded in the most active manner by Henry Arnaud. Janavel directed their plans; Arnaud conducted the execution of them;³ the Vaudois obeyed, and

¹ It was in the village of Tignes, at the base of Mount Iseran, where are the sources of the Isère.

² See the Records of the Council of State of Geneva, sittings of 31st May, 11th and 23th June, 11th July, 1687, &c.

³ I shall have occasion, by and by, to make some reservations regarding the too exclusive part which has been assigned to the activity and genius of this celebrated man in the return of the Vaudois; but in respect of the steps taken in preparing by the blessing of God their country was regained. But perseverance was required as well as courage, for they succeeded no better in their second attempt than in the first.

The council held in Janavel's house resolved that those who took part in this new expedition should assemble from their different retreats on the utmost confines of Switzerland, at the entrance of the Valais. Thence they were to proceed, by the territory of St. Maurice, on the outskirts of Savoy, following the valley of the Great St. Bernard as far as Orsières, re-ascending the Val Ferret, passing over the Col Letreyre, descending to Courmayeur, thence passing to the Little St. Bernard; and so getting round Mount Blanc, they were to enter Savoy again, between the Col Bon Homme and Mount Iseran, on the side of Scez, according to the route which their first exploring envoys had marked out. This bold project led them from summit to summit amongst the most inaccessible mountains of Europe, and sheltered them from the attacks of their enemies, under the protection of storms and glaciers, to the very bosom of their own fair valleys. Their ardour was great. Janavel gave them instructions. "Seeing," said he, "that, by the grace of God, you are filled with zeal and courage to kindle the lamp of the gospel again in the place of your birth, where the church of the Lord has never been reduced to so great an extremity as now, I pray you to take in good part what follows, as it all comes from one of your servants, who is faithful to you, and will be faithful until his last breath."¹ Then follow the counsels of military skill and experience, which will be given in a subsequent page, and which were afterwards applied; for in 1688 the secret was not so well kept by the 3000 persons, or thereby,² who were necessarily for this expedition, he must certainly be placed in the first rank. The following words occur in the Records of the Council of State of Geneva, sitting of 9th June, 1688:—"The Sieur Arnaud shall be called upon to explain this fact" (the arming of the Vaudois).

¹ Archives of the Court. Turin. At the bottom of this paper are these words—"Given in Switzerland, this month of June, 1688."

² It is said, in a letter written from Samoën, 12th July, 1688, at eight o'clock in the evening (Turin, Archives of the Court), that the persons entering into this expedition amounted to 3000 in number. The number is stated at 2000 only in the manuscript of the Royal Library, entitled "Here follows a faithful relation of the presumptuous and violent passage proposed and attempted by the refugee and expelled people of Lucerna, along with Frenchmen, by the lower valley, chiefly in the district of St. Maurice, and in the government of Monthey." These words, "along with Frenchmen" (for the revocation of the Edict of Nantes had driven many Frenchmen into exile), explain to us how it is possible that the Vaudois may have been more numerous when they returned to their own country than they were when they left it. However, the number here stated must have been exaggerated, for Arnaud gives that of 600 or 700 men only.

acquainted with it, that they could find protection in the inattention of their enemies.

Enough transpired of this project to excite the watchfulness of the Swiss government, and to put the military posts of Savoy upon their guard. Accordingly, when the Vaudois began to assemble at Bex, to the number of 600 or 700 men,¹ the alarm was promptly given in the Valais and in Savoy, where the Catholic authorities called the people to arms, and caused signal-fires to be lighted, in order to dispute with the exiles their passage at St. Maurice, the bridge of which was immediately guarded and defended. The enterprise, being divulged at its commencement, was not prosecuted.

"The bailli of Aigle," says Arnaud, "having repaired to Bex, which is within his jurisdiction, caused the Vaudois to be assembled in the place of worship, where he addressed them in a very affecting speech, exhorting them to patience, and assuring them that it would be temerity to persist in their design. 'Poor Vaudois,' added he, with tears in his eyes, 'the Lord will remember you and your distresses, for he cannot but approve the zeal which you manifest to re-establish the true religion in the sanctuary of your ancestors, where it never was extinguished, and he will infallibly one day bring you back to your native land.'" After this Arnaud ascended the pulpit, and took for his text these words of the gospel, "Fear not, little flock."² "Yes! fear not," said he to the Israel of the Alps, "for God has his time for casting down and his time for raising up; it is his pleasure that we still wait; let us suffer with patience, and in his own time he will raise us up." The worthy bailli, whose name was Frederic Thurmann, then himself conducted the Vaudois troop back to the interior of the canton, caused provisions to be distributed among them, and lodgings to be found for them at Aigle, took their officers to his own house, and moreover lent them 200 crowns, to assist those of them who had come from the opposite extremity of Switzerland in returning to their places of asylum. It seems hard to believe that this generous beneficence was made a cause of complaint against Thurmann, and that he was obliged to write to Berne to justify himself to his superiors.³

This attempt caused a great sensation both in Switzerland and in Savoy.⁴ Victor Amadeus renewed his proclamation, prohibiting

¹ On 23d June, 1638.

² Luke xii. 32.

³ His letter is dated 9th July. (Archives of Berne.)

⁴ The Archives of Turin contain a great number of letters on this subject, written from Thonon, Evian, and Les Allinges; from Chablais, Sion, St. Gingolf, and St. Maurice; from the Sardinian government to the Swiss government, and vice versa; as also the reports of several agents, from which I shall hereafter borrow a few particulars.

the Vaudois from returning to their country under pain of death,¹ and enjoined all those who might be in it, in any capacity whatever,² to have their names registered by the magistrates of the place of their residence, within the space of ten days, under pain of being publicly whipped.³ The Helvetic government was asked in a threatening manner, by the representatives of France and Piedmont, to watch more strictly than hitherto over the attempts of these audacious exiles; but with this surveillance, dictated by political necessity, it united all that tenderness for misfortune which Christian charity ought to inspire. It even seemed that their heroic determination to return to their native country amidst so many dangers, served only to augment the interest with which the Vaudois exiles were already regarded; and the troop which had assembled for the expedition, although obliged to disperse itself throughout the different cantons of Switzerland, everywhere met with more proofs of sympathy than marks of suspicion.⁴ Yet there was, at the first, a sort of indignation felt against these refugees who involved the country in danger, and could not be brought to submit to an inactive exile; and a meeting held at Arau, by the delegates of the different cantons, distinctly informed them that they must withdraw from Switzerland.⁵ It was then that a part of them resolved to go to Brandenburg, and to form the colony of Stendal, already spoken of. These, who were considered as the more reasonable, received a thousand attentions, whilst loud complaints were made of the obstinacy and stubbornness of those who persisted in the design of returning to their own country.

"At that time," says Arnaud, "they were treated as if nothing were too bad for them, insomuch that there were few sermons in which their subject was not fallen upon, and in which they were not

¹ This edict is dated 12th July, 1688; it was registered by the senate on the 14th, and published on the 16th.

² As domestics, proprietors, or farmers, but having become Catholics.

³ This edict is in the Archives of the Court of Accounts at Turin. Ordini: 1686 to 1688, No. 104, fol. 46, and No. 105, fol. 37. It is also in the Archives of the State.

⁴ It appears, from a letter of the Vaudois to the magistrates of Berne, dated 16th July, that they received much kindness in that city. "Although we can find no language strong enough to express our gratitude," say they, "we would be unworthy of this kindness if, before leaving your territories, we did not offer you our most humble thanks." At Vevey, on the contrary, where the people still felt annoyed, through the apprehension of danger arising from their abortive attempt, they were very ill, even harshly received. (See Arnaud, first edition, p. 13.)

⁵ On the contrary, a few days before, it was sought to retain them there. The government of Berne had offered them, as a place of settlement, the little isle of St. Pierre, in the Lake of Dienne or Bieler, which is now well known as associated with the name of Rosseau.

very rudely treated." But they were aware that political considerations had more to do with these severities than the personal sentiments of the Helvetic body, which served for their protection.

Victor Amadeus had sent to Switzerland a number of emissaries, charged to transmit to him circumstantial reports concerning the Vaudois and their affairs. The first of these, named Bouloz, arrived at Aigle when the disconcerted troop were still there, who had assembled for the expedition. He passed himself off as a French refugee, and expressed a desire to unite himself to them. The Vaudois received him as a brother, kept him amongst them, told him the whole history of the wars of 1686, and gave him a description of their country, "where there were," said they, "fourteen places of worship, and as many ministers, of whom M. Arnoz was the most able and learned."¹ It is easy to perceive that the person here intended is the pastor Arnaud, the leader of the expedition. Another agent says in his report that the Vaudois, irritated at not having succeeded under the direction of this leader, "had put him to death, by cutting off his fingers, his feet, and then his head."² I insert this story, as false as it is horrible, only to show how readily the most ridiculous reports concerning the Vaudois were received, and how little credit is due to information from such sources. The case is different when the narrator recounts only what is personal to himself.

"As we left Morat," says the same emissary, "we saw two captains from Lucerna, of very good appearance, with gray, close-fitting coats, laced hats, sabres, and bayonets. Very few women or children were to be seen among these people. Some of them are at Arnberg, others at Arau, Serli, Bienne, and Nidau. Their excellencies of Friburg have written to the baillies of the canton, to arrest all whom they find in it. At Lucerne³ I saw some of them, who were leaving that place for the Palatinate; for they did not choose to go to Brandenburg, as it is too distant. I asked the reason, presenting one of them some snuff. 'Here we shall be the vanguard of Switzerland,' said he, 'for we will never die but in our own country.' . . . Then, as they complained that his royal highness had not yet set their ministers at liberty, and restored their children, I signified displeasure thereat, by saying that the Duke of Savoy was a bad prince. 'No,' he replied, 'the duke is a good prince, but he is ill advised; it is that which does him wrong.'

¹ These are the terms and the orthography of the document, which is deposited in the Archives of Turin, under this title, "Abridgement of the narrative of the journey of M. Bouloz, advocate, into the Pays de Vaud, by order of M. the commandant of Le Chablais."

² Paper simply entitled Account of Journey, and beginning, "I set out on 1st August, 1688 . . . (Turin, Archives of the State.)

³ From this sentence onwards the quotation is composed merely of sentences borrowed from the most interesting parts of this document.

This emissary had represented himself to the Vaudois as an inhabitant of the Pays de Vaud; and he adds that they appeared to him to be determined to return sooner or later to their native land; "for," says he, "they would rather be cut into four quarters in their own country, than live well anywhere else." Is it not remarkable to see so ardent a love for their native country associated with so much loyalty towards their persecutor! Such a people were worthy of the interest with which they inspired even their enemies.

The powers which protected the Vaudois Church—Holland in particular—adhered, like the Vaudois themselves, to the idea that the ancient lamp of their faith should be rekindled in the valleys. Arnaud¹ presented himself before the Prince of Orange,² "who reproached him very severely," he says, "for his impatient proceedings, and for having hitherto chosen his time so ill,"³ encouraging him not to lose heart, and supplying him with means to facilitate the accomplishment of his design.⁴ Even private persons took a most active interest in promoting it.⁵

Janavel foresaw an approaching rupture between Piedmont and

¹ He was accompanied by a Vaudois captain of St. Jean, named Baptiste Besson.

² William Henry of Nassau, Prince of Orange, posthumous son of William IX., who had married the daughter of Charles I., King of England, was, in virtue of his descent by the mother's side, called to the throne of Great Britain in February, 1689, under the name of William III., at the age of thirty-nine years. When the Vaudois leaders presented themselves before him, he was Stadtholder of Holland, and had been so since 1672.

³ This clause in italics is another extract from the manuscript of the Return, from which it has been struck out.

⁴ He supplied them with assistance in money, and with letters of introduction to several officers, who took part in the expedition.

⁵ Arnaud (p. 54 of the preface) mentions in particular M. Clignet, postmaster-general at Leyden, who, in the following year, lent 100,000 florins to the emperor of Germany to carry on the war against France. "Without the assistance which he gave us," says Arnaud, "the return of the Vaudois to their own country would have been impossible." (Fol. 27, left hand page.)

One of the emissaries of the Duke of Savoy, sent into Switzerland to inquire what the Vaudois were doing, says that "they have bought a great quantity of arms at Berne," and that "the Bailli of Nidenz (probably Nidau) has seized a cask, in which were found 39,000 French silver crowns." (Turin, Archives of the Court, Account of a Journey, Series, No. 298.) Another emissary sent in 1689, after the excitement occasioned by the rash enterprise of Bourgeois, says, "After reaching Lausanno I met numbers of these people of Lucerna, in scattered parties, some, but few of them, still having their muskets; almost all of them had sabres and bayonets, and some had orange-coloured ribbons on their hats." (From the same Archives, No. 258.) These last words prove that they had placed themselves, as it were, under the special protection of the Prince of Orange, now William III.

France. The hostility of William III. against Louis XIV. was well known; war was on the point of being declared between France and Germany; and it was evident enough that the pretended alliance between the French monarch and the Duke of Savoy was for the latter merely an oppressive vassalage. The Vaudois, with good reason, judged that now was the moment to act. Janavel repeated his instructions to them, and they set forth.

Before relating the history of this heroic expedition, and in order not to interrupt the narrative, I must here mention that the officer who was to have taken the military direction of it—Captain Bourgeois, a native of Neuchâtel—not having been able to get in time to the rendezvous, gathered together some others, who were also too late, who, being joined by a troop of French refugees, they all proceeded to follow the first expedition, but mistook their way in Savoy, and betaking themselves to pillage, disbanded and returned to Geneva, where the gates of the city were closed against them; and at last the leader of this unlucky expedition was not only cast off by all, but expiated on the scaffold the almost ridiculous reverses of his unfortunate ambition.¹

As to the first troop, whose marvellous exploits exalt its history to the rank of an epic poem, it had many difficulties to overcome ere it could render that a matter of admiration which had appeared to most persons to be folly. The faith of its members had to triumph before their arms; and the protection of God, whose hand lifts up or casts down at pleasure, after they had been rendered great by trials, established them again in the humble heritages of their fathers. But before commencing this narrative of heroic deeds, I shall here lay before the reader the instructions of Janavel²:—

“My very dear brethren in Jesus Christ,—The Lord not permitting me to accompany you, because of my infirmity, which I very much regret, I think it my duty to neglect nothing which can be for the good of my poor country; and therefore I have caused my opinions to be put in writing,¹ concerning the course which you must pursue, both as to your routes, and your method of proceeding in attacks and combats, if the Lord favours you so far as to carry you to your own mountains, as my hope is that he will. I pray God, with all my heart, that he may make all succeed to his own glory, and for the restoration of his church. If our church has been reduced to so great an extremity, it is our sins that have been the cause. It behoves us, then, every day to humble ourselves more and more before the Lord, . . . and when any mishap occurs to you, be patient, and redouble your courage, so that there shall be nothing firmer than your faith."

¹ There are a very great number of documents in existence concerning this affair. I cannot quote them in any other way than merely by pointing out where they may be found. Archives of the Council of State of Geneva, minutes of sittings of 2d and 3d, 6th and 7th, 10th and 11th, 16th and 17th, 18th and 23th September, 1689. Archives of Berne, compartment D.—Archives of State at Turin, files marked Valdesi and Religionarii.—Private Archives of M. LOMBARD-ODIER at Geneva; M. MONASTIER, at Lausanne, &c.—See also the Mercure Historique, t. vii. p. 1047, et seq.

² This paper is in the Archives of State at Turin, inscribed upon the back as follows:—“Istruzione data alli ribelli delle valli di Luserna, che vi sono ritornati nel anno 1689, della maniera che devono resolarsi nelle marchie e combatti.” I cannot quote the whole of it, for it occupies eighteen quarto pages. At the end of the twelfth page are the following words, “The author of this paper, who is Captain Janavel, says nothing which he has not put to the proof himself.” Larger extracts from it have been given in L’Echo des Vallées, second year, Nos. 4, 5, and 6.

Such is the beginning of a military proclamation, which looks like a religious discourse; such is the language of this aged warrior, famous for unequalled intrepidity; such were the sentiments of faith, humility and prayer, under the influence of which was commenced the most adventurous career of heroism and peril upon which patriotic courage had ever entered.

But human prudence regarded all hope of success as chimerical. "What probability is there," said the journals of the time,² "that the Vaudois will be able to get back to their own country, without their passage being opposed, and their being utterly destroyed? How are they to contend against the forces of France and Piedmont, which press upon them on both sides? No, it is impossible for them to return thither without perishing, let them take what precautions they may, and on this point the court of Savoy may rest secure." They did return, however; and the precautions which Janavel pointed out to them to take, were these:—

"When you are come into the country of the enemy, seize two or three men of the place where you happen to be." These were to serve as hostages, and to open for them a way into the places into which they were afterwards to pass. "You will treat them," said he, "with all the tenderness possible." He then recommends the Vaudois to abstain from all disorder, to pay for all that they demand, and to make prayer morning and evening.³ "When you shall have arrived in the valleys, . . . if you should be no more than 600 or 700 men, you must attack at once the valley of Lucerna and that of St. Martin. . . . You will always keep sentinels posted at the summits of the mountains, that you may not be surprised from the side of Pragela, and in order to keep the passes free from one valley to another." He recommends that, amongst others, they should carefully guard the Col Julian; and also that they should have in each valley a place fixed beforehand, "a place of sure retreat, which," says he, "shall be in the valley of Lucerna, Balmadant, L'Aiguille, and the Combe of Giansarand, where was the most ancient retreat of our fathers—in that of St. Martin, La Balciglia."¹ "Spare no labour nor pains," says he, "in fortifying this post, which will be your most secure fortress. Do not quit it unless in the utmost extremity. . . . You will, of course, be told that you cannot hold it always, and that rather than not succeed in their object, all France and Italy will gather together against you. . . . But were it the whole world, and only yourselves against all, fear ye the Almighty alone, who is your protection."

¹ It is evident that this paper was written by an amanuensis, for the writing is in a bold and current hand, whilst the writing of Janavel (if we may judge by eleven lines written by his own hand at the end of the letter which he addressed to the Vaudois in 1685), was large, like that of a child, slow, hesitating, tremulous, and difficult to read.

² Mercure historique, t. vii. pp. 739, 806, 807.—Gazette of Leyden, &c.

³ I omit, for want of space, very particular directions concerning the formation of companies, the order to be followed during the march, the arrangements to be made in halts and encampments, the manner of making or repelling an attack with advantage, &c.

"The severest penalties," he adds, must be inflicted upon any one who abandons his post." "Have scouts in the level country, to keep you informed of the movements of your adversaries." "On the field of battle give quarter to no one; for how will you keep prisoners? You can neither employ your men to guard them, nor your provisions to feed them; and upon leaving you, they will make known your position to the enemy." But on all occasions, he earnestly goes on, take care above all things "to spare innocent blood, or blood which there is no need to shed, that you may not have it to answer for before God; and in particular, see that you never allow yourselves to be seized with fear or with anger; for if you put your trust in the Lord, be assured that he will never forget you, and that his sword will be around you as a wall of fire against your enemies."²

The combined moderation and energy of this language, which seemed to breathe at once the solemn calmness of the patriarchs and the animating confidence of the prophets, was well calculated to sustain the Vaudois in their patriotic efforts. With the noble simplicity of the mountaineer was united a character of greatness and affecting self-renunciation, which is sought for in vain in men of the highest fame. It is also a very rare thing for a people tossed amidst the vicissitudes of a peculiar fate, and especially when these are the result of some great religious crisis, or when the immediate irritation of an unjust war is experienced, not to abandon themselves to extravagance and cruelty. The Camisards had their ecstatic persons—the Anabaptists their visionary prophets—all parties have made reprisals when they became victorious. Amongst the Vaudois there was nothing of the kind; liveliness of faith was associated with the soundest views; they were directed by a sort of calm temerity; and if there is anything in which they can be blamed, it is upon account of what, according to human estimate, might be called their excess of good faith, for almost all their errors arose from their too easily believing the word of their enemies. But if this respect for truth did them some harm in the world, it appears to their honour in history. The events now to be recorded form one of the most brilliant phases of their history. Reasonable even in passion, they accomplished the greatest things, their enthusiasm never making them forego prudence, nor misfortune shaking their firmness. In their difficult course, as they marched on amidst tempest after tempest, with a countenance always calm and resolute, courage and moderation attended all their steps. This character merits for them a place by themselves in history, and it may be said that Janavel made it for them. The severe stamp of exile renders nobler still the aspect of this noble old man, who, like Moses, led the tribes of his people to the boundaries of the promised land, the land of their forefathers, without being permitted to enter it himself. We are now to see how his compatriots made their way thither.

¹ It is now written Balsille, more anciently it was written Balseigla, and in the orders of the day of the French army which came to attack the Vaudois there, this post is named the Fort of the Three Teeth, or the Rock of the Three Beaks.

² These expressions are exactly copied from the manuscript of Janavel, but are taken from passages of greater length.

CHAPTER III.

THE GLORIOUS RETURN OF THE VAUDOIS, UNDER THE CONDUCT OF ARNAUD,¹ AND ACCORDING TO THE DIRECTIONS OF JANAVEL.²

(AUGUST TO SEPTEMBER, 1689.)

The Vaudois assemble on the shore of the Lake of Geneva, and embark by night—

The precautions employed to divert attention from their proceedings—Numbers, however, arrested by the Swiss governments—The embarkation—Arnaud and Turrel, leaders of the expedition—The march begun—The pastor Chyon taken prisoner—The Vaudois seize hostages—They pass without impediment by Yvoire, Viu, and St. Joire—A show of opposition at Cluse is soon overcome—They carry the bridge at Salanches by force—They pass over the mountains of Le Praz and Haute Luce—Sufferings from incessant rain—The Col Bonhomme—Scez—St. Foi—Mount Iseran—They capture a cardinal's equipages—Sufferings in crossing Mount Cenis—Combat with the garrison of Exilles—Some fall behind through fatigue and exhaustion, and are taken prisoners—Combat and victory at Salabertrans—The exiles obtain the first view of their native mountains—They arrive at the Balsille—A half company of Piedmontese soldiers taken prisoners and put to the sword—Public worship at Pral—Victory at the Col Julian—Public worship and solemn covenant on the hill of Sibaoud.

It was during the night between the 16th and 17th of August, 1689, that the Vaudois embarked on the Lake of Geneva, in order to pass from Switzerland into Savoy, and so to proceed to their own

¹ I have retained in the title of this chapter the name of Arnaud, which is connected in so particular a manner with the return of the Vaudois, that I could not but think myself bound to respect a reputation so long established in this matter.

But I am compelled as a historian to reduce the magnitude of the part taken by him in this expedition, of which the plan was due to Janavel, and the active direction to General Turrel (at least until it had reached the valleys), and of which the account was written by the youthful Reynaudin. Arnaud, who was the editor of this narration, modified it a little.

² AUTHORITIES.—Almost exclusively “The Glorious Return” [La Glorieuse Rencontre] of ARNAUD, and the various readings of the original MS. of that work, deposited in the Royal Library at Berlin.—Also, “Rélation en abrégé de ce qui s’est passé de plus remarquable dans le retour des Vaudois au Piémont, depuis le 16 août 1689, jusqu’au 15 juillet 1690; ce qui a été fidèlement rapporté par des personnes qui ont été eux-mêmes dans diverses actions, qui sont ici rapportées, de nouveau. A la Haye chez Olivier Le Franc.” 1690. (It would seem from this title, that this little work had already reached its second edition.)—“Nouvelle relation en abrégé ou histoire de ce qui s’est passé de plus remarquable aux vallées de Piémont, depuis le 15 juillet 1690 jusqu’au mois de février 1691.” Published as a sequel to the preceding pamphlet.—“Rélation véritable de ce qui s’est passé entre l’armée française et les Piémontais et Vaudois, dans les vallées de Luserne, depuis le 15 août jusqu’au 22 du même mois 1690.” La Haye; a small 4to pamphlet of eight pages. (All these pamphlets show how great an interest was taken in distant places in the extraordinary expedition of the Vaudois.)—See also the journals of the period; the Gazettes of Leyden, of France, and of England; Mercurie historique, &c.

native valleys. There is near the town of Nyon a forest of oaks, called the wood of Prangins, which covers with its venerable trees a number of little hills, includes a number of shady hollows, and descends with a steep declivity to the waves of the Leman. Here it was that the Vaudois, faithful to their patriotic design, had agreed not to await one another, but rather to meet at once; for it was necessary that the forest should seem to be unoccupied¹ and by no means to be their mustering place, that so all the members of the expedition might assemble in it without impediment, from all places in the neighbourhood, between nine and ten o'clock in the evening. A great number of Vaudois were therefore already prepared to set out, and were concealed in the vicinity, whilst no one was to be seen in the wood of Prangins, where they took care not to show themselves, that attention might not be drawn to that important spot.

For two months the refugees had made their preparations for departure. Those who were scattered in the most distant parts of Switzerland, and even as far as the utmost boundaries of Bavaria, Wurtemberg, and the Palatinate, were apprised that a new attempt to regain possession of their country was about to be undertaken from the shores of Lake Leman. They therefore made every arrangement beforehand, in order to be there. Domestic, hired labourers, and artisans disengaged themselves in the quietest possible way from their employments; the workers in manufactories provided themselves with arms; every one did the best he could to secure a supply for the wants of his poor family, which he was to leave in exile, whilst he went to win back for them the land of their fathers.² But the dangers were very great; each might perish in this great enterprise; the necessary silence concealed many a painful farewell.

More than eight days before the time appointed, the Vaudois began their journeys. They required to use many precautions, in order to traverse the confederate states without exciting suspicion. Marching by night, and sleeping by day, seeking by-paths and the shadow of woods, they carefully avoided appearing in numerous groups. They met one another without speaking; a significant look sufficed to make them understand one another. They were, moreover, unacquainted with the plan of the expedition; no order had been given them, nothing precise was known; one single idea guided them, that of returning to their own native land.

¹ Suspicious were entertained of the project of the Vaudois. The federal patrols passed and repassed several times through the forest of Prangins; a descent was made upon it on the 13th of August, with the view of apprehending the Vaudois who might be surprised there, but nobody was found.

(Report of the bailli of Nyon on the departure of the Vaudois. Archives of Berne, compartment D.) In another report, it is said that the forest was empty on the 16th at sunset, but in the course of three or four hours it was filled with Piedmontese. (Same source.)

² These brief notices express the general import of a multitude of details contained in private letters and contemporary reports, too numerous to be all cited here.

However, their successive disappearance from the places where they had been cantoned, awakened attention. Reports passed from one quarter to another, and multiplied. Friday, the 15th of August, was a fast-day for the whole of Switzerland. In the afternoon, just as the people were assembling for worship, the bailli of Morges was apprised that 400 Vaudois had been seen hidden amongst the bushes below the bridge of Allamand.¹ He caused notice to be given to the militia of the neighbouring districts, and next day he arrested 100 of these fugitives, but eighty-three succeeded in making their escape. Others were reported to the authorities at Rolle, Ursine, and Peroi.

On the same day the boatmen of Ouchy presented themselves before the bailli of Lausanne.² "Some of the Lucernese," said they, "have asked us to transport them to Savoy in our boats, but we did not think proper to do it without acquainting you." "You have done very well," said the magistrate, "for I can by no means authorize you. But are these people numerous?" "Nearly 180." "Where do they wait for you?" "They are concealed in two barns near Vidy." The magistrate sent a major to persuade the Vaudois to retire. This envoy took possession of three boats which they had already brought together, and in one of which were found fifty muskets. "Next day," says the bailli in his report, "I learned that, about midnight, 500 men, marching very quickly and in silence, had passed Romanel, proceeding towards the lake." These 500 men, along with the 180 who were at Vidy, were to have embarked at St. Sulpice, in order to go to Nyon; but only 450 were able to embark, and 230 remained, for want of the three boats which the bailli of Lausanne had caused to be taken from them.³

¹ All these and the following particulars are taken from the Report of the bailli of Nyon, and from another report, entitled "Information véritable de ce qui est arrivé dans le baillage de Nyon pour le trajet des Piémontais, de la conduite qu'ils ont tenue," &c. . . . (Archives of Berne.) This report commences thus:—"On the 9th of July, 1689, their excellencies of Berne informed me that the Piedmontese, following out their obstinate design of returning to their own country, &c. . . ." Other letters, some of which are dated even as far back as the 10th of May, attest the movement already taking place among the Vaudois, and the attention which they had excited. (See the Archives of the Council of State of Geneva, sittings of 10th and 28th May, 1689.)

² The name of this bailli was Sturler. His report is dated 16th August, 1689. (Archives of Berne.)

³ Same document, compared with other reports (also in the Archives of Berne).

"To-day," continues he, under date the 16th, "my colleague of Morges has sent his son to tell me that he has discovered other Vaudois in the neighbourhood of Aubonne, that the bailli of Nyon has already put the people of his district under arms, and that it is necessary to prevent these unfortunate people from passing into Savoy, where certain destruction awaits them."¹ In the canton of Uri, 122 Piedmontese, coming from the Grisons, had already been arrested.² Of those who succeeded in reaching the common rendezvous, 200 were still unable to cross the lake, because out of fourteen boats in which their brethren had crossed, only three consented to renew the voyage.³

The federal militia of the canton had been convoked for the 14th, to oppose the project of the Vaudois; but the previous evening was that of a religious solemnity⁴ always most devoutly observed in Switzerland. All military measures were put off to the 16th and 17th. Then it was too late. In the intervening night, as the first stars arose, the forest of Prangins, where all had been stillness until sunset, was suddenly peopled with 1000 or 1200 men, who descended from the heights, ascended from the ravines, arose out of the coppices, and, as if in obedience to some silent signal, concentrated themselves, with admirable unity of purpose, on the solitary bank of the Leman.

Fifteen boats had been gathered together there. The pastor Arnaud⁵ made a fervent prayer, to implore the Divine protection for these banished men. "The young seigneur of Prangins, who, as well as many others, happened to be there from curiosity, after having listened on his knees to the prayer of the pastor, immediately mounted his horse, and rode all night to Geneva, to give information to the French resident of the enterprise of the Vaudois." In consequence of this information, orders were forwarded to Lyons to cause the cavalry to march towards Savoy, to destroy this audacious troop. But the Vaudois took care to keep out of the reach of their attacks. Ascending the rivers to their sources, in order to avoid the populous towns, and following the crest of the mountains

¹ Still extracted from the despatch of the bailli of Lausanne. See also the report of the bailli of Nyon, and a despatch of the governor of the castle of Rolle, dated 16th August, 1689. (Archives of Berne.)

² ARNAUD, p. 37. BEATTIE, Vaudois Valleys, Pict. p. 121.

³ ARNAUD, p. 141. In the original MS. it is also said that it was not deemed prudent to wait for a third voyage, as the dawn of day began to appear.

⁴ Feuille du jour de l'an, offerte à la Suisse romande, par la réunion lausannoise de l'union fédérale. No. III. p. 5. To this sheet is annexed a lithograph, remarkable as a composition, which represents the departure of the Vaudois at the moment when, assembled on the bank, they listen to the prayer of their pastor.

⁵ Arnaud, pp. 40, 41.

from glacier to glacier and from precipice to precipice, in deep chasms or on lofty peaks, they kept themselves out of the way of the combined forces of France and Piedmont, which vainly endeavoured to intercept their passage.

"The sheriff Devigne," adds a despatch dated on that same day, "arrived at the forest of Prangins at the moment when 300 Vaudois had already crossed the lake. There still remained about 700 of them. He addressed them with exhortations and threats, to keep them from going; but they replied to him by good reasons, by entreaties, and even by letting him see that they intended to make resistance,¹ so that, in these circumstances, not being sufficiently strong for them, he allowed them to do as they chose, and saw them depart in thirteen boats."² All the members of the expedition had crossed the lake by two o'clock in the morning.³ The sky was covered with clouds, and a drizzling rain fell. During their passage, a gust of wind separated the boats, but those which were carried out of their way were compensated by meeting with a small bark from Geneva, with eighteen of their brethren, who also had come in compliance with the call to return and take possession of their native land. As soon as the first who disembarked set foot upon the shores of Savoy, Arnaud posted sentinels in all directions; and, with the exception of those who were thus occupied, the Vaudois, waiting until they should all be united again, gathered together beneath a tree on the bank of the lake, longing and praying for the prompt arrival of their brethren who were still on the other side.⁴ One of the boats, however, which had been dispersed by the wind, was driven so far out of its course, that it did not reach the land until daybreak. The men whom it conveyed rejoined the troop when already on the march and in military organization.

Janavel had said, "First of all, it is most requisite that you should, every one of you, kneel down upon the ground, and lifting up your eyes and your hands to heaven, your heart and soul to the Lord, earnestly pray that he would give you his Holy Spirit, . . . and cause you to name those who are best qualified among you to be leaders of the rest."⁵ The whole body composing the expedition

¹ Here we have the first proof of the calm intrepidity which marked the conduct of the Vaudois in this expedition.

² Letter of the governor of the castle of Rolle to the bailli of Nyon, 16th Aug. (Archives of Berne.)

³ This, and the following particulars, are extracted from the original manuscript of the Return of the Vaudois, many passages of which have been left out of the published work.

⁴ Original MS. of the Return, p. 42. Royal Library of Berlin.

⁵ Istruzione data alli ribelli, &c. . . . (Archives of Turin), a document already quoted.

was divided into nineteen companies, each having a captain and a sergeant.¹ The commander-in-chief was to have been that leader of the later expedition, who has been already mentioned;² but as he had not succeeded in making his appearance at the rendezvous, a compatriot of M. Arnaud, Captain Turrel,³ a native of Die, was

¹ In the original manuscript of the Return, the following sentence occurs: "As of these captains some were killed, and some were taken prisoners during the march, and others deserted, new ones were substituted for them, or their companies were incorporated, as circumstances required."

² BOURGEOIS of Neuchâtel. (ARNAUD, Return, p. 45.)

³ This being brought forward as a fact entirely new, I think it requisite to state the proofs upon which it rests. The following is an extract from the original manuscript of the Return, deposited at Berlin (Royal Library, No. —), p. 42:—"When all had arrived, they proceeded to form a body, of which one Bourgeois of Neuchâtel was to have been commander. He did not make his appearance at the rendezvous; we shall not here say upon what account, having in the further course of this history to speak at sufficient length concerning him. I shall satisfy myself with mentioning that the post of honour which had been designed for him was given to the Sieur TURREL, a refugee of Die, in whose courage and military experience the people had sufficient confidence to declare him commander-in-chief; yet so that he should not be able to determine anything without the concurrence of a council of war, composed of the captains, and especially without conferring with M. Arnaud, who had his eye upon all, and who was to him as a colleague associated in the command." This passage, which itself assigns to Arnaud's influence a very honourable part, was suppressed by him in the publication. It cannot be restored to its place in the history without producing some modification of the generally received ideas concerning the military arrangements of this expedition. Let us see whether facts and analogies are in favour of its retention or of its suppression.

Arnaud allows us to think that he was himself the general-in-chief of the Vaudois army, without, however, anywhere saying that this rank had been conferred upon him; whilst it is probable that he would not have left us to mere inference if he had been formally invested with it.

But can we suppose that he has passed over in silence a fact so important, if, indeed, true? And have we, without the testimony of Arnaud, proofs sufficient to establish it? These two questions merit separate examination.

A.—I would have hesitated to believe that, upon any account, Arnaud would have kept unfair silence concerning the general, Turrel, of whom my readers probably have never met with any notice until now, if I had not found in this author other instances of the same kind of suppression. There can be no doubt of the very important part taken by Janavel in this expedition, yet Arnaud never speaks of him, except in page 175, where he does so as if this illustrious exile had remained a complete stranger to the enterprise of the Vaudois. He was, however, a party to it, as may be certainly learned from the records of the Council of State of Geneva; nay, he directed it, for his instructions have been discovered, and they were followed in every particular. Arnaud could not be ignorant of them, for he was himself called to execute them, and a copy of them was appended to the journal of the expedition, of which he afterwards became the editor. Hence I conclude that Arnaud's silence is not enough to cause the rejection of the passage quoted at the beginning of this note.

B.—But is that passage sufficient to establish the fact omitted by this writer? In the first place, let us observe that the Vaudois required to have a leader: I think it needless to stop to prove it. Moreover, they could not confide their destinies to any leader but one whose military capacity was already recognized; and it would have been at least extraordinary if for that office they had chosen a chosen in his stead. The Vaudois, before commencing their march, offered up a short but fervent prayer to the Lord, to implore his pastor.* Arnaud himself does not say that he was this leader; but as he plainly names himself whenever he mentions a fact which concerns himself, even when it is of small historic value, we are compelled to seek for the reason of the vague expressions which he employs when he speaks of an important resolution, a decisive order, a great military movement, or the like; for then he makes use only of indeterminate forms of expression, as, THERE WAS MADE, IT WAS RESOLVED, IT WAS DECIDED, &c.; from which I think it may be reasonably concluded, that in the latter case the indefinite expression refers to the commander-in-chief or the council of war, whilst the personal mention of Arnaud must have been reserved for those things which he could reasonably ascribe in a positive manner to himself.

Besides, he was separated from the Vaudois army at different times during the expedition (xviiith day; Return, Second Part, from p. 166 to p. 200), which could not have taken place without a delegation of the command, or without disorders, of which there is no indication.

C.—What motives could Arnaud have had for suppressing in his narrative the name of General Turrel? It seems probable that it was from prudential considerations, and in order to draw a veil over the desertion and dishonourable death of that leader, whom Arnaud mentions only as a simple captain, that he has kept silence concerning the high position which the Vaudois had accorded to him; for after having conducted them into their native country, Turrel abandoned them, in the belief that their cause was desperate (pp. 154-156). He was then succeeded by P. Odin, with the title of major-general. (Id. pp. 265-392.)

It appears to me, therefore, that we may regard as proved—1st, That Arnaud was not from the first the military leader of the Vaudois (and he nowhere speaks of himself as having been so). 2d, That they had for some time another leader, named Turrel. 3d, That Arnaud was at first merely one of three pastors, destined to perform the functions of the gospel ministry during this expedition. (The two others were Montoux and Chyon; but from the seventh day both of them were prisoners.) 4th, That being left alone, Arnaud supplied their places, with a courage and devotedness worthy of the highest praise, going from one valley to another to conduct religious services, to dispense the Lord's Supper, and to take part in councils (Return, pp. 126, 133, 161, 200, 204, &c.), and always replying with the noblest energy to those who urged him to abandon the cause of the Vaudois. (Return, pp. 233, 237, 250.) He had a right, surely, notwithstanding his foreign origin, to say, as he did say in speaking of the valleys, "We have re-conquered the land of our fathers." (Id., Preface, and p. 238.) Arnaud being obliged to withdraw from the country in 1698, returned to it in 1703 (Mercurie histor. t. xxvi. p. 141); he was provisional pastor of St. Jean in 1706 (Memoir on the present state of the Vaudois Churches, of date 27th December, 1706, in my possession), withdrew from it in 1707 (Acts of Synod of 14th February, 1708, towards the end), and was in London in 1708 (the date of his portrait by Van Somer). In 1709 he returned to Germany (Old Consistorial Records of the parish of Durmentz), blessing upon their enterprise;¹ then, as the coasts of Savoy had been furnished with troops, and they could no longer, without danger, remain in a position so exposed as that which they occupied, they set out an hour before sunrise, without awaiting the arrival of the last of their own party.²

* The only act in which the strategetic capacity of Arnaud had found opportunity of displaying itself before this period—at least, the only one which he has mentioned (Preface, p. 49)—was not of a nature to raise expectations of what he was afterwards to become. Having 400 men at his command (Relatione del succeduto, &c. . . . Archives of Turin, No. of the series 300), he found no better means of making prisoners seventy soldiers of the enemy, who were shut up in the place of worship at St. Germain, than to cause canals to be digged around the building, in order to pour in upon them a flood of water. (Return, fol. 24.) It is needless to say that they all escaped. But, in justice, it must also be stated that Arnaud afterwards gave frequent proofs of a remarkable military genius. Decision, a clear perception of the whole state of matters, courage, and resolution, were the qualities which experience rapidly developed in him, and which mark him as a distinguished warrior.

Let us now follow them in this march, keeping before us the daily record which was written by Hugues and Reynaudin,³ and to which Arnaud has attached his name. "This history," says he, "pursuing its course from mountain to mountain, sweeping over precipices, and from one valley to another, . . . must needs be rude and unpolished, but it will not therefore be the less veracious; and if it has not that refinement of language which is sought after in the present age, it will be found to contain at least the truth in its purity."⁴

At the very commencement of their march, however, the Vaudois experienced a misfortune; for one of the three pastors who accompanied them, Cyrus Chyon, having gone to seek a guide in a village to which they were near, was there seized, and conveyed to Chambéry, where he remained a prisoner until the official re-establishment of the Vaudois in their own country. Seeing that they were treated as enemies, the Vaudois immediately took measures as for war, and Turrel, their general, sent on a party to summon the little town of Yvoire to open its gates without resistance, unless it chose to be given to fire and sword. It obeyed; and, according to the particular recommendation of Janavel, the Vaudois took two hostages there, the lord of the manor, and the receiver of taxes, who were afterwards replaced by the lord of the manor of Wernier, and two other gentlemen of that part of the country.⁵ The kindness with which these hostages were treated, and the severe discipline of the Vaudois troop, very soon won for the latter the general sympathies of the people; for the common people comprehend what is noble and great with an intuition more sure than that of cultivated minds, which are often prepossessed by factitious ideas on these subjects. "May God be with you!" said many a poor peasant, taking off his and in 1710 he published the Glorious Return, twenty years after the manuscript of that work had left the hands of those by whom it was originally prepared. (See the article ARNAUD, in the Bibliography appended to the Israel of the Alps.)

¹ Various reading of the original manuscript of the Return, p. 47, in the Royal Library of Berlin.

² These particulars are taken from a Relation, printed at the Hague in 1690, an 8mo of 92 pages.

³ See the Return, first edition, pp. 216, 217 (Huc or Hugues), and p. 175 (Paul Reynaudin).

⁴ ARNAUD, Dedication; Return, fol. 12 and 13. (Not paged.—First Edition.)

⁵ MM. De Coudrées and De Fora.

hat before the band of exiles. "The parish priest of Filly opened his cellar to them, and caused them to refresh themselves, for which he would accept of no money."¹

In passing the Col de Voirons, they obtained a last view of those peaceful banks of the Lake of Geneva, not to be contemplated by them without gratitude, where their wives and children were left under the protection of Swiss hospitality. They now drew near to the town of Viu, situated at the base of the pyramidal mountain called the Mole, and which lies in a straight line between Geneva and Chamouni. A quarter-master and the châtelain of Boège, who had been added to the number of their hostages, facilitated the entrance of the Vaudois into this town, by sending on before them the following letter:—"These people have arrived here to the number of 2000; they have asked us to accompany them, that we may be able to report concerning their conduct; and we can assure you that they conduct themselves with great moderation. They pay for everything which they take, and demand only to be allowed to pass; therefore we beg of you that you will neither sound the tocsin nor beat the drum, and that in case your people should be under arms, you will cause them to keep out of the way."² This testimony was so well confirmed by the good behaviour of the Vaudois, that there arose, says Arnaud, a sort of emulation along the line of their march, who should most promptly give them what they wanted. The country people consented to prepare beforehand provisions, horses, and waggons, in the villages through which they were to pass; and the progress of the Vaudois was not delayed by the failure of these arrangements.

They entered Viu at the close of the day; and after reposing there for two hours, they set out again by moonlight. In the little town of St. Joire, where they next arrived, the whole inhabitants came to their doors to see them pass. The magistrates placed a great cask of wine in the middle of the street, for the refreshment of the travellers. But the Vaudois did not remain there: proceeding onward, they encamped half a league from the town, on a bare and arid hill, named Carman. It was now near midnight; the day (Saturday, the 17th of August) had thus prosperously closed; they made prayer, then they posted sentinels; and the whole band, fatigued by so long a march, sought on the naked ground that repose which, in such circumstances, comes so readily to mountaineers.

Next day, about ten o'clock, they reached the banks of the Arve, opposite to the town of Cluse, then surrounded with walls. This little town seems caught in the gorge of a narrow valley—rocks sharply peaked, but clothed with shrubs, rising above the highest roofs of the houses—and resembles a vessel stranded in the hollow of the mountains. The weather was rainy; the gates of the town were closed; the peasants of the neighbourhood reviled the Vaudois, shouting from a distance. Affairs wore a threatening aspect, as if their passage was to be disputed. “Gentlemen,” said they to the hostages, “this concerns you; if they fire upon us, you shall be the first killed.” This menace was not fruitless, for M. De Fora immediately wrote to M. De La Rochette, a nobleman who dwelt in Cluse, to ask the free passage of the mountaineers. He came to their camp, along with other gentlemen, and they were detained as hostages. A Vaudois officer was sent into the town, instead of the inhabitants who were detained. “Where is your warrant?” he was asked. “At the point of our swords,” was his reply. These bold words announcing a determined resolution, it was thought best to come to terms. The Israel of the Alps passed through this place in the midst of its inhabitants, they standing under arms, and ranged along both sides of the street. Those who took charge of the commissariat for the troop then caused five quintals of bread and five loads of wine to be brought out to the open country, for which they paid five louis d’or, and those from whom the articles were bought expressed themselves quite satisfied with the price.

¹ Arnaud, p. 49.

² Id. p. 51.

From Cluse to Salanches, the valley is very narrow, and the Arve, which flows through it, was swollen by the melting of the snows. At the castle of Maglan, which is situated in this part of the valley, the Vaudois took new hostages, and received information that their passage would be disputed at Salanches. The dark apprehensions which arise from the hostility of men, began to assail them in the midst of majestic scenes of nature; such, for example, as the two remarkable cascades of Nant d’Urli and Nant d’Arpénas, by which they passed. The road was toilsome; the rain continued to fall; the hostages complained of their hardships; but the exiles marched on without intermission.

A bridge of wood, roofed over, is thrown across the Arve between the village of St. Martin and the city of Salanches. The Vaudois tried the effect of negotiation before attempting to cross it; but perceiving that their adversaries protracted these negotiations, in order the better to make their arrangements for resistance, they carried the bridge by force, lined it with forty soldiers, and when they had crossed it, proceeded to range themselves in order of battle over against the town, the approach to which was defended by 600 armed men. They threatened to burn it, and to kill the hostages, upon the slightest hostile movement that might be directed against them. This threat produced its effect; for the Vaudois were permitted to pass without opposition, and proceeded to encamp a league farther on, at the village of Cablan, or Colombier, where they could obtain no supplies, but which they blessed God that they had reached in safety. Thus closed their second day, the 18th of August, 1689.

Monday, the 19th, was one of the most fatiguing days of their march. Early in the morning the trumpets sounded, and a council was held as to the precautions necessary to be taken for passing over the mountain of Les Praz, and that of Haute Luce, which rise to the height of 7000 feet above the level of the sea. The village of Migève was the last place of any consequence which the Vaudois had to pass through. The inhabitants were under arms, but made no resistance. On the mountain they found some deserted hamlets, where they reposed a while, on account of the incessant rain. Here and there, in chalets which stood open, were provisions remaining, and small quantities of butter and cheese, which the troops abstained from touching. The hostages, surprised at this reserve, and not satisfied with the enforced frugality of their meals, expressed their astonishment at it, saying that, in respect of victuals, it was the custom of soldiers to take them where they found them, without any one's having a right to be offended.¹ These words, taken in connection with the neglected condition in which the shepherds had left their chalets, and, above all, the hunger which the Vaudois experienced, led them to make use of the provisions which were thus left behind, although they would have been most anxious to have paid for them, if any of the owners had been there to have received the price.

Their strength and courage being thus revived, the Vaudois descended the slope of Les Praz, and proceeded to climb the mountain of Haute Luce, one of the steepest and most desolate over which they had to pass. This mountain, then flooded by the rains, enveloped in clouds, covered with snow, or deeply cleft by impassable precipices, presented many difficulties.² The guide lost his way. Persons were sent out on all sides to find some peasants who might act in his stead; but it was soon perceived that these Savoyards were leading the Vaudois troop by the longest and most dangerous routes. Arnaud threatened them with the gibbet if they deviated from the proper way; and by his exhortations re-animated the courage of the exhausted troops. "If it is difficult to ascend a steep mountain" adds he in his own narrative, "everybody knows that it is equally difficult to descend; and in this case the descent could not be accomplished in any other way than by every man either sitting down or lying on his back, and so letting himself slide, as it were, to the bottom of a precipice, and this with no other light than that which was caused by the whiteness of the snow."

¹ Arnaud, p. 67.

² Beattie, p. 136. (See the Bibliography, Part I. sect. 5, § III. No. IV.)

It was not without great exertion that these intrepid travellers arrived, in the middle of the night, at a miserable hamlet, called St. Nicholas De Vérose, where they found no better shelter than that of some empty stables. Situated in a funnel, formed by frightful mountains, this place, deep as an abyss, and desert and cold as a tomb, is the resort only of a few shepherds, who spend two months of the summer in these occasional abodes. The Vaudois were obliged to take wood from the roofs of the ruinous huts to warm themselves a little. But this was only a feeble resource, for the rain, which continued to fall, reached them all the more easily, and made their stay there the more disagreeable.

Next day, being Tuesday, the 20th of August, their impatience to leave a place so unpleasant, and apprehension of some perfidy meditated by the Savoyards, made the Vaudois set out earlier than usual. They now bravely addressed themselves to the climbing of the Col Bonhomme, one of the highest ridges of Mont Blanc, "having," say they, "the rain on our backs, and the snow to our knees."¹ At the summit of this mountain is a long and almost level vale, named the Ladies' Plain [Plan des Dames]. Here the Vaudois would have arrived in the preceding year, entering upon it by the Col de la Seigne, if they had succeeded in carrying into effect their project, which failed at Bex, of returning to their own country. Since that time this pass had been fortified, in anticipation of a new attempt to be made by the exiles to return. Of this they had been apprised, and they expected a keen resistance. But the Piedmontese government, weary of keeping troops at so disadvantageous a post, had withdrawn them some time before, and the exile pilgrims, marching towards their native land, returned thanks to God for having smoothed for them a route already so fatiguing, by removing this formidable obstacle out of their way.

They then descended to the banks of the Isère, near its source, and were compelled to cross it several times, by stepping from rock to rock in its channel. Near St. Maurice they found a bridge barricaded, the passage of which seemed likely to be disputed with them by peasants armed with forks: this was not a serious obstacle; but the Count of Val Isère, having held a colloquy with the Vaudois, caused the bridge to be cleared, and they then crossed it without resistance. Towards evening they encamped near the little town of Scez, the inhabitants of which at first, by a violent sounding of the tocsin, manifested a disposition to oppose them, but afterwards brought them provisions in abundance.

¹ Narrative of the Return, Arnaud, p. 71.

On the following day, being the fifth day of their march, they made prayer, and removed their camp before the dawn; but they found on the route nothing except deserted hamlets. The Vaudois were obliged to go as far as the town of St. Foi before they could halt and obtain some refreshment. There they were received with so much politeness, and endeavour to oblige, that this welcome even appeared suspicious. The principal people of the town earnestly urged them to stay there and recruit their strength—a deceitful proposal, to which those amongst them who were most fatigued listened with satisfaction. Arnaud, who was then in the rear, perceiving that the troop did not advance, proceeded to the foremost ranks, caused them to resume their march, and even retained in the number of the hostages some of those dangerous pretended friends, who would at least have made them lose time, which was precious to them, if they did not also seek to catch them in some fatal snare. On that day they encamped at Laval, where, for the first time for eight days, Arnaud and Montoux had at last the enjoyment of a sleep of some hours, on a bed in the village.

On Thursday, the 22d of August, they passed through the little town of Tignes, and climbed Mount Iseran, where the shepherds supplied them with a repast of milk and other produce of the dairy, warning them, however, that there were troops in waiting for them at the base of Mount Cenis. This news, far from intimidating the exiles, augmented their ardour. They reorganized their companies, appointed a few officers, and again set out on their march. Passing over the summits of a chain situated between Le Faucigny, La Tarentaise, and La Maurienne, they descended to Bonneval, a pleasant town in the valley of the Arc, where they met with a friendly reception. This was not the case, however, at the next village, named Bessas, where they took some hostages, and near to which they encamped, in a vast basin of the mountains, where they were exposed to an incessant rain all night.

The seventh day of their march was signalized by an unexpected capture which they made on Mount Cenis. The equipages of Cardinal Angelo Banuzzi, who was proceeding to Rome to attend the conclave which resulted in the election of Pope Alexander VIII., fell into the hands of the Vaudois, who took possession only of the horses and mules of the convoy; but the cardinal, disquieted by the delay of his baggage, believed it to be lost; and as it contained important papers, the Papists pretend that he died of grief upon that account.

"What the Vaudois suffered in passing the Great and the Little Mount Cenis," says Arnaud,¹ "surpasses imagination. The ground was covered with snow; they had to descend the mountain of Tourliers rather by a precipice than by a road; and, to complete their misery, night having surprised them, numbers of them remained scattered on the mountain, overcome with fatigue and sleep." However, they re-assembled on the following day, the 24th of August, in the little and sterile valley of the Gaillon, which is closed in like an amphitheatre by encircling mountains, which meet towards the bottom, and seem to leave the traveller no way of egress. Nevertheless, the Vaudois troop ascended the mountains; but the soldiers of the garrison of Exilles were there in ambuscade, and overthrew the advanced guard, by rolling down rocks, flinging grenades, and taking off by their musketry every one who pressed forward. It was here that Captain Pellenc was made prisoner.

The Vaudois having therefore been compelled to descend again into the amphitheatre of the Gaillon, where they might all have been shut in and destroyed without possibility of escape, now resolved to retrace their steps. For this purpose it was necessary for them to ascend again the steep slope of the mountain of Tourliers, in order to turn by the heights the corps which obstructed their progress. But this ascent soon became so painful, that the hostages, falling upon the ground in weariness, exhaustion, and despair, entreated as a favour that they would take their lives, rather than drag them any farther. Numbers of the mountaineers themselves stopped on the way, overcome by fatigue and the insurmountable difficulties which they encountered in their progress. Amongst these were two surgeons, of whose presence and services the Vaudois troop was thus deprived. One of them, named Malanot, remained for four days in a hole of the rock, living only on the water which flowed close by. Being then no longer able to rejoin the expedition, he was made prisoner, and conducted to Suza, and afterwards to Turin, and did not recover his liberty till after a detention of nine months. The other surgeon, whose name was Muston, was seized within the French confines, and conducted to Grenoble, and thence to the galleys, where he remained till his death. "By his constancy and firmness in so long a martyrdom," says Arnaud,² "he merits a place in this history."

The Vaudois having at last reached the summit of the mountain of Tourliers, sounded their clarions, to gather together those who had fallen behind, and those who had wandered. The main body waited there for two hours; many were still awaiting; but at last, says Arnaud, as they found that they could not wait longer without danger, "they consoled themselves with the thought that it is not by might, nor by skill, nor by number of men that God executes his marvellous designs; and so, calling upon his name, they resumed their march."

¹ P. 87.

² P. 92.

In a very short time they perceived through the mist a body of men, who marched, with drums beating, upon a ridge of the mountain towards which they were directing their steps. The leader of this troop was the commandant of Exilles. "Hold to the right," said he to the Vaudois by a note, "and you will be permitted to pass; but if not, and if you are determined to force the position which I occupy, I demand eight hours for deliberation." These eight hours would only have afforded him the means of putting himself in a condition of defence; but as he offered them a passage, the Vaudois accepted it, trusting to his word. However, they soon observed that he was following them at a distance at the head of his troops; and presuming that the passage conceded to them had no other object than to lead them into a new ambuscade, where they would have been between two fires, they wheeled about, and summoned these troops to retire. The troops obeyed the summons; but farther on, near Salabertrans, the Vaudois asking a peasant if they would be able to obtain provisions in that place, received the reply, "Go on! go on! they are preparing you a good supper there!"

These words increased their suspicions, and made them expect a combat. They were already within sight of the mountains whose vast slopes line the long valley of the Doire, so deep, and yet of such majestic extent. When they came in sight of this river, half a league from the bridge of Salabertrans, they saw thirty-six bivouac fires burning in the plain. Supposing that a company of soldiers might be gathered around each of these fires, they concluded from these indications that they were in presence of a camp of more than 2000 men. However, they kept on their course; but the advanced guard very soon fell in with the outposts of the enemy, and lost five men. No longer doubting that they must fight, they made prayer to God, asking not life but victory. The action commenced by an engagement of sharpshooters. After an hour and a half's firing, there was a sort of tacit armistice—a moment's respite—during which the Vaudois held a council as to what they should do.¹ Night had now come on; the weather was cloudy, and it became very dark. The council of war decided that they should form themselves into three attacking parties, one at the end of the bridge, a second up the river, and the third farther down.

¹ These and the following particulars are taken, not from the work of Arnaud,

The troops defending the passage were French; their commander was M. De Larrey, and he occupied the end of the bridge with his best soldiers. "I was one of the advanced guard," says one of the Vaudois combatants. "We approached from the river, on the left of the bridge: at the same instant arrived 200 men, who fired on us in the darkness of the night. Three of our men were killed. We mounted again by the right, and sustained a new discharge. Then our brigade rushed towards the bridge, where, after having fired some shots, as we saw the enemy approaching, we flung ourselves on our bellies upon the ground, and a terrible discharge passed over us, without doing us any harm. We then rose up, sabre in hand, exclaiming to the rear-guard, 'Forward! the bridge is won!'"¹ The Vaudois of the centre instantly rushed on after these brave combatants. The bridge was still covered with the enemy's troops; but the two wings of the Vaudois army concentrated their fire on the decisive point. M. De Larrey was wounded in the arm. He retired from the field of battle, where it was impossible to have a proper examination as to the seriousness of the wound. His troops hesitated, and felt themselves to be without a leader. "Forward! forward!" exclaimed the Vaudois again. An electric impulse passed like lightning through their ranks, and hurried them all towards the bridge. The wings then bent in upon the centre; all rushed eagerly forward; nothing could resist that impetuous mass, and they crossed the bridge.

"But on the other side there was a wall, and rather than abandon it, the French suffered themselves to be cut down with the sabre, and their dead bodies heaped above one another. Their cavalry continually fired on us. Other soldiers, coming from Salaberrans, surprised us, attacking us at the same time in the rear."² Arnaud and Mondon repulsed them, whilst the rest of their little army pressed eagerly on to the camp of the French. Driven on by those who came last across the bridge, those who were in front could not stop, and burst, ere they were aware, through the ranks of the enemy. Courageous and excited, they pierced from one side but from an unpublished letter, written by a Vaudois of the expedition, and preserved at Berne. (State Archives, file D.)

¹ These particulars are taken from a very rare little work, with a very long title: Relation de ce qui s'est passé de plus remarquable dans le retour des Vaudois . . . Par un soldat de l'expédition, &c. . . . La Haye, 1690, an 18mo of 92 pages. The present quotation is from p. 10.

² Extract from the same Relation, p. 11.

to the other of the hostile army, cutting it in two; and coming upon its intrenchments, carried them at the point of the bayonet, routing all, and pursuing the fugitives until they remained masters of the plain, still smoking with discharges of artillery, bivouac fires, and bloodshed. "Never was there so violent an onset," says Arnaud;¹ "the sabres of the Vaudois broke in pieces the swords of the French, and struck multitudes of sparks from the fusils and muskets, which they used to parry the blows aimed at them." "Is it possible," exclaimed the Marquis De Larrey, "that I have lost both the battle and my honour!"

Scarcely had the Vaudois crossed the bridge, when they destroyed it. "All along the bank of the river," says an eye-witness, the gravel was strewn with dead bodies, as well of the cavalry as of the peasants and the king's soldiers."² The combat had lasted more than two hours. The French were so completely routed, that a great number of them, not knowing to what side to flee, mingled amongst the Vaudois, in the hope of being mistaken for some of them, and so saving themselves. But a circumstance, which would seem grotesque if it had been less fatal for them, caused them to be recognized, notwithstanding the darkness of the night. The Vaudois, after having taken possession of the intrenchments of their adversaries, had posted sentinels at all the avenues from it. The watchword was Angrogne [Angrogna]; and when the sentinels cried, Who goes there? these strangers, thinking to give the proper reply, mutilated the watchword in attempting to pronounce it, and only said Grogne,³ which betrayed them, and led to their death.⁴

The rising moon displayed the ground strewn with the dead. Some of the Marquis De Larrey's companies had been reduced to seven or eight men; others had lost their officers; and all were in flight towards Suza, Exilles, or Briançon. "We had only twenty-two killed, and eight wounded," says the Vaudois soldier already quoted; "of the enemy there remained 700, all killed upon the spot, and well counted, to say nothing of the wounded."⁵ The basin of the Doire was again deserted and still.

The Vaudois assembled together, and prayed. Then they took the enemy's munitions of war, all that they could bring to one place, and putting into the heap some barrels of powder, for which they had no use, they affixed to it a lighted match, and withdrew from the valley. A terrible explosion soon shook the mountains, and scattered to great distances the remains of the French camp. The exiles, re-invigorated by this peal of victory, flung their caps in the air, exclaiming, "Glory be to the God of armies, who has delivered us from the hands of our enemies!"¹

¹ P. 97.² Relation d'un soldat, p. 11.³ ['Grumbling'—an old word.]⁴ Return, p. 93.—This recalls Judges xii. 6.⁵ Relation, p. 12.

Ordinary courage would now have demanded some repose, for the Vaudois had marched on unintermittingly for three days and three nights, without proper sleep, and almost without food, sleeping only for a few hours at a time, and having for nourishment nothing but bread and water. But in the apprehension that new troops might come upon them, and take them in the rear, they resolved to set out again at once. The mountain which remained to be crossed separates the valley of the Doire from that of Pragela. The moon was up; the way was free from danger; but human strength is not unlimited, and some soldier was continually falling at the foot of a tree, overcome with fatigue and sleep. The rear-guard had much difficulty in awakening them again; and, after all, there remained some of them who were forgotten, and who were never seen more.²

Until daybreak the exiles were still occupied in climbing these wooded, steep, regular, and interminable slopes of the mountain of Sci. When the sun rose, all of them, having several times waited for and encouraged one another, were at last assembled at the summit of the mountain. It was a Sabbath morning (25th August, 1689), and from this point they beheld other mountains as high as those over which they had passed; but above their sombre crests gleamed in the far distance the glaciers of their native Alps, the radiant peaks of their own country. In the first beams of morning, the snows of these great elevations appear of a bright rose colour, and afterwards become white in the more equal light of day, whilst the silent depths of the valleys are still filled with darkness and with fogs. After so many fatigues, and so much perseverance and pain, the valiant pilgrims saw before them at last the goal of their destination. The highest parts of the valley of Pragela were spread out at their feet. Here already was one of the lands of their forefathers. They fell upon their knees, returning thanks to Heaven for having brought them within view of their native place. "O Lord, my God," exclaimed the pastor, "thou who didst bring back the sons of Jacob from the land of bondage to that of their ancestors, O God of Israel, God of our fathers! be pleased to accomplish and to bless thy work in us, thy feeble servants! May the light of the gospel never be extinguished in these mountains, where it has so long shined; and grant that our hands may rekindle it, and maintain it there. Bless our absent families! . . . And to thee alone, O heavenly Father, with Jesus thine only Son, our Saviour, and the Holy Ghost our Comforter, be honour, praise, and glory, now and for ever. Amen."

¹ Return, p. 100.

² Their number amounted to no fewer than eighty. They were taken by the French troops, and carried to Grenoble, and thence to the galleys. (Arnaud, p. 103.)

Whilst the Vaudois gave thanks to God on the mountain tops, beneath the vault of heaven, in that glorious temple, the work of nature and not of human hands, all the Catholic priests of the valley of Pragela abandoned their parishes and took to flight, on the report of the victorious return of the exiles whom they had so grievously persecuted. On the evening of that day the Vaudois encamped in the village of Jossand, at the base of the Col du Pis, which separated them from the valley of St. Martin. During the night the rain again began to fall, and next morning the troop set out at a rather later hour than usual. The Col du Pis was guarded by Piedmontese troops, who fled on the approach of the Vaudois. The latter halted at the Alpage¹ of Le Pis, and descended the mountain by night, by the light of torches, of which they found an abundant supply in the resinous branches of the pine trees and larches which grow upon these mountains.

On Tuesday, the 27th, they arrived at the Balsille, that post of defence which Janavel had most particularly pointed out to them, and which was to serve them for winter-quarters at the end of the year. A half company of the enemy was taken in this place. The Vaudois, having put to the sword the forty-six men of whom it was composed, hid their arms amongst the rocks. Next day they went to Pral, where, for the first time since their exile, they celebrated Divine service in one of the places of worship of their ancestors.

On Thursday, the 29th, they received information that the enemy awaited them at the Col Julian, and, conformably to the instructions of Janavel, which had already served them so well at Salabertrans, they divided their little army into three parts, representing the centre and two wings. Arriving at the forest of larches which clothes the mountain for two-thirds of its height, they perceived some sentinels, and soon afterwards the advanced posts of the enemy, who insultingly cried to them, "Come on! come on, ye devil's Barbets! there are more than 3000 of us, and we occupy all the posts." The Vaudois mounted to the assault, and all these posts were carried. The soldiers, lately so insolent, fled with such precipitancy and in such disorder, that they carried with them none of the warlike stores which had been provided in their intrenchments. These stores were of great value to the

¹ See note in vol. i.

Vaudois. But in this affair they had the misfortune to lose one of their captains, Joshua Mondon, who died of his wounds, and was buried next day at the hamlet of Les Paousettes, under a rock covered with clematis. They descended the mountain on the same day, and then proceeding to L'Aiguille and Sibaoud, on the 31st of August they drove out the new inhabitants of Bobi.

Next day, the 1st of September, the valley being now again their own, by the retreat of the strangers and of the enemy, who had halted at Le Villar, they judged it proper to embrace the opportunity for solemn exercises of worship. It was a Sabbath. Assembled on the hill of Sibaoud, whence there is a view of the whole basin of Bobi, they piled their arms, and beneath the shade of the great chestnut trees which crown the summit of the hill, on a carpet of alpine verdure, beside the ruins of an old castle, they enjoyed for the first time, in tranquillity, their re-conquest of their native land.

The pastor Montoux having placed the door of a house upon two rocks, ascended upon it, and from this pulpit addressed them from these words of Luke:¹ "The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it." After this sermon some arrangements were made, and then these pious and valiant patriots entered into a solemn covenant, renewing the ancient oath of union of the valleys, and embodying in it the substance of the instructions of Janavel. The following are the most important passages:—

"God, by his grace, having brought us happily back to the heritages of our fathers, to re-establish there the pure service of our holy religion—in continuance and for the accomplishment of the great enterprise which this great God of armies hath hitherto carried on in our favour—

"We, pastors, captains, and other officers, swear and promise before the living God, and on the life of our souls, to keep union and order among ourselves; and not to separate or disunite ourselves from one another, whilst God shall preserve us in life, if we should be reduced even to three or four in number; and never to treat with the enemy without participation of our council of war, &c.

"And we, soldiers, promise and swear this day before God to be obedient to the orders of our officers, and to continue faithful to them, even to the last drop of our blood.

"And we, officers, promise to take heed that all the soldiers preserve well their arms and ammunition; and especially to chas-

¹ xvi. 16.

tise very severely any of them who swear and blaspheme the holy name of God.

“And in order that union, which is the soul of all our affairs, may remain always unbroken among us, the officers swear fidelity to the soldiers, and the soldiers to the officers;

“All together promising to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to rescue, as far as it is possible for us, the dispersed remnants of our brethren from the yoke which oppresses them, that along with them we may re-establish and maintain in these valleys the kingdom of the gospel, even unto death.

“In witness whereof, we swear to observe this present engagement so long as we shall live.”

All the Vaudois, lifting up their hands to heaven, ratified by an oath this solemn covenant, when Arnaud had read it; and soon after they divided themselves into two bodies, to occupy simultaneously the valley of Lucerna and that of St. Martin. It will be recollected that Janavel, the patriarch of their armies, had recommended the occupation of both these valleys at once as indispensable to the success of their enterprise. “It will be most necessary for you to do this,” he said, “even if your number should be but small.” Their number was small, but they accomplished this object, though not without efforts, struggles, privations, and sufferings of every kind, the recital of which would fill a volume. The last of these trials alone I shall now proceed to narrate.

CHAPTER IV.

STRUGGLE OF THE VAUDOIS, IN THEIR OWN VALLEYS, AGAINST THE UNITED FORCES OF VICTOR AMADEUS II. AND
LOUIS XIV.¹

(SIEGE OF THE BALSILLE.)

(SEPTEMBER, 1689, TO JUNE, 1690.)

Expedition of the Vaudois against Le Villar—Destruction of Bobi by the enemy—The Vaudois take Rora—Their generous conduct—Hardships and privations—Their cause seems to become more desperate than ever—They are deserted by many of the French refugees—Turrel, their commander, withdraws from them in despair—Firmness and courage of Arnaud—Council of war at Rodoret—The Vaudois retire to the Balsille—Unfavourable reports of their expedition in the journals of the time—Description of the Balsille—Efforts of the Vaudois to secure provisions for winter—Corn, which has been covered with snow all winter, is reaped by the Vaudois in spring—Peter Philip Odin chosen a leader—Piety of the Vaudois—The Marquis D'Ombrailles approaches the Balsille and retires—Courageous refusal of all terms of capitulation—Death of three Vaudois captives—The Balsille assailed by Catinat and the Marquis De Parelles—Sufferings of the assailants from severity of weather—Complete failure of the attack on the fort—Renewed attack by the Marquis De Fenquière—The Vaudois retire from intrenchment to intrenchment, and at last make a wonderful retreat by night to the higher parts of the mountains—They overcome a detachment of troops at Pramol—Political events favourable to the Vaudois—Separation of Piedmont from the alliance of France—War declared against France—The Vaudois are received into favour by the Duke of Savoy—Continued struggles with the French troops.

THE Vaudois, after they had divided themselves into separate bodies, in order to occupy their principal valleys, and established a flying camp, for the purpose of maintaining freedom of communication between them, experienced many vicissitudes and trials. They signalized themselves, however, by remarkable feats of arms.

Their first expedition was against Le Villar. They seized the town; the garrison retired behind the solid walls of the convent. They approached this stronghold, rolling before them great casks and tubs, as screens to preserve them from the bullets of the enemy; but not being able to make themselves masters of it in this way, they laid siege to it, when a corps of cavalry coming from the plain compelled them to retire in disorder; Arnaud remained, with only six men, on the mountain of Vandalin, and Montoux was made prisoner.¹ The Vaudois subsequently took the convent of Le Villar, and blew it up with gunpowder.²

¹ AUTHORITIES.—The same as in the preceding chapter, with the addition of numerous documents contained in the Archives of the Court of Turin.—A special account of the attack on the Balsille was published at the Hague in 1690, with the following title:—" Rélation de l'attaque faite aux Vaudois par M. De Catinat, lieutenant général des armées de France, le 2 mai 1690."—See also the journals of the time, from which some particulars have been derived.

The enemy seized Bobi, and demolished all its houses; there did not remain, says the journal of the Return, one stone upon another.³ The Vaudois, on the other hand, burned Le Perrier,⁴ the inhabitants of which had taken flight, and laid waste the valley of Rora. The two parties thus sought mutually to deprive one another of shelter and of the means of existence; but in submitting to the hard necessity of these extreme measures, the Vaudois, faithful to the counsels of Janavel, carefully avoided the useless shedding of blood. When they took Rora, where a number of their brethren were, who had remained there under the protection of an illusive profession of the Catholic religion, they burned, indeed, the church and minister's house, where a mission of Capuchins had established themselves; but far from maltreating the missionaries, they permitted the emancipated members of their flock to re-conduct them as far as Lucerna, and to assist them in transporting thither the articles employed in their worship, and their own movables.⁵ By an honourable reciprocation of generosity, the valley of Pragela furnished the exiles with provisions.⁶ Victor Amadeus had given orders that flocks, crops, and provisions of every kind, which could afford them any resource, should be removed from the mountains.⁷

But they procured provisions by the capture of military convoys,⁸ by contributions levied from the plains,⁹ and by incursions into Dauphiny.¹⁰ The poor exiles, thus re-occupying their native country, gathered in also, in the intervals of their combats, the fruits, grains, and roots which had grown in their valleys in consequence of former cultivation.¹¹ The enemy then endeavoured to lay waste the country, cutting down the fruit trees, trampling the crops under foot, and flinging the walnuts and chestnuts into the streams.¹² It was well for the Vaudois that they had the foresight, ere this was done, to lay up stores of provisions,¹³ which they hid amongst the rocks, and even in the ground. The utensils and

¹ Return, pp. 122-126.

² Id. p. 162.

³ Id. p. 175.

⁴ Id. p. 142.

⁵ This incident is derived from a manuscript, entitled "Relazione fedelissima del stato e fatti occorti nelle missione delle valli di Luserna." (Episcopal Archives of Pignerol.)

⁶ Arnaud, pp. 130, 192.

⁷ This order is dated 9th October, 1689, and signed by Rinayra, the intendant of the province. It is in the Archives of Le Villar; Mazzo, Religionarii, fol. 96.

⁸ ARNAUD, Return, pp. 123, 128, 154, 201.

⁹ Id. 107, 149, 150, 221.

¹⁰ Id. 139, 160.

¹¹ Id. 133, 153, 182.

¹² Id. 167, 170, 174.

¹³ Id. 173, 184, 209, 215.

valuables which they had thus buried before their expulsion, became also now of great service to them. It was always matter of astonishment regarding them, that they never wanted the munitions of war. In this fact, inexplicable to their enemies, we have a proof how well all had been arranged beforehand by Janavel, who had said to them, with a mysterious confidence, "Give yourselves no concern on this point."¹

They had to fight many battles² and to endure many severe privations;³ but notwithstanding all these hard trials, they never ceased, amongst the rocks or in the forests,⁴ regularly to celebrate the sacrament of the Supper, and in camp, or on the march, to make prayer to God.⁵ And certainly it was God who supported them; for to all appearance nothing but destruction awaited them. With nothing sometimes but a few roots to eat, they endured fatigues which would have required the strength of giants. The very banditti of Piedmont were armed to fight against them.⁶ They were attacked by 10,000 French, and 12,000 Sardinians;⁷ Catinat, D'Ombrailles, and Feuquières were baffled by this handful of heroes, clothed in rags, and subsisting on the fare of anchorites. Victor Amadeus seems at last to have intended to march against them in person;⁸ but ere long he was happy to have them for allies.

However, at the time to which our narrative now refers, the issue of their enterprise seemed to become increasingly doubtful. It was now the 16th of October,⁹ and hitherto they had only been weakened by a multitude of partial combats and transitory movements, which exhausted their forces, without consolidating their position. Their past fatigues, their present precarious condition, and the threatening uncertainties of the future, weighed sore upon their spirits. Discouragement at least might have arisen, and already, indeed, it began to be felt.¹¹ The number of their men, reduced by combats, was still further diminished by desertions.¹²

¹ Instructions given in June, 1688.

² ARNAUD, Return, 148, 196, 271.—At Sibaoud, 169, 170. It was upon this occasion that the soldiers of the Marquis of Parelles, thinking to pursue the Vaudois among the rocks, rushed over precipices.—At Paousettes, 166; at L'Aiguille, 173.

³ Return, pp. 126, 133, 134, 159, 163, 181, 211, 212.

⁴ At Les Serres de Cruël, pp. 161, 166.

⁵ At Le Beetz, p. 200.

⁶ Pp. 126, 204, 133.

⁷ P. 172.

⁸ Pp. 183, 270, 403. The combined movements of the armies of France and Piedmont had been arranged at Pignerol, on the 8th of September, 1689. (Document in the Archives of Turin, No. of Series, 259.)

⁹ See Istruzione a voi, conte Filippone, Contadore generale per il nostro viaggio nelle valli di Lucerna, per servizio nostro e delle truppe (a document dated 16th October, 1689). (Archives of the Court, Turin; No. of Series, 269, bis.)

¹⁰ Return, pp. 200, 204.

¹¹ Pp. 167, 178, 201, 204.

¹² See Return, pp. 107, 184, 202, &c.

Not a few of the French refugees who had accompanied them, considering their cause to be desperate, and unable to endure the prospect of an unequal and seemingly endless struggle, left the Vaudois mountains, where death and triumph would have been equally glorious; most of them, however, only to terminate their course miserably; for being seized one by one, sometimes in the dominions of France, sometimes in those of Piedmont, they were conveyed prisoners to Turin, to Pignerol, or to Grenoble, or consigned to the galleys.¹ Towards the end of the year there remained but few strangers in the Vaudois troop.²

Turrel himself, the commander, who had directed their military operations from their leaving Switzerland to their reaching the valleys, despaired of the success of the cause for which he had hitherto contended, and seeing no chance of any prosperous issue, and no prospect of the Vaudois again acquiring possession of their country, he furtively withdrew from among them, unable to endure to the end the fatigues of such a war. His foreign origin, without marring the display of his military talents amongst the inhabitants of the valleys, no doubt rendered it impossible for him to rise to the elevation of their patriotism, or long to maintain such a sentiment.³ With all his military talents, he was not like one contending for his native land. But Arnaud never appeared greater than on this occasion. Far from forsaking a people thus generally forsaken, he only attached himself to them more closely; when the cause of the exiles presented the greatest dangers, he embraced it with greatest ardour; and at the moment when this expedition, worthy of ancient times, discouraged the best soldiers—at the moment when it was abandoned even by those who had promised it most—this last pastor of the exiles became in reality its leader, and, for the sake of religion, sustained the patriotic courage of the Israel of the Alps.

¹ Return, pp. 103, 104, 126, 140, 202, &c.

² Id. p. 176.

³ In the circumstances of his desertion (Return, p. 154) and of his death (p. 156), we see a reason why Arnaud may have kept silence on the particular office with which this leader had been invested in the Vaudois army; whilst the precautions which he found it necessary to adopt, in order to get away (p. 155), show that he must have occupied a more conspicuous position, and one attracting more general attention than that of a simple captain. Moreover, it is said that after his departure the Vaudois had no more good leaders (p. 178). Even foreigners seem to have considered him as the soul of the expedition (p. 202, concluding lines). Besides all which, the formal testimony of the original manuscript, already quoted, attests that he was the leader (MS. p. 42). But if Arnaud has only mentioned him as a captain (46, 47, 154), it must be because the indifference of the Vaudois was quite equal to the deserted condition in which he left them.—It must be added that there is a difficulty in determining with precision what relates to him in Arnaud's work, for there were among the Vaudois a number of persons of the name of Turrel. (Compare pp. 47, 154, and 155 of the Return.)

It was now the sixty-seventh day of the expedition, the 22d of October, 1689.¹ Six days before, Arnaud, being still in the valley of Lucerna,² had celebrated the Lord's Supper in the meadows of Becès, under the shade of some aged chestnut trees, which screened from observation the holy solemnities of the proscribed church. "O, my dove, that art in the clefts of the rocks, in the secret places of the stairs," says the Song of Solomon, "let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely."³ On that same day the Marquis De Parelles burned all the hill of Prarusting, from Ville Sèche to Le Périer. This was on a Sabbath. On the Saturday following,⁴ the Vaudois having assembled at Rodoret, after placing sentinels on the pass which conducts to Pral, and on that which descends to Macel, as well as at the hamlet of Les Fontaines, and at the entrance of the wild valley which they occupied, consulted what they should do.

Deprived of the positions which they had at first won, and of the leaders whose services they had enjoyed, they found themselves more than ever isolated and unsupported, whilst the circle of the enemy's forces hemmed them more and more closely round. The winter was approaching; their means of procuring provisions were continually diminishing. It was impossible any longer to think of occupying both the valleys. It would be well if they could only find a position which they could maintain with their re-united bands.

Arnaud, faithful to the instructions of Janavel, represented to them that the rocks of the Balsille alone were capable of affording them shelter—that these were their last fortress—that it was time to retire thither, and that God would not forsake them, like those allies of a day, who had proved so ready to flee from their bad fortune. Then kneeling down, with all his soldiers, he prayed long for a spirit of union and of courage to restore that confidence without which they could have no success. Their prayer was heard, and the faith of their fathers reviving in their souls with the assurance that they would be protected by the God of Jacob, gave this little troop the might of an army.

A part of the night was spent in prayer. Two hours before day, the Vaudois commenced their march amongst frightful precipices, by which they were, however, under the necessity of passing, in order to reach the Balsille without being exposed to the assaults of their enemies. "It was so very dark," says Arnaud, "that it was found necessary to stretch white cloths upon the shoulders of the

¹ Return, pp. 201, 203, 205.

² Id. p. 200.

³ Song, ii. 14.

⁴ 22d October, New Style.

guides, that they might be seen." One of them, according to a manuscript note, fastened on his back some wood which shone, by which is meant, I presume, not a lighted torch or glowing brand, but a piece of that ligneous and phosphorescent substance which is found in the decaying trunks of old trees—amongst others, of the maple and the beech. "Besides all this," adds the narrative, "the path which we were compelled to take was such that we were often under the necessity of walking on our hands and feet. But what surpasses imagination, and makes us clearly to recognize the assistance of Divine Providence in the most trying circumstances, is that two wounded men passed in safety on horseback along the same road." Yet these places are so precipitous, that when the Vaudois beheld them by daylight, the hair stood upon their heads. "One who has not seen them," adds the author, "can form no idea of the danger, and one who has seen them, would doubtless take that march for a fiction or a fancy."¹

Thus they passed from Rodoret to the summit of the rocks of the Balsille without descending to the bottom of the valley, where they would have encountered the enemy. But during this dangerous transit, the hostages whom they still retained, whether from the impossibility of advancing, or merely from the very natural desire of escaping from their perilous position, bribed their guards, and fled along with them. It is not known, however, if they succeeded in making their way safe and sound from amidst these tremendous precipices; "for since that time," says Arnaud, "we have heard nothing more about them."

"The news which have been received of the Vaudois are not favourable," the journals of the time then said; "they were first driven from one of their valleys, and lost the fort of Bobi, after making a long resistance, and killing a number of Savoyards. Thence they retired to La Sarcena, then to L'Aiguille, and, finally, they have assembled in the wildest of their valleys, at the Fort of the Four Teeth [Les Quatre Dents]."² It will be recollected that this is the strategic name of the Balsille, which is thus described in the memoirs of the period:—"This place of defence is a kind of promontory with precipitous sides, which juts out between two deep ravines, like a tongue of the mountain, all rugged behind, with points of rock which overhang and protect one another. Except by the Col du Pis, or by the mountain of Guivert, it cannot be reached otherwise than by ascending the face of the precipice."¹ "Here," says a recent author, "nature has built with her own hands an asylum for men destined to flee from the persecution of their fellow-men; and here thousands of citizens, persecuted by soldiers and priests, defended their lives against the oppressors."²

¹ Arnaud, pp. 205, 206.

² Gazettes of France, England, and Leyden, year 1689, from October to December, —Mercurie historique, t. iii. pp. 1057, 1147, &c.

At this place three small cascades fall on the superior platform, "which is situated," says Arnaud, "on a very precipitous rock, having, as it were, three stories, or three different inclosures, which render the approach to it very difficult, except on the side of the streamlet which forms these cascades, and which the Vaudois had fortified by strong palisades, supported by parapets."³ They prosecuted these works of intrenchment over the whole extent of the mountain, connecting the points of rock by bastions of earth or of dry stones, intermixed with trees, whose branches being turned outwards, added to the inextricable difficulties of these walls. Finally, they constructed on the summit of this wild and threatening pyramid, a fort, which those who saw it at that time declared to be almost inaccessible, and, indeed, impregnable.⁴ This little fort itself was separated from the rock by three great walls.⁵ There were, moreover, deep cuttings in the slope of the mountain, presenting successively a ditch and a wall, which extended around and inclosed this salient angle, and rose like benches to the base of the higher intrenchments. These trenches, bastioned and covered by each other, amounted to seventeen in number.⁶ To these works of fortification the Vaudois added covered ways, ditches and walls around their casemates, which were digged in the earth, and surrounded with conduits or drains, to prevent the water from entering. These subterranean habitations soon amounted to more than eighty in number.⁷ Thereafter these valiant mountaineers repaired the mill of the village, which stood upon the banks of the Germanasque. The millstone had been hidden in the gravel in 1686. The brothers Poulat, of Les Frons, natives of La Balsille, made known the place in which it had been deposited. It was lifted up by strength of arms from the sand in which it lay buried, and a strong beam having been passed through the hole in its centre, twelve strong men transported it to the mill, where it was set up again in its place for use.⁸

¹ These particulars are taken from a Mémoire sur les passages du val St. Martin (MS. of the Royal Library at Turin), and from the Rélation de l'attaque de la Balsille (La Haye, 1690).

² Page 144 of the work entitled "Noms, situation et détail des vallées de la France le long des grandes Alpes, . . . et de celles qui descendent des Alpes en Italie," &c. . . . Turin, 1793.

³ Return, p. 268.

⁴ Relation de 1690, par un soldat, p. 39.

⁵ Same Relation, p. 43.

⁶ Return, p. 207.

⁷ Same authorities.

⁸ Return, p. 208.

The mountaineers now made haste to lay in provisions for the winter. "They had come to the Balsille without having what would support them for the next day. They lived there at first on greens, turnips, and corn, which they boiled, and ate without meat or fat, without salt or other seasoning, until the re-establishment of the mill enabled them to make bread."¹ They then prepared great quantities for winter, making use also of the mill of Macel, situated half a league farther down the valley, so long as the enemy permitted them to have access to it.² But it was most remarkable that the corn of Pral and Rodoret, which had not been reaped in 1689, remained uninjured beneath the snows during the winter,³ and was reaped by the Vandois from February to April, 1690. "Can any one," says Arnaud, "refuse to recognize the hand of Providence in this extraordinary circumstance, that the Vandois were permitted to make their harvest, not in the midst of summer, but in the midst of winter? Or could any but God have inspired such a small handful of people, destitute of gold and silver, and of all other earthly succour, with the courage to go and make war against a king who at that time made all Europe to tremble? Is it possible to imagine that, without a protection absolutely Divine, these poor people, lodged in the earth almost like the dead, and sleeping upon straw, after having been blockaded for eight months, could at last have triumphed? Does it not seem as if God said, in preserving that grain upon the earth during eight months, to feed these persecuted people during the hardships of winter and of the siege, 'These are my true children, my chosen and beloved, whom it is my pleasure to feed by my providence; let their land of Canaan, to which I have brought them back, rejoice to see them again, and make them unusual and almost supernatural gifts.'"⁴

Isolated on the summit of their rocks, as in an inaccessible eyry, the last representatives of the Israel of the Alps saw the waves of their enemies break at the base of that battlemented promontory which served them for a fortress, like the powerless billows around a gigantic crag, which they are unable to shake. They chose one of themselves, Peter Philip Odin,⁵ to direct their conduct in concert with Arnaud; the former being to direct them in their military operations, the latter in their duties as Christians. Arnaud preached two sermons every Sabbath, and conducted two religious services daily, one in the morning and one in the evening. Thus from the summit of these lofty mountain-crests, amidst dangers and privations of every kind, endured for their country's sake, the Vaudois confidently raised to heaven the voice of their prayers, the utterances of their fervour, and the hymns which proclaimed their hope in God.

¹ Return, p. 218.² Id. pp. 209, 217.³ Id. p. 220.⁴ Id. pp. 402, 401, and 403.⁵ Compare the counter-signatures of the letters, Return, pp. 262, 265, and the letter of Arnaud, p. 392.

In foreign countries the most lively interest began to be felt for them. Some private letters mention that even the Spanish troops quartered in the Milanese, had at that time the intention of giving them aid.¹ Supplies were sent to them from Holland, but were intercepted by the French troops. "I am informed," says a writer of the time, "that an offer was made to these mountaineers to send them experienced commanders, but that they rejected it, saying that they could do nothing worth while if they were led by strangers."²

Thus passed the winter. The first attempts which were made to drive them out of the Balsille were completely unsuccessful. "Although reduced to great extremities," say the contemporary journals, "they disputed the ground with their enemies with admirable intrepidity and courage."³ The troops of the Marquis D'Ombrailles succeeded only in seizing the Col du Clapier and the Col du Passet, where they had posts of observation. They made their way even to the village of Balsille, and were about to lay siege to the fortified peak on which the Vaudois were located, but a great fall of snow took place, and many of the soldiers of the besiegers had their feet and their hands frost-bitten. For three days D'Ombrailles continued to make various proposals of capitulation to the besieged, which were all rejected; and seeing at last that he could neither succeed by artifice nor by violence, he adopted the resolution of retiring.

Then came the solicitations of relatives, of friends, of pretended protectors of the Vaudois, perhaps of more than one traitor, who, to induce them to surrender, promised them repose in that case, but assured them of inevitable extermination if they persisted in their warlike isolation. Some of the letters written with this object were evidently dictated to their authors.⁴ Take, for an example, that which one of them wrote to his brother, a soldier in the Balsille:—"You know that God does not command us to take arms against our king. . . . Do not wrong your children by leaving them in this way. I am assured that it rests entirely

¹ Mercurie historique, t. vii. p. 1275; t. viii. p. 22.

² Id. p. 1276.

³ Id. t. viii. No. ix.

⁴ See the letters and the replies of the Vaudois, in Arnaud, p. 225-265.

with yourselves whether or not you shall enjoy your liberty. Perhaps you may not again have the advantages which would be granted you now.”¹ “You tell me,” replied his brother, “that his royal highness will grant us passports if we ask them from him, and that we ought not to abandon our children, who are still in Switzerland. . . . But you must know very well that we did not return to our country in order to leave it again. Here are the heritages of our fathers, . . . and if we attempt to repone our families in the places of their birth, we are not therefore rebels against our sovereign.”²

“Certainly,” replied Arnaud and Odin also to the Marquis De Parelles, “your excellence ought not to think it strange if our people are bent upon returning to their own homes. . . . The very birds, which are creatures destitute of reason, return at their proper times, to seek their nest and habitation unforbidden; and yet this is to be forbidden to men created in the image of God.”³ The rustic simplicity of this language imparts still more of masculine energy to the sentiments of these countrymen, thus expressed amidst rude rocks, resounding with the din of arms and battle. “Our storms are still louder than your cannon,” said Arnaud at another time, “and yet our rocks are not shaken.”⁴ Nor were their hearts. Traits of resolution and unostentatious courage complete the admirable character of this Christian Israel.

Three soldiers, engaged in baking bread, were taken at La Salse, near Macel. Two of them, who were sick, were put to death, after suffering horrid mutilations. Their heads were then severed from their bodies, and these bloody heads were borne to the third captive. In this way he was marched to La Pérouse. This good man, says Arnaud, prayed to God so fervently, that the judge of that place, although a Catholic, besought M. D’Ombrailles, for pity’s sake, to leave him in his hands; but the general, who never spoke but of utter extermination, threatened the judge that he would hang him along with the prisoner. However, as the governor of Pignerol would not permit the unfortunate man to be executed within the bounds of his government, they hanged him at the castle of Le Bois, in Pragela. But the prayer which he made before his death drew tears from all who were present, of whom the greater part were Protestants that had become Catholics. “I die,” said he, “for a just cause; God will protect those whom you persecute: and for one man whom you kill of the Vaudois, he will raise them up five hundred!”⁵ He might have saved his life by an abjuration; but he preferred to end it gloriously by martyrdom. His head was exposed on the summit of a pole, on the road which conducts from France to the valleys, and passers-by wagged their heads, and said, "Behold the end of the Barbets!"¹

¹ Arnaud, pp. 241, 242.² Id. pp. 243-246.³ Id. p. 260.⁴ Id. p. 315.⁵ Return, pp. 213, 215.

But such was not their end. The daring garrison of La Balsille, familiar with snows and rocks, availed themselves of the winter to make frequent sorties, for the purpose of re-victualling, not only into their own valleys, but also into that of Pragela, and even of Le Queyras.²

Although reduced in number by desertions, yet they were stronger, because they were more united. The French refugees, who had at first formed part of their troop, had almost all withdrawn.³ They had not been able to bend their natural impatience into compliance with the painful delays and obscure privations of this patriotic struggle. They were ready to devote themselves, without reserve, for a great and rapid sacrifice; but their energy, their courage, and their love of glory could not hold out against the continued hardships and patient inaction imposed on the restored exiles of the valleys, by a prudence which, in their case, was necessary, in the precarious expectation of better days to come. Unexpected circumstances hastened the happy result; but ere it was attained, the persevering mountaineers had still to pass through new trials.

On the 30th of April, 1690, whilst Arnaud was preaching, for it was a Sabbath, the Vaudois sentinels saw the troops of Catinat and of the Marquis De Parelles defiling in the bottom of the valley. They debouched around the Balsille by the Col du Pis and by the Col du Clapier. The soldiers who came by the Col du Pis had been made to await, for two whole days, amidst the snows of the mountain, the signal for marching; and many of them suffered as much from this inaction as if they had exposed their lives in a battle. Fourteen hundred peasants of the valleys of Pragela, Césane, and Queyras, were then put in requisition to carry provisions to them, and to open a way for them through the snow. At last they arrived at the base of the Balsille, and encamped on Monday morning, the 1st of May, in a wood situated to the left of the fort, and some hours afterwards placed themselves in ambuscade on the right bank of the torrent which descends from Le Pis. They were then subsequently replaced on the left bank by a battalion of Sardinian troops.⁴

Meanwhile the regiments of Le Vexin and Le Plessis kept along the heights of Le Pis, to come upon the Balsille on one of its sides

¹ Return, p. 214.

² Id. p. 220.

³ Id. p. 216.

⁴ Arnaud p. 269.

behind; the Savoyard militia, with the regiment of Cambrésis, climbed Mount Gunivert, in order to assail it on the other. Catinat reserved the rest of his troops to attack it in front. "It was not without difficulty," says an actor in this drama,¹ "that the troops reached Mount Gunivert. It had been proposed that they should proceed thither on Tuesday morning, to make the attack all together; but for fear of the inconveniences and difficulties of the night, an effort was made to reach it that same day. There were more than three leagues there of an ascent so steep that no one could look behind him without becoming giddy. The roads, blocked up by snow, were only opened by the help of pioneers who went before. On the arrival of the troops, at three o'clock in the afternoon, at the heights which had been previously reconnoitred, a guard was placed there of seventy men, supported by fifty lower down. At last, whilst it was still day, they arrived at the summit of the mountain; and happy it was, indeed, that they did so; for they were no sooner there than a frightful fall of snow began, and there arose a mist so thick, that if it had been necessary to have marched in such weather, they would infallibly have fallen over the precipices. With this thought they consoled themselves a little for being on that dreadful mountain, without water, without wood, without tents, without covering—exposed to injury by cold, wind, snow, and even hail, which never ceased to annoy our people during the whole night."

On Tuesday morning (2d May, 1690), the regiments of Vexin and Le Plessis, which had also suffered much in their march, appeared upon the heights of the mountain of Le Pis, formed themselves into two lines of attack, and opened upon the fort of the Vaudois an ill-directed fire of musketry. Meanwhile, a part of the troops posted on Mount Gunivert² proceeded to the mountain of Le Pelvon, in order to cut off from the defenders of the Balsille, in anticipation of their defeat, the retreat to the lofty peaks. The remainder of these troops³ came closer to the banks of the Germanasque, in order also to attack the Fort of the Four Teeth [Les Quatre Dents].

However, the two attacking columns, which had commenced their fire from the side of Le Pis, were not able to keep their advantage. "The left column," says the narrative,⁴ "not being able to keep the roads, which were found quite impracticable, was obliged

¹ Rélation de l'attaque de la Balsille, La Haye, 1690. (Arnaud gives extracts from it in pp. 281-297.)

M. De La Rouennate, with the Savoyards.

² The regiment of Cambrésis.

⁴ Rélation, printed at the Hague in 1690, p. 43.

to ascend again to join the right, which, after all the difficulties caused by a mountain covered with ten feet of snow, without roads, and working its way amidst inaccessible rocks, arrived at last within musket shot, above the fort of the Vaudois. But the mountain where they were was so steep that the men could not descend it without falling down it as a precipice. Moreover, it was now seen that the interval from its base to the fort was still traversed by three great intrenchments. The pioneers were sent for to facilitate the approaches; this occupied more than three hours."

Meanwhile Catinat, with the regiments of Bourbon, Artois, and Lassarre, supported by a squadron of dragoons of Languedoc, had made the attack in front. A steep acclivity at the base of the hill conducted to the bottom of the fortified precipices, the rocks and parapets of which, rising one above another, formed the pyramid, of steep ascent, on whose summit stood the little fort of the Vaudois, properly called the Fort of the Four Teeth [Les Quatre Dents].¹ "An engineer² having examined the place with a telescope, thought it best that the attack in front should be made on the right of this acclivity. A battalion of men, selected from amongst the bravest, rushed forward to the charge against this rapid talus, made one simultaneous discharge against the Vaudois, and intrepidly advanced as far as the base of their first bastion. These bastions were cased with blocks of stone and trunks of trees, disposed in alternate courses, one above the other, the branches of the trees being turned outwards. The soldiers thought they had nothing to do but to seize these trees, throw them down, and so ascend above them. But they found themselves much mistaken; for when they attempted this, they found that the trees were immovable, and securely fastened in the bastion. The Vaudois then opened such a fire, that these brave and unfortunate soldiers fell in great numbers. It was surprising what a hail-storm of bullets filled the air. It seemed as if the arms of the Vaudois were always charged; and, in fact, the younger of them, stationed in the second rank, were employed only in charging, whilst the others did nothing but fire from the summit of the bastion; so that their enemies were destroyed by a continual fire, notwithstanding an incessant fall of snow."

Catinat, perceiving this, gave orders to the Savoyards to re-descend from Mount Pelvon.³ "Just when they thought that they were about to make themselves masters of the Vaudois, there arose all at once a fog and storm so extraordinary that, as I¹ and some of the officers can testify, a part of the army believed that Heaven visibly interposed for the preservation of that handful of people; for this event caused the attack upon the fort to be immediately abandoned, and the French, as well as the Savoyards, dreaded to be engulfed in the ravines and avalanches. It was only by a miracle that they succeeded in retiring, for three hours leaping from rock to rock, amidst terrible precipices, the snow and hail sometimes reaching to their armpits, so that they would have remained buried there, if they had not found shelter amongst some larches."

¹ See Catinat's order, quoted by Arnaud, p. 275.

² I here resume Arnaud's narrative, p. 270.

³ I here introduce new particulars derived from the Rélation of the Hague.

After the sustained fire of the bastion had decimated the enemy, without causing them to give way, a shower of stones, before which it was impossible for them to stand, at last decided their retreat; and they retreated with a precipitation equal to the ardour with which they had advanced to the attack. "My friends, we must sleep to-night in that barrack," Lieutenant-Colonel De Parat had said to his soldiers two hours before, showing them the fort which they were to attack. But the Vaudois, now seeing that they fled in disorder, made a vigorous sortie, and destroyed the whole detachment except fifteen men, who, escaping bareheaded and without arms, carried to the camp of the enemy the news of their defeat.² M. De Parat was made prisoner, and conveyed to the very barrack which he hoped to have entered that same evening as a conqueror. He was permitted to obtain the attendance of a surgeon to dress his wounds, whose professional services were also very useful to the Vaudois.

Next day the Vaudois cut the heads off the corpses of their enemies, and planted them on the palisades of their intrenchments, to show that they did not intend to accept any terms of capitulation.

General De Catinat retired to Les Clos, and did not think proper to expose his hope of the baton of a marshal of France to the risk of a second defeat, by the unexpected valour of a handful of mountaineers. He left the Marquis De Feuquières as his successor; and the following are the orders which the new general issued for the conduct of the war against the Vaudois³:—

"The regiment of Le Plessis will move from Jousseau on the 12th (of May), and proceeding by the Col du Pis, will encamp the same day at Les Bergeries, or by the cascade.¹ It will be attended by 200 peasants, who will carry wood to warm the soldiers.

¹ It is the author of the Relation who speaks, p. 44. He places this event on the 1st of May, at ten o'clock A.M.

² Arnaud, pp. 271, 272.

³ They are written by the hand of Feuquières himself, and addressed to Victor Amadeus II. (Turin, Archives of State, No. of Series, 260.)

"The second regiment of the dragoons of Languedoc will move from Le Saut (read Usseaux or Ussaud), and proceeding by the Albergan, will encamp the same day at the Clos Damian.

"The regiment of Cambr sis will move from Bourset, and proceeding by the Col du Clapier, will encamp on the back of the mountain which looks to Balsille, at the place called La Verge, but out of reach of the fire of the rebels.

"The regiment of Vexin will move from Maneille, and proceeding by Macel, will encamp between Le Passet and Balsille.

"Eight hundred men of the 1500 whom his royal highness is pleased to give, will proceed by Salses, and encamp the same day on the mountain of Gunivert, and for this purpose it will be necessary that these be presently at Rodoret and at Fontaine, in order that they may easily repair to their post.

"When all these troops are encamped at the places above named, I will cause a battery of two pieces to be erected during the night, to play upon the castle,² with the view of making a breach in it, the whole of the following day.

"The night after, the regiment of Le Plessis will leave 100 men at the Pas de Sarras; the remainder of the regiment will set out at the hour which shall be appointed, in order to gain the ridge of the mountain where the rebels are intrenched.

"The 800 men of his royal highness will leave 300 opposite to the castle, and the other 500 will go on to join the regiment of Le Plessis on the aforesaid ridge.³

"If this junction can be effected, they will make signals, which I will give them before they set out; and I will immediately cause cannons to be fired, as the signal to all the posts that they may proceed at once, and by this general attack exterminate all the rebels.⁴

"If there is anything in this plan which his royal highness wishes to be changed, he will do me the honour to send me his orders."

No change was made. It seemed impossible that this plan should

¹ This cascade is two leagues from La Balsille. It is one of the most remarkable in the valleys, and the only one in the valley of Macel. In the valley of Lucerna there is a water-fall worthy of notice, near Miraboue.

² This name was given to the part of the Balsille inhabited by the Vaudois, and surrounded by their principal fortifications.

³ I here suppress some unimportant details.

⁴ Here, also, unimportant details are suppressed. The arrangements indicated in this paper correspond with what is recorded by Arnaud, p. 303.

fail.¹ Feuquières received, by anticipation, the title of Conqueror of the Barbets.² The troops which he had designated set out to occupy their positions. Those of Mount Gunivert constructed two redoubts on the mountain, one opposite to the village of Balsille, which the troops of Parelles and Catinat had already laid in ruins, and the other on a level with that post of the Vaudois which was named the castle. "Besides a great number of pioneers who came with the regiments, all the soldiers who were not at work in the trenches or upon guard, were obliged to make fascines, in order to facilitate their approaches, to retain the earth without parapets, and to make banquettes and supporting walls. Thus," says Arnaud, "the castle was soon environed; for so soon as they had gained a foot of ground, they covered it with a good parapet, and never saw so much as the hat of a Vaudois but they fired 100 musket shots at it, which they did without running any risk themselves, for they were covered by sacks full of wool, which bullets could not pierce."³ It took them twelve days, however, to accomplish these works and operations. More than one great city has been taken in less time.

The remarkable intrepidity of the defenders of the Balsille inspired with an involuntary esteem even the enemies who treated them as rebels. When all was ready for the attack they hoisted a white flag, and offered the Vaudois an honourable capitulation. The Vaudois sent a messenger to know what they wanted. "Surrender!" said they to him, "and you shall, each of you, receive 500 louis, and good passports for your retirement to a foreign country; but if you do not, you will infallibly be destroyed." "We have arms and ammunition," replied the Vaudois messenger. "No doubt you may be able to kill many of our brave men, but can you hope to destroy an army?" "That will be as the Lord will," said he. "How!" said they, "a handful of mountaineers dare to make war against the king of France, who has vanquished so many great nations! And can you doubt of your destruction if you are so desperate as to persevere?" M. De Feuquières himself wrote to the Vaudois "that they should endeavour to avoid bringing things to the last extremity, as he had orders not to give up that enterprise until he accomplished its object; but that he would now grant them things which it would be out of time to ask when the cannon should once have been fired."⁴ Then it was that Arnaud and Odin replied that their rocks, which were accustomed to the noise of thunder, would not be shaken by that of cannon,⁵ thus signify-

¹ Return, p. 307.

² Id. p. 330.

³ Id. pp. 308, 309.

⁴ Id. p. 311.

⁵ Id. pp. 342, 404.

ing that their minds, which had stood so many trials of adversity, would not be overwhelmed by this new evil. That same night their troops made a vigorous sortie, and killed many of the French. They had already made many similar sorties since the commencement of the siege, sometimes to destroy the enemy's works and sometimes to seize their convoys, or to drive them from some position.

At last, according to the plan which he had framed, Feuquières had his cannon brought to that part of Mount Gunivert which commanded the Balsille. Having unmasked his battery, he again hoisted a white flag, and then a red flag, to signify to the besieged that if they did not surrender they were no longer to look for any quarter. It had, indeed, already been publicly announced in Pignerol that all the Vaudois who were not killed amongst their rocks, would be hanged in that city.¹

The besieged made no reply to these summonses nor to these proposals (for every day they received new ones),² being determined upon a vigorous resistance; and next day (the 14th of May, 1690) the enemy's cannon began to play upon their fortifications. Before mid-day 114 balls, of 12 or 13 lbs., had already been shot. The bastions of the Vaudois, which were of no very great solidity, being only constructed of dry stones, were soon dismantled.

The French then mounted to the assault upon three sides, "some," says Arnaud, "by the Clos Damian, some by the ordinary entrance to the castle, and a third detachment by the brook, heedless of the fire of the besieged, and of the stones which were rolled down upon them. The French musketry kept up a perpetual storm of bullets, and the Vaudois had already been exposed to a vast number of them before they abandoned their lower intrenchments, which, however, they did without having one killed, and only a very few being wounded.³ They then retired to the more elevated fortifications, called the Horse of La Bruxe [Cheval de la Bruxe]. But to accomplish this retreat they had to pass under the fire of a French redoubt, which they did with success, under covert of a thick fog. The enemy immediately seized the position which they had abandoned, and redoubled their activity in the attack upon the higher intrenchments.

The Vaudois, seeing themselves so closely beset, considered that the hand of God alone could save them from that of their adversaries. They invoked his aid, continued their resistance till night; and then profiting by the mists, which on rainy days arise towards evening from the deep glens, when these protective veils began to enfold the heights, they issued from their retreat, and, under the guidance of Captain Poulat, who was a native of these mountains—under the invisible but real protection of the Almighty—enveloped in these dark and humid clouds, by the confused and distant light of the enemy's fires, on icy or moist slopes of almost perpendicular rocks, over which they were compelled to pass, they held their way, one after another, in single file across the gaping crevasses above the deep chasms of the Germanasque, dragging themselves along on their bellies, clinging to the asperities of the mountain, or to bushes or roots hanging from the rocks, resting from time to time, continually praying to God, and never yielding to despair. After all this they digged steps in the hardened snow to climb by, and gained the northern slope of Mount Gunivert, where they turned the posts of the enemy, some of whom challenged them as they passed, and then panting, exhausted, half-dead with fatigue, but blessing the Lord for so miraculous a deliverance, they arrived at the base of the glaciers of Le Pelvoux.

¹ Return, pp. 342, 404.

² Id. p. 316.

³ Arnaud, p. 319.

At sunrise, next day, they appeared to the astonished eyes of the enemy, like eagles that had flown from their eyry, on mountain-tops much higher than the Balsille, and than all the posts occupied by the assailing army. The Marquis De Feuquières made haste to send a detachment after them, but it was too late; when this detachment moved, the fugitives were at La Salse, above Macel; when it was at La Salse they were at Rodoret; when the enemy was at Rodoret the indefatigable Vaudois were on the mountain of Galmon, which commands the whole valley of Pral; and thus fleeing from peak to peak, keeping always at a distance from the enemy, and still increasing the distance by their superiority in strength, courage, and perfect knowledge of the localities, the glorious fugitives arrived above Servins, where they paused for prayer. Arnaud pronounced, with a loud voice, the words of supplication and thanksgiving, but his troop was dying of fatigue and hunger. Then these rude children of the Vaudois mountains put snow into their mouths to refresh themselves, and chewed green shoots of fir-trees to support their strength; after which they pursued their march, mounted the heights of Pral, where the tale is now obtained, and arrived towards evening at the summit of the Rocca bianca, one of the spurs of the Cornaout—the culminating point of the mountains which separate the valley of Lucerna from that of St. Martin, and which owes its name of the White Rock, not to the snow with which it was then covered, but to a white marble which is found there, as pure and fine as that of Paros. From thence they descended to Faët, where they did not arrive till after midnight, having made their way down dangerous precipices, clinging to small shrubs and aiding one another by joined hands.

Notwithstanding the extraordinary fatigues of this day of superhuman marches, the Vaudois set out again before dawn, on Saturday, the 17th of May, to pass over the mountain which now separated them from Rioclaret. Their object was to pass by the heights of Angrogna to the celebrated retreat of their ancestors, the Pra-du-Tour, which is as deeply sunk among the mountains as the Balsille, which they had quitted, is elevated above the valley. But they soon perceived that the enemy followed in their track; therefore, changing the direction of their route, they proceeded towards Pramol, in order to get some provisions. This commune continued to be peopled by the new inhabitants whom Victor Amadeus had introduced into it. They possessed numerous flocks, and were protected by a post which was commanded by Captain Vignaux. The Vaudois attacked him so vigorously that they killed fifty-seven of his men, dispersed the rest, and seized the commander himself, along with three of his inferior officers.

These events took place at a time most critical for the enterprise hitherto so resolutely prosecuted by the Vaudois, whom Victor Amadeus had exiled, and who had returned to take possession of their own country. For that prince himself it was also a decisive moment in the determination of his policy. It was at the instigation of the king of France that he had driven out the Vaudois; with the arms of the king of France he had just been contending against them at the Balsille, and the demands made upon him by that haughty monarch becoming continually more and more imperious, were on the point of throwing him into the party of the allies (Spain, Austria, and England), in their war with Louis XIV. The fight at Pramol took place on the 17th of May, and the victors were informed by their captive, M. De Vignaux, that Victor Amadeus had only to the Tuesday following (the 20th of May) to decide between Germany and France. If he should decide for France the Vaudois could expect nothing else, according to all human judgment, than to be destroyed or again expelled from the valleys. If, on the contrary, the court of Savoy were to pronounce in favour of the enemies of France, the Vaudois would be received again into favour by the sovereign, and might even hope for some grateful acknowledgment of their valiant resistance to Louis XIV. They would acquire, moreover, a real importance, from their position on the frontiers of the two states, and from the assistance which their troops, habituated to war, familiar with the Alps, and full of ardour against the king of France, might be able to afford to the cause of Savoy, by this political revolution again identified with their own.

Here the reflecting mind pauses to inquire, "On what do the destinies of men and nations sometimes depend?" "On God," replies the Christian. In truth it was God who, for the safety of the Vaudois, had now caused a general commotion throughout Europe, or at least who, by means of these far-extending commotions, reinstated a people, small in point of number, in the abodes of their ancestors. Thus those mighty forces, which sometimes shake both earth and heaven, and which, during the storm, send forth thunder and fierce blasts of wind, are commissioned to effect the object of bestowing a few drops of rain upon some unheeded flower of the valley.

Next day the Vaudois received information at Angrogna that Victor Amadeus II. had decided in favour of Austria, that he had declared war against France, restored peace to their exhausted tribes, gladly accepted the assistance of their arms, and opened to them again the gates of their native land. Afterwards they received overtures from France, the French monarch (through the Marquis De La Feuillade) offering them his protection if they would turn their arms against Victor Amadeus, the direct, or at least the responsible author of the persecution which they had endured. But the Vaudois nobly repelled that hypocritical proposal.

Whilst they were at Angrogna a messenger came to them from the Chevalier De Vercellis, commandant of the fort of La Tour, who, on the part of the Duke of Savoy, offered them provisions and arms, inviting them to range themselves under the banners of their own legitimate sovereign.¹ They did not hesitate; and Victor Amadeus, who had persecuted them, was now threatened in his turn, and soon became a wanderer and a fugitive, as they themselves had been; their country was again restored to them, and now it became their duty to defend him. The governor of the fort of Mirabouc also had orders to allow these glorious exiles, who had recovered possession of their country, to act and move about with all freedom.² But they had still some days of severe struggles, and during which they were hard pressed by enemies, before they found themselves peacefully settled; for the French were furious against them for having foiled them at the Balsille, and mortified above all that their skilful manœuvres, their imposing array of forces, and their regular siege of the fort of Les Quatre Dents had issued in nothing but their getting possession of the place, without the besieged—that they had succeeded only in seizing these pointed rocks, like an empty eyry from which the eaglets have departed. They therefore pursued the Vaudois from valley to valley, with an ardent thirst for their extermination. One of these pursuing corps, commanded by M. De Clérambaud, was arrested and disarmed at La Tour by the garrison of that place,¹ which had received intelligence of the rupture between France and Piedmont before the detachment had been informed of it.

¹ Arnaud, p. 329.

² Id. p. 319.

As for the Vaudois, they kept to their heights, still living a life of many privations; now feeding on milk and roots,² now on some partridge which had been shot, and which was cooked on a flat stone, without any seasoning;³ now on bread, obtained with great difficulty,⁴ or on a soup made of sorrel and violets gathered on the mountains.⁵ Some of them becoming frenzied, fed in the most savage manner, even devouring the raw flesh of wolves which they killed.⁶ Yet in these circumstances, still so full of danger, these brave mountaineers succeeded in obtaining some signal advantages over the enemies who were anxious to destroy them.

On Wednesday, the 21st of May, the French having sent two detachments into the mountains of Angrogna, the one above the Pradu-Tour, and the other on the south slope of Vendalin, in order to surprise the Vaudois there, they were, on the contrary, surprised by the Vaudois, who by this victory obtained complete equipments for sixty men.⁷ Next day, also, the Vaudois fought all day; and a few days after they were strengthened by a new company of their brethren, who, having left the Balsille before that place was given up, had remained till now in Pragela.⁸ New skirmishes still took place from the 4th to the 10th of June; but the French troops gradually withdrew from these valleys to other destinations. The Vaudois then established their headquarters at Bobi, where Victor Amadeus caused his commissaries to distribute provisions to them.⁹

Numbers of their brethren, who had been detained prisoners at Turin, now began to arrive, amongst others Captain Pelenc and Captain Mondon of Bobi, to whom the Duke of Savoy had said, when he set them at liberty, “Return to your brave compatriots! Tell them that they will henceforth be as free as they were in former times. Let them be as faithful to me as they have been to their religion, and their ministers may preach even in Turin.”¹⁰

This promise was not to be fulfilled until long after, and not until after he who made it had proved unfaithful to it. But he then had need of the Vaudois, and their valour did not disappoint him. Let us inquire into the sudden turns of fortune, which had led to these unexpected resolutions in the high regions of power.

¹ Arnaud, p. 348. ² Id. p. 350. ³ Id. p. 344. ⁴ Id. p. 345. ⁵ Id. p. 347.

⁶ Id. p. 354. ⁷ Id. pp. 346, 347. ⁸ Id. p. 349. ⁹ Id. pp. 356, 357.

¹⁰ Id. pp. 357, 358, supplemented by an unpublished letter of Reynaudin, the principal author of the Glorious Return.

CHAPTER V.

RUPTURE BETWEEN FRANCE AND SAVOY, WAR WHICH FOLLOVED IT, AND NEW SITUATION OF THE VAUDOIS, NOW BECOME DEFENDERS OF VICTOR AMADEUS II.¹

(JUNE, 1690, TO SEPTEMBER, 1694.)

Exorbitant demands of France upon Piedmont—Victor Amadeus concludes an alliance with Austria, and goes to war with France—He favours the Vaudois, in order to enjoy the support of their arms—He encourages French Protestant refugees in Piedmont—Return of Vaudois from Brandenburg with their families—Generosity of the Elector of Brandenburg—The Vaudois regiment in Piedmont—Successful incursion into the valley of the Guill in Dauphiny—Expeditions and combats—The Vaudois leaders in the presence of Victor Amadeus—Gallantry of the Vaudois at the capture of the fort of St. Michael, near Lucerna—Victory over the French at Briquères—The French abandon the valley of St. Martin—Defeat of Victor Amadeus at Staffarde—Savoy subjected to France—The French again make themselves masters of the valley of St. Martin—They are repulsed from that of Lucerna—Faithful adherence of the Vaudois to Victor Amadeus—Their incursions into Dauphiny—M. De Feuquières, the French general, suffers severe loss at Lucerna—Various conflicts and events of war.

For a long time the demands made by France upon Piedmont had far exceeded all that one political power is entitled to expect from another in alliance with it. The zeal of Victor Amadeus for the interests of France diminished every day;² and the French

¹ AUTHORITIES.—The same as in the two preceding chapters, except Arnaud, and the works which terminate at the same point with his. Likewise the general histories relating to this period, monthly publications, &c.—See also Les soupirs de la France esclave qui aspire après la liberté. Amsterdam, 1690. 4to. Pp. 223. —Chiare memorie e memorandi fatti de Valdesi, da compendii storici, del S. Conte Alfonso Loschi Vicentino, without date or place of publication.—Rétation d'un soldat, &c.—The particular authorities are indicated at the bottom of each page.

² From the commencement of the year he had given expression to his dissatisfaction. "What have I ever done to the king but serve him in all possible circumstances? Have I not sacrificed to his pleasure the valley of Lucerna, contrary to all the rules of sound policy?" &c. (Letter of Victor Amadeus to the Duke of Orleans, his brother-in-law, dated 24th February, 1690.—Dieterici, p. 274. Moser places this letter in the month of June, but without assigning to it any precise date.) In his manifesto of 6th July, 1690, Louis XIV. also said: "Ever since the month of monarch, regarding his alliance with a corresponding diminution of confidence, exacted from the Duke of Savoy fresh guarantees of his fidelity, and demanded that the citadels of Verceil and Turin should be delivered to him. This was to demand the keys of Piedmont, the vassalage of Victor Amadeus, and the renunciation of all liberty upon his part; for him the question was no longer of an alliance, but a subjugation.

His high and proud spirit revolted at this idea, but prudence caused him to dissemble. Not feeling himself strong enough to contend alone and immediately against the King of France, he negotiated with Austria, fortified his towns, made new levies, and sought, by diplomatic representations and delays, to gain time with Louis XIV. He wrote him a respectful letter, in which he announced to him the mission of the Count de Provana, charged to proceed to Versailles to give the answer to his proposals.

Louis XIV. did not await the arrival of this ambassador, but immediately addressed to the Duke of Savoy an imperious letter,¹ requiring him to decide without delay; and at the same time he ordered Catinat, who commanded his troops, to enforce this demand. Victor Amadeus replied so as not to commit himself. Longer time was allowed him. He profited by it to conclude an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the Emperor Leopold, who recognized his titles of King of Cyprus and Royal Highness; and adopted the policy of favouring the return of the Vaudois to their own country, that their arms might be turned against France.² Victor Amadeus concluded on the same day a similar treaty with Spain, and ordered Catinat immediately to leave his dominions, with the troops under his command.

Notwithstanding the representations of the Catholic clergy,³ he proceeded to set at liberty all the Vaudois still detained in the prisons and in the galleys. He even caused those who pined in the January, I have been informed that the Duke of Savoy, seconded by Holland and England, intended to recal the Barbets, and with their aid to make an invasion of Dauphiny." (Moser, § 53.)

¹ Dated 24th May, 1690.

² This treaty was concluded on the 4th of June, 1690. The paragraph relative to the Vaudois is § VI. It is in these terms:—"His majesty the emperor promises to see to it that the Vaudois and the French refugees . . . shall act conformably to the orders of his royal highness." (Dieterici, p. 276.)

³ The Duke de Chaulnes and the Cardinal De Bouillon persuaded the pope to protest against the return of the Vaudois, and to withdraw from Victor Amadeus the tenth part of the ecclesiastical revenues, which he received by special authorization of Innocent XI. Alexander VIII., the then reigning pope, said that the conduct of the Duke of Savoy merited excommunication. The Sardinian envoy prevented the result of these intrigues. (Mercurio hist. t. viii. pp. 123, 125, and t. ix. p. 18.)

prisons of Turin to be brought into his presence. Amongst them were the 122 men of Arnaud's troop who had not been able to reach the rendezvous in time, and had been taken prisoners as they left the Grisons in 1689; who had also been subjected to much cruel treatment in their captivity.¹ The duke expressed regret for this, and threw the blame upon the tyranny and fanaticism of the King of France. He gave orders, in their hearing, that they should be provided with clothes, and with everything of which they stood in need.² He caused 500 loaves to be sent every day to those who were already assembled in the valleys;³ and in order to bring back those who were still in foreign countries, he signed an edict, giving them full permission to return to Piedmont. The same favour was accorded to the Protestant refugees of France.⁴ The duke likewise intimated all these steps to the different Reformed nations of Europe—amongst others to Switzerland, to Holland,⁵ and to England, all which speedily entered into the great league formed against France, and gave effective support to the Vaudois.⁶

No sooner did this news reach foreign countries, than the scattered Vaudois, the French exiles, and all the victims of the great king, hastened towards the valleys. But above all, the enthusiasm and acclamations of those who were thus permitted to return to the homes of their childhood, were indescribable. The poor outlaws, who had vowed not to leave their bones in strange lands, and whose families, still in exile, wept day after day for their distant country, now shed tears of joy at the thought of soon being able to unite all whom they loved in that country, for which they had braved so many dangers.

The Vaudois who had taken refuge in Wurtemberg set out in troops of forty or fifty men, under the direction of the commis-

¹ Arnaud, pp. 37, 38.

² Erman and Reclam, t. vi. Dieterici, p. 280.

³ Rélation of the Hague, second edition, p. 55.

⁴ I subjoin this paper, which is little known:—"By these letters, signed with our hand, we ordain all our officers of justice and of war, and syndics, councillors, and inhabitants of the towns and villages of our dominions, with all others to whom it may pertain, to allow the Vaudois, our subjects, to pass freely, that they may return to the valleys of Lucerna, as also all refugees of the Protestant Reformed religion who shall be with them, or shall come after them, whether in companies or individually, into our dominions, with their arms and baggage, not permitting them to receive any molestation or hinderance, but, on the contrary, to cause them to be furnished with provisions, paying for the same a reasonable price, and to bestow upon them all other assistance and favour; and this under pain of our indignation; for so our service requires, and our will is so.—Given at Turin, this 4th of June, 1690."

⁵ The letter which he addressed to the States of Holland—a somewhat perplexed and laborious composition—is given in the Rélation published at the Hague in 1690, and of which the second edition was published, with additions, in 1691.

⁶ See Moser, § LV.

sioner La Grange. A circular of the grand duke was addressed to all the baillages through which they were to pass.¹ The exiles of Brandenburg, whose rising colony had happily overcome the difficulties of its first establishment, and now had the prospect of future prosperity, did not hesitate to sacrifice all in order to rejoin their compatriots. They entreated the elector to allow them to depart, and having obtained his authority, they did not even stay to gather in their first harvest, before commencing their march.

Frederic William was far from taking offence at these inconstant settlers, who had caused him so much fruitless expense; his noble heart was touched by their love for their native land; for the poor Vaudois had been thrown into absolute ecstasies by the prospect of returning to their own country, and abandoned everything in order to do so. They set out with such precipitation and want of preparation, that if they had been left to themselves, half of them must have perished on the way, for want of resources. But Frederic William showed as much generosity at their departure as he had done on their arrival. He gave them new clothing, money for their journey, passports, and letters of recommendation to the princes through whose dominions they were to pass. He wrote at the same time to Victor Amadeus, to congratulate him on having recalled such faithful subjects; and as the season was already advanced, the Duke of Savoy, supposing that these distant exiles would not quit their new colony at the beginning of winter, replied to the elector, entreating him to continue his kindness to them till the following spring.

But ere his letter arrived, the Vaudois had already set out. In vain was any attempt made to detain them; the love of country overcame every other consideration; and, in his paternal solicitude, the worthy elector, whose regard for them seemed to increase with their eagerness to leave him, permitted them to take with them, for their journey, the horses and waggons which had been given them for the cultivation of his lands; he placed at their disposal even the supplies of wheat intended for seed. He also caused arms to be distributed to them from the arsenal of Magdeburg; he even permitted the Vaudois company which had followed his army to the siege of Bonn, to set out with arms and baggage, under the guidance of Captain Sarrazin, and of the chaplain Javel.

Frederic William, moreover, commissioned M. Maillette De Buy to accompany them to Switzerland. In order to reach that country the sooner, they followed a route different from the route by which they had come.¹ On their arrival at Zurich they expressed their ardent gratitude to the illustrious elector, in a letter which was sent back by his deputy.² Having here united with themselves all their compatriots who were still in the evangelical cantons, they resumed their journey, to the number almost of 1000, and received in the dominions of Victor Amadeus all the assistance necessary to enable them to reach the place of their destination.³

¹ It is dated 12th August, 1690, and may be seen in Moser, § LV., with the itinerary of this march of the Vaudois.

Immediately on their arrival in the valleys, they were incorporated with the Vaudois regiment which the Prince of Orange, now become King of England, and the ally of Victor Amadeus, had taken into his pay, and placed at the service of the latter, for the common interest of the powers confederate against France. This regiment had a white banner, sprinkled with blue stars, with this motto, Patientia laesa fit furor. The Duke of Savoy himself had chosen it, to indicate the source of his hostility against Louis XIV., as well as to signify that a peaceful and religious people, like the people of the valleys, may by their bravery become formidable against oppressors. This regiment distinguished itself from the commencement of the war, by numerous successful exploits.

The declaration of war took place in the following manner:—Victor Amadeus having ordered Catinat, on the 4th of June, 1690, to leave his dominions, that general assembled all his troops at Pignerol. Next day (5th June), the Duke of Savoy made his appearance, clothed in scarlet, and caused proclamation to be made, with sound of trumpets, that war was declared between Piedmont and France. He then caused the holy winding-sheet to be exposed to view under the dome of the church of St. John, and communicated before that venerated relic, which the inhabitants of Turin then considered as the palladium of their city. The Vaudois, whose places of worship were not yet rebuilt, invoked the Almighty under the canopy of heaven, within the inclosure of those sublime mountains which had been assigned them for their sanctuary—a vast temple, manifesting, in a way which no other can, the presence and glory of the Creator. “The French,” says an unpublished account, “were established at Lucerna, which was then surrounded with walls, and flanked with towers, except on the side of the Pelis. They had also taken possession of La Tour, and shut themselves up in the fort of St. Mary, from which they made sorties upon the Vaudois. But they might advance as far as Le Villar or Bobi; they met nobody; on their return they were assailed from all sides, and overwhelmed."¹ The Vaudois made themselves masters of the fort of Mirabouc.² Some new combat took place every day between them and the French, and although the fortune of war is changeful, says a contemporary, the Vaudois had almost always the advantage.³

¹ The route which they now pursued was by the following places:—Merseburg, Naumburg, Jena, Coburg, Bamberg, Nuremberg, Uhn, Schaffhausen, and Zurich.

² This letter is given by ERMAN and RECLAM. Mémoires, &c., t. vi. p. —.

³ The Vaudois had already begun to return with their wives and children, as is proved by a letter written on the part of Victor Amadeus to the syndics of Villefranche, that they should prepare rations and lodgings for a troop of 300 Vaudois, con moglie e fanciulli. Dated 6th November, 1690. (Archives of Le Villar, volume marked Religionarii, fol. 98.)

Even before they were organized in regular troops, they made a number of little expeditions, in support of the movements of the Piedmontese army. The Baron Palavicino, who commanded a detachment of it, resolved to make an incursion into Dauphiny. He proposed to invade the valley of Le Queyras, and the Vaudois sent a half battalion of 300 men to aid his design, who lay at Le Pra, on the evening of the 18th of June. It was a Sabbath; and Arnaud, who, in becoming a warrior, had not ceased to be a man of God, conducted a religious service amidst the shepherds' huts, where the soldiers were assembled. He thus elevated their souls by prayer, withdrawing from the agitations of the world those last hours of a holy day, and of the eve of a combat. Next day they passed over the Col Lacroix, put to flight the inhabitants of the valley of the Guill as far as Abriès, carried off a great number of beasts of burden and cattle from La Monta and Ristolas, overcame all resistance which was made to them at Abriès, and returned the same evening to Le Pra, where they divided the spoil.⁴

On the Thursday following (22d June) all the inhabitants of La Tour who had changed their religion, joined their former brethren, and augmented their forces. On the next Sabbath (25th June) these rapid squadrons, issuing from their mountains, fought with the enemy in the plain of Piedmont, relieved the fort of St. Michael, and that same evening celebrated their usual religious service in a farm-house near Mondovi. It was conducted by a young minister, named Bastie. Next day they took La Tour, but the French afterwards burned that little town, in order to deprive their enemies of it. In this affair Major Odin received a wound in the arm. Three

¹ Histoire des missions depuis 1687 à 1706, par le père Bonaventure de Vergemoli, traduite de l'italien. (MS. of the Episcopal Library of Pignerol.)

² Rélation de ce qui s'est passé le 15 juin au 16 juillet, 1690. The Hague, 24mo, pp. 58.

³ Mercur historique, t. viii. p. 136.

⁴ The Rélation du 16 juin au 15 juillet says that they brought back 200 mules, all laden, along with 300 head of cattle. (P. 60.) Many other details are given.

days after (Wednesday, the 28th), Captain Friquet returned from Pragela, where he had seized some important despatches. Pallavicino, the general to whom they were conveyed, delegated the officer who had made this capture, along with Odin and Arnaud, to proceed themselves with these despatches to Victor Amadeus. They were received in the camp of that prince with sound of trumpets and of drums,¹ and were addressed by him in these remarkable words: "You have but one God and one king to serve: serve God and your king faithfully; hitherto we have been enemies, henceforth we must be friends. Other parties have been the cause of your misfortunes; but if you now expose your lives in my service, I will also expose mine for you; and as long as I have a morsel of bread, you shall have a share of it."²

"From that time," Arnaud writes,³ "we have enjoyed perfect liberty. I go to meet our troops, who are to come by the Milanese.⁴ The troops of the valleys are all at Bobi and Le Villar. . . . They have a flying camp of 400 men, who scour the country as far as Briançon. God alone knows all the sufferings which we have endured, and the horrible combats in which we have been engaged; and he alone could have given us the victory. We have not lost thirty men, and our enemies have lost not less than 10,000. I write you at midnight, not having time even to write to my wife, who should be at Neuchâtel," &c.

"We have intelligence from Turin," says one, writing on the 3d of July, "that the Vaudois have within the last month been many times attacked by the French, but that they have bravely repulsed them, and have carried off much booty; and, moreover, that the Vaudois and M. Arnaud have arrived at Turin, where they have received many marks of favour from his royal highness, who has furnished them with clothes and money, and, in particular, has given M. Arnaud a rich dress and the baton of a commander."⁵ The body of troops which Arnaud was to go to meet, in order to quicken their march, arrived opposite to the valley of Lucerna on the morning of the 8th of August.⁶

¹ Rélation du 16 juin au 15 juillet, p. 59.

² These words are related by Arnaud, p. 364.

³ Letter dated 5th July, 1690. Return, p. 392.

⁴ These were some of the Vaudois refugees from the Grisons and the Valteline.

⁵ Rélation d'un soldat, . . . 24mo, p. 62.

⁶ Mercuré hist. t. ix. p. 1027. Rélation véritable, &c., . . . (4to), p. 3.—According to the Rélation already quoted (the Hague, 24mo), p. 53, these Vaudois from the Grisons, who came by the Milanese, amounted to about two thousand in number. It has been supposed that there must have been with them French refugees; but it is said, under date 17th June, p. 59, "Two thousand Vaudois have arrived from Milan, and gone to join those of the valleys." These could not be the same

The Marquis De Parelles, the lieutenant-general of Victor Amadeus, was at Bubiano with 3000 men. There was also there a regiment of the militia of Mondovi, celebrated for their want of discipline; it was found necessary to distribute amongst them four days' pay in advance, in order to retain them around their banners.

The entrance of the valley was closed by the French, who occupied the town of Lucerna, their wings resting upon the fort of La Tour and upon that of St. Michael. They had thrown down the walls of the city, so that they remained only breast high, in order to make use of them for parapets. M. De Feuquières was in command of 3000 infantry there, with six squadrons of cavalry and dragoons. The Vaudois who arrived from the Grisons with Arnaud, proceeded to the Piedmontese camp, between Bubiano and Fenil, and agreed with the Marquis De Parelles that they would attack Lucerna immediately; but, almost as soon as this was arranged, the Marquis De Parelles was summoned to the camp of Victor Amadeus, and he left M. De Loches to command in his stead.

It was deemed proper first of all to carry the fort of St. Michael, which protected Lucerna. For this purpose 200 Vaudois, commanded by Captains Imbert, Peyrot, and Malanot,¹ having with them thirty grenadiers, issued from Bubiano, passed to Lucernetta, and made a circuit round the town of Lucerna; then, ascending to Rora, they sent word to the troops which had issued from the Balsille, and were now cantoned at Bobi, to come and join them. The latter were, of all the Vaudois troops, the most inured to war, as they had now kept the field for almost a year. They had for their leader the former commandant of the fort of La Tour, the Chevalier Verecelli, who had been sent to them by Victor Amadeus. He promptly came with 300 men, and joined upon the heights of Rora those who had newly arrived from the Grisons.

These two troops of former exiles, of which the one had reconquered their native land, and the other came to defend it, now met in presence of the common enemy. "They attacked together; and, after half an hour's fighting, the fort of St. Michael was taken. But the French returned to the charge, and again drove the Vau-whom Arnaud was to go to meet on 5th July. Farther on it is said, "Twelve hundred French refugees are expected, who are at Como, in the Milanese. They are commanded by the Sieur Michel Michelin." (Id. p. 66, under date 1st July. And still farther on:—"The Vaudois have received two thousand religionaries;" and again, "one thousand refugees, . . . and twelve hundred more follow them, commanded by Michel Michelin." In general this narrative is not to be consulted without caution. The news which it gives are often the mere reports which had become current, and the dates are not always exactly indicated.

¹ Rélation, in 4to, p. 5.

dois from it. The Vaudois, irritated at losing what they had with so much difficulty won, without giving the enemy any time to rest, attacked them a second time, with more vigour than at first, and drove them from the fort, in which the Chevalier Vercelli then established himself, with 100 men to guard it. Not contented with this advantage, the Vaudois pursued the French to within musket-shot of Lucerna, the fugitives halting from time to time, making resistance at one bushy place after another, and sheltering themselves behind the hedges and rocks which lay in their way; but the Vaudois drove them out at the point of the bayonet, and by rolling stones into their places of shelter.¹

“During this combat, which lasted more than two hours, a party of thirty-six men, commanded by M. Arnaud, showed themselves, from time to time, upon a height within view of Lucerna, and then retired into the woods, which disconcerted the enemy, who did not dare to attack that small corps, fearing that there might be some ambuscade.”² One of the officers of this small corps himself gives us the following explanation of its position:—“After having given orders to attack the fort of St. Michael, M. De Loches, awaiting the issue of that enterprise, withdrew, leaving me, with M. Arnaud and a picket of thirty-six men, to observe what might take place, and to inform him of the proceedings of our people.”³ “When the fort was taken,” he also says, “M. Arnaud’s opinion was that the rest of our regiment should be brought forward, and Lucerna immediately attacked; but the day was declining, and so it was thought best to go by the road which leads to Briqu  ras to meet our people, in order to support them, in case the enemy should attempt to take them in the rear. Seeing that they did not come forth, I sent a courier to M. De Parelles, who arrived in the morning,⁴ with his 800 men.”⁵ Leaving seventy as a garrison at Bubiano, he marched upon Lucerna, which the French had just abandoned. He encountered their rear-guard at the junction of the two roads which cross one another in front of the farm called Les Eyrals. There he was joined by a part of the troops who came from Bobi. Of these he detached 100 men to occupy Lucerna, and with the rest, divided into three companies, he marched upon the enemy. The first two companies, keeping to the left, advanced through the vineyards, doubly concealed from the eyes of the enemy by the foliage and by the volumes of

¹ This fragment of narrative is extracted from the Mercure historique.

² Mercure historique, p. 1632.

³ R  lation v  ritable de ce qui s’est pass   . . . dans les Vall  es . . . depuis le 15 ao  t jusqu’ au 22 du m  me mois, 1690. The Hague, 4to, p. 5.

⁴ Wednesday, 9th August, 1690.

⁵ R  lation, . . . in 4to, p. 6.

smoke which rolled over the plain from a number of barns to which the French had set fire as they passed. The third company kept to the right, and marched directly upon them; it routed them, and pursued them with such eagerness, that many of the Vaudois flung away their knapsacks, in order to be the more agile in the pursuit. The French halted from time to time, covered by their cavalry and dragoons; but they were soon beset upon all sides, and compelled to resume their flight. In this way they were pursued as far as Briqu  ras, where their cavalry drew up in order of battle before the town, whilst the infantry took shelter within the castle. The Vaudois attacked both at the same time; the town on three points, and the castle on five. The town was first taken; the cavalry retired by Osase, and the infantry then thought fit to abandon the castle, but they were pursued with such ardour that their retreat became a rout.

"God, in his grace," says a Vaudois, "had put it into our hearts to take for our battle-cry, 'God for our help,' and in truth he did so manifestly help us, that although the enemy were four times our strength, they could not resist us. All our officers distinguished themselves, but God guided them. The enemy fought well: we took twenty-one prisoners, of whom fourteen were conducted to his royal highness. We lost forty-eight men, Vaudois and French.¹ We cannot precisely ascertain the enemy's loss, but the town of Briqu  ras was so filled with dead bodies that, two days after, we could no longer remain there for the stench. According to the accounts which reach us from Pignerol, the French have lost three colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, a major, and forty captains. There are more than 1400 of their men awaiting; they have received seventeen waggons filled with the wounded: of the regiment of the dragoons of Salis there remain no more than eighty men. If we had had cavalry, their destruction would have been complete."² The result of this expedition was to compel the enemy to abandon all the posts which they still occupied in the valley of St. Martin.

A few days before this, Catinat had seized on Cavour, the castle of which place, strengthened by several intrenchments, was defended by the Vaudois and the militia of Mondovi. This garrison, after having suffered much, succeeded in retiring, and in so doing killed 100 of the enemy. The French general now directed his army towards Saluces. The Duke of Savoy passed the Po with his. The encounter took place on the 18th of August, near Staffarde, where Victor Amadeus—for one who had never been in any battle before—performed prodigies of valour. However, Catinat routed him completely, and seized upon Saluces next day. The capture of several other places followed this battle. Meanwhile, General De St. Ruth entered Savoy, and completely subjected it to France.

¹ The French here meant are French refugees, who made common cause with the Vaudois.

² R  lation above quoted, at the end. It is merely a long letter, which some one has published. It concludes thus:—"All the valleys are at present in the hands of the Vaudois. God be praised! This 15th (21st) August, 1690."

“The French, who boast of their victory at Staffarde,” said the Mercury of the month following, “have not made so much noise about their defeat in the valleys. . . . But it is to be feared that they may profit by the defeat of the Duke of Savoy to attack the Vaudois, and to drive them a second time from their mountains.”¹ And this they certainly attempted to do, with so much success that they made themselves masters of the valley of St. Martin, but they were repulsed from that of Lucerna. Accordingly, the following announcement appeared: “The Vaudois continue to signalize themselves, and if the other troops of his royal highness were to do their part as well, Piedmont would soon be delivered from its enemies.”²

These indefatigable soldiers overthrew, in the valley of Suza, a detachment of 700 men, whom the French generals had sent to re-victual Pignerol.³ More than 300 of the French were killed, and the Vaudois took 300 mules, laden with all sorts of provisions. But ere long Suza itself fell into the hands of Catinat; the Vaudois then turned their arms in the opposite direction, and proceeded to seize upon Chateau Dauphin,⁴ a place situated on the frontiers of France and Piedmont, on the confines of the marquisate of Saluces. Meanwhile the French had burned the town of Lucerna,⁵ with the surrounding villages, to prevent the Vaudois from retiring thither; but the latter returning, reposed themselves there, and put Lucerna in a state of defence, in order to pass the winter in it.

Having promised fidelity to Victor Amadeus, the Vaudois remained courageously devoted to him. It was not so with the Italian potentates, who had attached themselves to his fortunes in the time of his prosperity, and who now abandoned him, charging him with all the evils which the war had brought upon Italy. Division began to appear in the court of Savoy itself. But the foreign narrators already quoted, say: “The Vaudois, and those who command them, understand much better what they are

¹ Mercurie historique, September, 1699, p. 1043.

² Id. October number, p. 1142.

⁴ In November, 1699.

³ In September, 1699.

⁵ End of October, 1699.

about; and, therefore, better success attends their arms. They continue to make incursions, from time to time, into Upper Dauphiny, and have several times seized convoys which were destined for places in the possession of the French. Nevertheless, they have been driven by the Marquis De Feuquières from some of the posts which they occupied. Some of the forts to which they were accustomed to retire have been demolished, and some of the woods cut down in which they frequently placed themselves in ambuscade. But this does not prevent them from making frequent incursions. in almost all of which they gain some new advantage.”¹

The following is a specimen of the way in which the Gazette de France speaks of the advantages obtained by the Marquis de Feuquières:—“They write from Pignerol:” ‘The Barbets have been completely driven from the valleys of La Pérouse, St. Martin, and Pralis. During the night between the 5th and 6th of this month, the Marquis De Feuquières proceeded, with 500 horse and 200 grenadiers, to the castle of Benasque, where there was a company of the Duke of Savoy’s regiment of guards. He arrived there before day, and made himself master of the castle, after an assault of one hour. The Marquis of Angrogna, who commanded there, and all the other officers, were taken prisoners.’”²

The same journal relates also the capture of Savillan, or Savigliano, which took place a few days after. But in the beginning of this year, 1691, Prince Eugene, having arrived to the aid of Piedmont, began to rally the troops of Victor Amadeus under the walls of Casal. The Vaudois continued their incursions into Dauphiny, where, says a narrator, the people feared them more than demons.³ The allies, on their part, resolved to make every effort to support the Duke of Savoy, and even to enter France through his dominions. The King of England gave him reason to hope that he would send the Duke of Schonberg to command his troops. Whilst awaiting his arrival, the Piedmontese generals, says the Mercurie historique, proposing to retake Pignerol,⁴ ordered the Vaudois, who were then under the command of a Genevese named Malet, to make a diversion into the valley of Pérouse, in order to draw the French troops thither. Their plan succeeded, but resulted in little advantage to the Piedmontese.

Meanwhile, a conclave was held at Rome, to appoint a successor to Alexander VIII. The presence of that assembly was signaled

¹ Mercurie hist., t. x. pp. 18 and 19; t. ix. p. 1388.

² Under date 15th January, 1691.

³ La Gazette (de France), number for February, 1691, p. 39.

⁴ Id. number for February, 1691, p. 16.

⁵ In March, 1691.

every day by the most serious disorders in the city.¹ Innocent XII., who was at last elected, found occasion afterwards to protest against the re-establishment of the Vaudois in their country; but at that time it was thought that they would soon be destroyed by arms.

M. De Feuquières certainly hoped so. On the 18th of April he set out from Pignerol, with 1200 infantry and 400 cavalry. He commenced his march at eleven o'clock at night, and next morning arrived over against Lucerna, which was at that time the most important post of the Vaudois. They, not thinking themselves in a condition to defend it, retired to the heights. Feuquières set fire to the town, but during the conflagration the mountaineers rushed down upon his army, killing 100 and wounding 200, among whom were forty officers. "It must be confessed," observes a journalist of the time, "that M. De Feuquières is not happy in his undertakings. However, these Vaudois are of remarkable bravery. They have never yet been overcome but by superiority of numbers, and when their inferiority has not been too considerable, they have always had the advantage over their enemies. Accordingly, it is reported that the Duke of Savoy has placed a good number of them as a garrison in the citadel of Turin, not thinking it possible to intrust it to better hands."²

The duke had also placed 700 Vaudois or French refugees in the citadel of Coni, which Feuquières endeavoured to take, but of which he was soon obliged to raise the siege. Being accused of having raised the siege too precipitately, he was imprisoned in the citadel of Pignerol. However, Catinat made himself master of Nice,³ of Villefranche,⁴ of Carmagnole,⁵ and of Veillane.⁶ Upon the capture of Carmagnole, the Vaudois who were found in it were spoiled of their arms and baggage by the French. Eager to avenge themselves, they marked the moment when the new garrison issued from the place, lay in wait for it upon the road, and attacked it with such vigour, that they despoiled it in turn.

The day after this affair Catinat sent 3000 men into the valleys, to exterminate these terrible troops of the Israel of the Alps. The Vaudois permitted this detachment to penetrate a good way into their mountains, and then dividing themselves into two corps, they assailed it at once in front and rear. The combat lasted for five or six hours. There were nearly 500 of the French killed upon

¹ A letter from Rome, 16th June, 1691, says:—"The affairs of the conclave are no farther advanced than they were at the beginning, although it has lasted for five months already. The greatest disorders occur every day. More than 150 assassinations are already reckoned, &c." La Gazette (de France), number for August, 1691, p. 232.

² Mercuré hist., number for May, 1691, pp. 52, 60.

³ 2d April.

⁴ 21st March.

⁵ 9th June.

⁶ 30th May.

the spot, and about 300 taken prisoners, who were conveyed to Coni.

But winter was approaching. "The Vaudois," says a contemporary, "will be employed to guard the passes, in order to prevent the French army from obtaining the succours intended for it; and no doubt is entertained but that they will do this with success. Although their troops fight only according to the ordinary discipline, they do not fail to disconcert the French. They have always beaten them hitherto, and the Duke of Savoy has reason to be well satisfied with their assistance. M. Malet, the colonel of one of their regiments, and a captain, both Genevese, have deserted them, and gone to seek service in France. But far from being thrown into consternation by this, these poor people have redoubled their courage and hope, alleging that they cannot but succeed better than ever, having now none but faithful officers, of whom they can be confident."¹

But amidst their victories they were still poor. The Duke of Schonberg, who had now arrived in Piedmont, immediately perceiving the importance of these veteran legions, caused clothing to be sent to them for 4000 men, and abundant munitions of war.² He thought to augment their valour through their gratitude, and so to prepare them to support him with more enthusiasm in the grand enterprise which he meditated, of an invasion of Dauphiny. He hoped thus to force the French armies to leave Piedmont, in order to defend their own territory, and then he proposed to return into the dominions of the Duke of Savoy, to secure them against fresh aggressions. We shall presently see how he succeeded, and in what way the Vaudois aided him in his important operations.

¹ Mercur hist., number for April, 1692, p. 349.

² In June, 1692. These 4000 men were not all natives of the valleys, but partly refugees from different countries. The Vaudois amounted in number only to 1480, viz., thirteen companies of sixty men, under the command of M. De Loches=780; and fourteen companies of fifty men, under the command of M. St. Julien=700.

CHAPTER VI.

CONTINUATION AND CONCLUSION OF THE WAR BETWEEN LOUIS XIV. AND VICTOR AMADEUS; PARTICIPATION OF THE VAUDOIS IN THESE EVENTS, AND THEIR FORMAL RE-ESTABLISHMENT IN THE VALLEYS.¹

Reverses sustained by the Duke of Savoy in the war—Prince Eugene and the Duke of Schonberg come to his assistance—Decree of rehabilitation in favour of the Vaudois in 1692—Invasion of Dauphiny by the forces of the Piedmontese and their allies—Siege and capture of Embrun—Surrender of Gap—Illness of the Duke of Savoy, and close of the campaign of 1692—Catinat, the French commander, assumes the offensive in the beginning of 1693—The Duke of Savoy defeated in the plains of Marsaille—Catinat desolates Piedmont—The Vaudois harass the French army—Victor Amadeus publishes a new edict in favour of the Vaudois, in May, 1694—Successful enterprises of the Vaudois against the French—Victor Amadeus is detached from the league against the King of France, and enters into a new alliance with France.

TOWARDS the close of the year 1691, Arnaud returned to Switzerland, to visit his family; it was his office also to make arrangements for the return home of the exiles who still remained in foreign countries, and, at the same time, to promote the union of foreign refugees with the people of the valleys. Little could he suspect that in a few years more he would be proscribed anew, and that he was himself to re-conduct to a distant exile all those refugees to whom he now thought to give a country and a home. But at this period his prospects seemed bright; and it was over other heads that the heavens were darkened.

The year 1692 began very ominously for Victor Amadeus. Montmellian, the last of his places of strength in Savoy, had surrendered² after thirty days' bombardment, and more than a year of blockade. Italy, long torn in pieces by the rivalries of courts, and already fatigued by its wars with France, murmured grievously against the Duke of Savoy for engaging in a new contest, which had so rapidly resulted in misfortune. The youth of the duke ripened amidst these trials, and his firmness now made him appear greater than before. But he could not put confidence in his troops, whose leaders were men of no great abilities. It is not in soldiers that Italy has most frequently been found deficient, but in gene-itals. England and Austria undertook to furnish them. The former sent the Duke of Schonberg, the latter the Prince Eugene. Their arrival was worth an army. A council of war was held at Turin, to decide upon a plan of operations.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—The same as in the preceding chapters, especially the Mercurie historique and the Archives of Turin.

² On 21st December, 1692. The garrison did not leave it till the 22d.

The Italians thought that they should attack Catinat at Pignerol;¹ Eugene was of opinion that the war should be carried into Provence and Dauphiny. "It is better," said he, "that the enemy's country should suffer, than ours. Catinat will be obliged to evacuate Piedmont, in order to defend his own territory, and we will not turn the fertile plains of Piedmont into a field of battle." "But," it was objected, "the passage of the Alps is full of difficulties; the principal passes are guarded; Sestières, Sézane, and the Col De Tende are in the possession of the enemy." "We have still," it was replied, "the Vaudois valleys. Their inhabitants know all the intricacies of the mountains better than the French do. They will be able to guide us by routes which, as they are less frequented, will be so much the more secure." "Is it prudent," said the Italians, "to confide in a people with whom we were fighting but yesterday, and to put the destinies of a kingdom, so to speak, into the hands of those who were lately proscribed, and are still irritated?" "The force with which we will march," it was replied, "will be sufficiently imposing to retain them to their duty; moreover, it is of France that the Vaudois have most of all to complain: re-assure them as to their future prospects, and they will serve with increased ardour, and so become more formidable to the common enemy." "But what," it was asked, "if France, in her turn, should offer to protect them?" "She cannot do so," it was replied, "without deserting her own policy, and sooner or later they would be sacrificed. Their lawful sovereign alone has a claim on their loyalty; and in their duty to him they will not be deficient, if their country be given to them, for then they will have an interest in defending it, and will thus be attached to our cause by considerations of interest and of gratitude."

This opinion having been adopted, Victor Amadeus, who had already been urged thereto by Great Britain, issued, towards the end of June, 1692, a first decree of rehabilitation, of which the following are the principal provisions:—

¹ These and the following particulars are taken in part from L'Hist. du Prince François Eugène de Savoie, généralissime des armées de l'Empereur et de l'Empire, Amsterdam, 1740. (It is believed to have been written by a person named Mabillon, and is reputed the most complete work which has been published respecting this prince), t. i., l. ii., p. 151, et seq. I have also consulted the Mémoires de Feuquière; those of M. D. F. L., touchant ce qui s'est passé en Italie, entre Victor-Amédée II., et le roi T. C. . . . (Aix-la-Chapelle, 1697), the journals and pamphlets of the time, &c. But what I here present under the form of a dialogue, is merely the substance of the opinions expressed in different conferences respecting the Vaudois.

“The clear proofs of fidelity, and evident marks of zeal for our service, which our religionary subjects of the valleys of Lucerna have given, and daily continue to give us, &c., . . . having already induced us to receive them anew under our protection, we, for good reasons, think it right no longer to defer making manifest their complete re-establishment in our favour, in order the more to excite them to merit it. Therefore, by these presents, to which it is our pleasure to give the force of an edict, . . . and by the advice of our council, we grant to the aforesaid religionaries a full pardon and complete remission of all the crimes with which they have been charged,¹ . . . in general and in particular, . . . not excepting lese-majesty, Divine and human, . . . and of all the penalties declared or incurred upon account of the same, . . . revoking and annulling to this effect the following edicts² and their enterination, . . . so that for the future they shall remain without force or effect, as if they had never been made, ordaining that all those of the said religionaries who are still in prison shall be forthwith set at liberty, and that the sons and children of the said religionaries, of whatsoever age, and in whatsoever place of our dominions they may be, shall be allowed perfect freedom to return to their friends in the said valleys, and there to make profession of their religion; and that for this purpose they shall be given up without payment of any expenses, restoring the said religionaries to the possession of all and every one of their ancient rights, edicts, customs, usages, and privileges, and willing that they, their children and posterity, be maintained in the same.”³

He then enjoins all holders of any of the property of the Vaudois, fixed or movable, to render it up, without retaining any part, upon any pretext whatever. He decrees that the Vaudois shall no longer be prosecuted nor disturbed upon account of their religion, leaving them free to return to Protestantism, even if they should have abjured it. Finally, he authorizes all foreign religionaries to settle in the Vaudois valleys, upon condition of their taking the oath of fidelity to him.

Notwithstanding his favourable intentions towards the Vaudois, Victor Amadeus still showed in this decree a desire to cover, by some pretext, his recent severities, making reference for this purpose to the charges which had previously been brought against the Vaudois, as if justice ought not always to be regarded before grace is mentioned. By this, however, he did not escape the reprobations of the Holy See.¹ But, in the meantime, feeling confident of having re-attached to himself the intrepid mountaineers of the Vaudois Alps, he thought only how to profit by their valour. All these steps were taken, on his part, in order to accomplish by their aid an invasion of Dauphiny.

¹ But not convicted. Nor does the decree, in fact, relate to anything save the contraventions of the edicts afterwards cited.

² Those of 31st January and of 9th April, 1686.

³ This edict is little known; that of 23d May, 1694, having caused it to be forgotten. It is to be found recorded in the Lettres historiques, contenant tout ce qui se passe de plus important en Europe, &c., . . . ii. 32.

In order to draw away Catinat from Pignerol, where he would have been able to have closed the entrance to the Vaudois valleys against the troops of the Duke of Savoy, that prince directed a false attack on the side of Suza, as if it had been his intention to have forced the valley of the Doire. The French general fell into the snare which had been laid for him, and immediately abandoning Pignerol, he led his troops towards the part which was apparently menaced. The allies immediately profited by this to force Pêrouse and Briqueras. Prince Eugene led the advanced guard; Victor Amadeus, having General Caprara under him, commanded the main body of the army, in which the Count De La Torres, general of the Spanish forces, and the Marquis De Leganez, commanded the Milanese troops. The Prince De Commercy and the Marquis De Parelles led the rear-guard, composed of Savoyard, Imperial, and Italian regiments. These three invading corps marched at a certain distance from one another, under the direction of experienced guides, furnished by the valleys. The advanced guard penetrated into the valley of Pragela, whither a part of the main body followed it, under the orders of Victor Amadeus; the other part, commanded by the Duke of Schonberg, entered the valley of Lucerna. The Marquis De Parelles made his way into that of Barcelonnette, and that of St. Martin was invaded by the Marquis De Leganez. On arriving at Bobi the troops under the command of Schonberg separated into two divisions, of which one ascended the valley of the Pelis, and the other passed over the Col Julian, to join the troops of the Marquis De Parelles, coming by the lateral valley of St. Martin. These two detachments having effected a junction at Pral, were destined to traverse the Col d'Abriès, whilst the first division traversed the Col Laeroix.

But Prince Eugene had already passed over Mont Genevre, and seized Briançon. He burned that place, and descended by the valley of the Durance towards Mont Dauphin, which was not then fortified. The town of Guillestre alone detained him for a few days. It was surrounded with walls flanked with towers, but destitute of ditches. It had a garrison of 600 of the militia of Dauphiny, and 200 Irish, commanded by Colonel De Chalandren, who refused to surrender; and, accordingly, the place was besieged. It resisted, successfully at first; but Prince Eugene caused cannon to be brought, and in three days it was carried. His troops then joined those of Victor Amadeus and of the Prince De Commercy, to cross the Durance at St. Clement, in order to be able to proceed in a united body against Embrun.

¹ See the preamble of the edict of the Holy Office, dated 19th August, 1694.

Meanwhile, the Duke of Schonberg, who had ascended the valley of Lucerna, and passed over the Col Lacroix, took all the villages of the valley of the Guill, as far as Chateau Queyras; but that place resisted him. It is built upon an isolated rock, which rises in the form of a sugar-loaf, in one of the narrowest parts of the valley, and completely commands the pass. The Duke of Schonberg was not able to take it without artillery; he sent to ask some cannon from Victor Amadeus, who was already under the walls of Embrun, and who ordered him to rejoin him by the valley of the Durance. Chateau Queyras, therefore, was not taken. Schonberg rejoined the Duke of Savoy before the ancient capital of Caturigia,¹ where the greater part of the invading army had already been for four days.

The city of Embrun, fortified with ramparts and ditches, occupies a rocky platform, very precipitous towards the valley, where is a magnificent expanse of meadows watered by the Durance; but it is commanded by the mountain against which its platform leans, and it was upon this mountain that Prince Eugene at first took up his position. The Marquis De Larrey commanded in the city, the same who had already been defeated by the Vaudois in the conflict at Salabertrans. Victor Amadeus summoned him to surrender. "I value the good opinion of your royal highness too much to do so!" was his noble, courageous, and polite reply, worthy of the times of chivalry; and, notwithstanding the inferiority of his forces,² he commenced firing.

It became necessary to besiege Embrun with all the tediousness of a blockade. The trenches were opened on the 6th of August.

¹ Caturigia extended from Briançon to Nice. Embrun was its most important city. Nero accorded to the inhabitants of this city the right of Latinity; Galba also granted them some privileges. There exists a little known mock heroic poem, entitled L'Embrunade, on the disputes between the Jesuits and the Jansenists—disputes in which the bishop of this city had taken part. In 1692, before the arrival of the troops of Victor Amadeus, the bishop of Embrun conducted his chapter to Grenoble, as a place of safety, and then returned to his besieged metropolis, to watch over his flock.

² He had 25,000 infantry, 200 dragoons, and some militia.

The Marquis De Larrey made a number of very vigorous sorties, and killed many of the enemy;¹ but at last the heavy artillery made a breach in his walls;² he then proposed to capitulate,³ and was allowed to leave the place with the honours of war.⁴ The Duke of Savoy won in this affair eighteen or twenty pieces of cannon, 60,000 livres in gold, and a great quantity of provisions. He levied a great contribution, moreover, from the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood.

His army then marched towards Gap. Prince Eugene, who commanded the advanced guard, no sooner presented himself before that town, which was destitute of all means of resistance, than the magistrates sent him the keys. Some authors say that the whole of the Gapençois was laid under contribution, from Sisteron to Die; others that it was ravaged and pillaged as far as Sisteron. It is certain that great disorders took place; convents, churches, public institutions, and perhaps even private houses were plundered of all that was valuable. Soldiers might be seen, in their hours of leisure in the camp, to stake twenty louis on a card, with robber carelessness. These devastations were reprisals for those which the French army had committed in the Palatinate.

Catinat, who had for a moment been confounded by the bold manœuvre of the assailants, and the shame of being outwitted, now sent the Marquis De Liancourt with ten battalions to the neighbourhood of Grenoble, to secure that city against the allies. Provence and Dauphiny were in perpetual agonies of fear. These alarms increased, and spread with a rapidity proportionate to the success of the enemy. The panic extended as far as Lyons and Valence. At Grenoble consternation reigned; and the whole militia of the province were raised in the utmost haste.

But at the moment when the invading army was preparing to march upon Grenoble, the Duke of Savoy was seized with small-pox at Gap. He caused himself to be conveyed in a litter to Embrun. His wife came to him there. He made his will. His plans were all disconcerted. The report of his death was several times circulated. The Vaudois ministers, who at that time preached

¹ On the night between the 8th and 9th, he killed fifty men of the army of Victor Amadeus; on the night between the 10th and 11th, the Count De Lugiasco, a nephew of the Marquis De Parelles, was killed, and General De Torres was wounded; on the night between the 13th and 14th he made three other sorties, and killed or wounded more than 150 men.

² From the 13th to the 15th.

³ On the 16th.

⁴ The garrison was to be conducted to Grenoble, and not to recommence service for three weeks. Prisoners were to be exchanged. Ecclesiastical property was to be respected by the conqueror, but all which belonged to the King of France was to be delivered up to the Duke of Savoy.

publicly at Gap and Embrun, prayed for his preservation. His health was slowly re-established. Between the 15th and the 18th of September, 1692, all the allied troops recrossed the Alps, leaving only a garrison at Barcelonnette. But all warlike enterprises were postponed to the following year. The Vaudois alone distinguished themselves during the month of December, by a victory over a French detachment in the plains of St. Segont.

The Duke of Schonberg had returned to England, the Prince of Commercy and the Count De Montécuculi set out for Vienna. Eugene followed them; everything seemed quiet. Catinat himself had left Piedmont to go to Paris. He returned to Piedmont in the beginning of the year 1693. He longed to revenge himself for the check which he had met with in the preceding year, but he named as the cause of his irritation, only the ravages committed in Dauphiny. He promised to the volunteers of that province who should join his ranks, the pillage of all the towns of Piedmont which they should succeed in taking, and in particular that of the Vaudois valleys. Unfortunate valleys! he could find no very rich booty there.

About the end of January, the Count De Tessé, governor of Pignerol, led a foraging expedition in the direction of Saluces, and Victor Amadeus moved with his troops towards the city of Aosta. During the following month two traitors were executed in Turin, convicted of high treason, for having attempted to admit the French into the town of Coni. It is even alleged that they had contributed to the capture of Carmagnole.

But ere long the report of a private truce between Victor Amadeus and Louis XIV. became current in the political world. However, the troops of these two sovereigns always approached nearer and nearer to each other. The Marquis De Parelles occupied the passes leading to the valleys of Lucerna and Pragela. Being repulsed from the latter, he fell back upon Angrogna, and the French troops appeared at Pignerol.

The Duke of Schonberg was recalled. He assumed a position on the side of Giavenna. Prince Eugene also returned, and, in concert with the Marquis De Leganez, he drove Catinat back as far as Fenestrelle, making himself master of the fort of La Pérouse. But Pignerol still held out. A letter from Briançon, of date 15th of July, 1693, says: "Our army suffers much from the attacks which the Vaudois make upon our convoys. Within these two days they have taken from us twenty mules, laden with provisions and ammunition."¹

¹ Mercurie historique, number for August, 1693, p. 132.

The city of Pignerol was at last assailed. Being threatened with bombardment, it offered Victor Amadeus the sum of 40,000 pistoles for exemption from that calamity; but he rejected these proposals, and only granted to the ladies and the monks safe-conducts for their retirement elsewhere. He then caused the roads to be broken up, and the country to be laid waste all around the place, which was bombarded from the 25th of September to the 1st of October. But Catinat came in time to save it. Arriving in the plains of Marsaille on the 3d of October, he immediately offered battle to the Duke of Savoy. The duke fought and was defeated. His army was cut in pieces. He lost nearly 8000 men, 34 cannon, and 110 standards. Catinat, then spreading his troops over the whole plain of Piedmont, pillaged and burned everything to the very walls of Turin. Indescribable desolation reigned over that unhappy region. Victor Amadeus, vanquished, fugitive, driven from his own dominions, found his situation become more and more critical. Fortunately, Louis XIV. had need of his troops to maintain his wars against Holland, Spain, and England. He recalled them from Piedmont in the beginning of 1694, and they had much to suffer in crossing the Alps in the midst of winter. The Vaudois, accustomed to snows, then did them considerable injury. They surprised, and in part destroyed, the French cavalry in the mountains of the Malanage. Of thirty-six companies, there remained only 150 men. "The Marshal De Catinat," says a letter of that period, "had so great a fear of the ambuscades of the Vaudois, that he sent a herald with a trumpet to them, to say that if they would agree not to incommode him on his march, he, upon his part, would do them no harm. The Vaudois replied that they had no intention of opposing the French army, but that its passage would cost it at least the half of its baggage, and they have kept their word."¹

Catinat, however, returned to Pignerol in the beginning of spring, for Victor Amadeus had obtained considerable subsidies from the British parliament, to enable him to carry on the war with France, had caused Coni to be fortified, gone to Milan,² and afterwards, returning to Turin,³ renewed his armaments with the aid of Spain and Austria. At this time also, in order, no doubt, to recompense the Vaudois for the zeal which they had displayed in his service, and to encourage their fidelity, he reiterated, by a new edict,⁴ the promises which he had made them, and the assurance of their re-

¹ Lettres historiques, v., 135.

² January—March, 1694.

³ He arrived there on the 24th of February, and was in danger of losing his life there in a fire.

⁴ 8th March.

storation to their old rights in their own valleys.¹ Accordingly, they continued to give him the most signal proofs of their valour and attachment. In the month of June they made prize of a convoy of fifty mules, which was proceeding to Pignerol; and being pursued by M. De Larrey, had very nearly succeeded in taking him prisoner.

Amongst the Vaudois captains, Imbert, Gudin, Peyrot, Châtillon, Bernardin, Jahier, Odier, Combe, and Caffarel particularly distinguished themselves in these sudden and gallant exploits. The Vaudois alone, it is said in a letter of that time, make themselves to be spoken of in these parts. After hostilities had recommenced, they every day gained some new advantage. In July they again seized 150 mules, which were proceeding from Suza to Pignerol, and on this occasion they presented to the Duke of Savoy the four finest beasts of the convoy.²

However, a decisive battle seemed likely soon to take place. In the month of August the Spanish troops left Villefranche, and fixed their headquarters at St. Segont. The troops of Victor Amadeus encamped at Bubiano, having their right towards Mentbrun, and their left towards Briquèras. Meanwhile, a new army, commanded by the Duke De Vendôme, advanced from France against Piedmont, by the valley of Barcelonnette, and by Nice and Antibes.

The Vaudois continued, without ceasing, their victorious incursions. On the night between the 11th and 12th of August, they assembled to the number of 1200, and attacked three French battalions, in the neighbourhood of Pignerol. Not being able to break through their intrenchments, they feigned flight, retired to the heights, and drew the French from the camp in pursuit of them. Then suddenly turning upon them, they attacked them with such impetuosity, that they killed entire companies before they could recover from their surprise, and the rest took to flight, flinging away their arms and baggage. "These the Vaudois seized, and the booty was considerable. They obtained by this affair more than 20,000 livres of money, which had been destined for the payment of the troops; they took 300 horses and mules; the new clothes of a whole regiment; the equipage of all the officers, amongst which they found some complete services of silver plate, and a number of very rich dresses and jewelled arms. Their booty was valued altogether at more than 100,000 livres."³

¹ Of 23d May, 1694, enterinated on the 25th. For the terms of this edict, and the disputes to which it gave rise, see next chapter.

² Lettres historiques, number for August, p. 138. ³ Id. number for Sept., p. 262.

Encouraged by this success, they carried their arms into the dominions of the King of France, and attacked a number of villages in Dauphiny. For this the garrison of Pignerol resolved to take revenge. Their flying camp had been established near St. Germain. Four detachments advanced by different routes, in order to surprise it. The first of these detachments attacked the Vaudois in front, whilst another crossed the Cluson to Pomaret, in order to take them in flank; meanwhile, a third detachment ascended the right bank of the river, to attack them on the opposite flank; and the 800 men who composed the fourth climbed the mountain of Les Cerisiers, in order to fall upon them from behind. These movements seemed to be so skilfully combined, that none of the mountaineers could escape. But their advanced guard sustained alone the shock of the first assailants; and their main body, facing to the three other sides, repulsed the enemy on all hands, compelling them to retire with great loss. Next day the Vaudois, returning to the French territories, seized Abriès, in the valley of Le Queyras, and then Aiguilles and the surrounding hamlets; after which they turned from the castle of Queyras, not being able to make themselves masters of it, for want of artillery, and crossing the mountains which separated them from the valley of Arvieux, carried by assault intrenchments which had been formed at the base of Mount Isoard or Isoire, where they took thirty-six prisoners and much booty. When they offered his life to the officer who commanded this post, he bravely replied, "What would I make of it? without honour it is nothing to me!" And he preferred to die rather than to surrender.

Other detachments were mastered in succession; and then the Vaudois, crossing the mountain, descended to Servières, and penetrated as far as Le Villar, situated near Briançon. They seized this post likewise, it being guarded only by sixty dragoons, and burned 25,000 quintals of fodder, which had been amassed there. The whole country was thrown into consternation as far as Embrun; but the conquerors, who did not choose to compromise their success by any rash daring, retired with their booty, and carried with them 100 prisoners.

Many other expeditions of the same sort afterwards took place, with like advantage,¹ sometimes into the valley of La Pérouse, sometimes into that of Pragela, and sometimes into that of Le Queyras. But without prolonging the narrative of these details, which have little to do with the essential character of the Vaudois, let us rapidly glance at the termination of the contest, in which they bore so glorious a part. Victor Amadeus being solicited to make peace by the pope and the princes of Italy, as well as by the Duke of Orleans and the Count De Tessé, who were sent to assure him of favourable inclinations on the part of France, was at last detached from the league which had been formed against that power. On the 4th of July, 1696,¹ he concluded a private treaty of peace with France, by which all his cities and towns were restored to him. One of the articles of the treaty concerned the marriage of Marie Adelaide, his eldest daughter, with the Duke De Bourgogne. This was the fifth direct alliance which the house of Savoy had contracted with that of France. The Piedmontese princess was received by Louis XIV., who came as far as Montargis to meet her;² and Victor Amadeus was received by Catinat, in the capacity of generalissimo of the French armies. A few weeks before he had been the generalissimo of the armies of the coalition opposed to France. Never before had any prince been, in the same campaign, at the head of two hostile armies, as their commander-in-chief. The circumstance reflects more honour on his astuteness than on his integrity.

¹ See Mercuré historique et politique, xviii. 132, 254, 365, and xix. 146. Lettres historiques, from vol. v. to vol. x., &c.

The city of Pignerol, and the valley of Pérouse, which had for sixty-eight years belonged to France, now again became part of the dominions of Piedmont. The fortresses of Pignerol were razed, but its inhabitants were authorized to inclose it with a wall.

We shall now proceed to take up the series of events which followed the promulgation of the edict by which the Vaudois were formally re-established in their valleys; and we shall then see in what manner their church was reorganized, after having been so long persecuted, and recently, to all appearance, destroyed.

¹ L'art de vérifier les dates, in the article on Victor Amadeus II., places the signature of this treaty on the 30th of August, but it was not published till the 10th of September.

² 5th November, 1696. As she was very young, her marriage did not take place till 7th December, 1697.

CHAPTER VII.

PROTEST OF THE COURT OF ROME AGAINST THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF THE VAUDOIS; FIRMNESS OF VICTOR AMADEUS II.; RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE VAUDOIS CHURCH; NEW EDICT OF EXPULSION IN 1698.¹

Analysis of the edict of May 23, 1694—Artful reservations of tyranny—Irritation of the court of Rome—Papal condemnation, and pretended abrogation of the edict—The Duke of Savoy resists this usurpation of Rome, and the Senate of Turin annuls the papal decree—Efforts of the Vaudois for the reorganization of their church—Pensions granted to the Vaudois pastors and schoolmasters by Queen Mary II. of England—Assistance obtained also from Holland—Acts of the Vaudois Synod concerning the observance of the Sabbath—Other acts and proceedings of the Synod—Church government and discipline—The Duke of Savoy refuses to permit the incorporation of the Vaudois of P'crouse with the church of the valleys—Fresh acts of injustice and severity against the Vaudois—Secret article in the treaty of peace between France and Piedmont—Edict requiring all French Protestants to leave the dominions of the Duke of Savoy—Emigration of more than 3000 persons.

THE decree of 23d May, 1694, declared as follows:²—

1. It was upon the urgent instigations of a foreign power that the edicts of 1686 were issued by the Duke of Savoy, against his faithful subjects of the Vaudois valleys.

2. These edicts are revoked.

3. The duke receives his faithful subjects into favour, upon account of their zeal for his service, as well as the pressing solicitations of his Britannic majesty, and of the States-General of Holland. A full and entire amnesty is granted to the Vaudois for all which has taken place since 1686.

4. They are re-established in their valleys, in the same manner as before. The children that have been taken away shall be restored to them,¹ the prisoners shall be released, relapsed persons shall not be prosecuted, and foreign Protestants shall be permitted to settle in the valleys.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—Part of the preceding authorities.—“Mercuré historique.”—“Lettres historiques et politiques.”—Archives of the Court of Turin.—“Racconto historico dell' ultima guerra, tra Francesi e collegati in Piemonte, Delphinato e stato di Milano, per Giuseppe Reyna.”—Monastier, chap. xxvi.—Jones, “History of the Christian Church” . . . vol. viii.—Baird, “History of Protestantism in Italy” . . . vol. iii.—“Mémoires de M.D.F.L. touchant ce qui s'est passé en Italie, entre Victor-Amédée II., Duc de Savoie, et le roi T.C. avec le détail*,” &c. . . Aix-la-Chapelle, 1697.—Botta, “History of Italy,” and Cantu, “Universal History” (both in Italian).—Archives of the Vaudois Table.—Synodal Acts of the valleys.—Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva.

² It is too long to be here given entire. I quote only the principal paragraphs. It has been published by Duboin, and by M. Hahn, p. 723.

* Tiès Chrétien; Louis XIV.

5. The French refugees upon account of religion, shall not be entitled to enjoy these privileges any longer than during the continuance of the present war, except those who shall not have been restored to their own country. The inhabitants of the valleys of Pérouse and Pragela shall continue to enjoy them for ten years after the termination of the war.

A pompous parade of fine words about privileges, liberty, and prerogatives, lavished upon the Vaudois in this edict, was the artful covering of these cruel reservations of a tyranny which had really yielded nothing. Yet surely these poor Vaudois, who had suffered so much, and who had just displayed so much courage, might well have demanded more securities for their future tranquillity than they had possessed before. However, they received with thankfulness what was granted to them. Of the 424 families who had embraced Catholicism in 1686, 421 returned to the evangelical religion.

“At all this,” says a letter from Rome,³ “the pope has been very much irritated. It is reported that he has ordered his nuncio at Turin to protest against that edict, and retire. The Duke of Savoy’s envoy at Rome has also been requested to return to Turin.”

France, which neglected no means of exciting new enemies against Victor Amadeus, augmented as much as possible the irritation of the Holy See against him. The French government had laboured for this end from the time when the first edict of restoration to their country was issued in favour of the Vaudois in 1692. The Duke De Chaulnes and the Cardinal De Bouillon, and afterwards also the Cardinal Caffanalta, represented this re-establishment of the Vaudois as a fatal blow to the church, and an outrage against her authority. However, Innocent XII. was far from being distinguished for intolérance. He had even granted absolute liberty of conscience to the inhabitants of Civita Vecchia, a town situated at the very gates of Rome, in order to attract more commerce to that seaport. It seemed, therefore, that he had no reason to be offended because the same liberty had been restored to those who had always enjoyed it. But men are often governed, not so much by their convictions as by their interest. Innocent XII. denounced the edict of 23d May, 1694, to the chamber of the Holy Office, charging the chamber to examine it. This was, in fact, to demand a condemnation of it. The tribunal of the Inquisition assembled on the 19th of August, in the presence of the pope himself. The following are extracts from the decree which it passed upon this occasion:—

¹ This clause was often eluded; for the child-stealers passed the children from one to another, until all trace of them was lost. In other instances, after having restored them, they carried them off anew. Sometimes they even plainly refused to give them up, or replied that they were no longer in life.

² This was merely to postpone new severities, already giving cause of apprehension regarding them.

³ Lettres historiques, No. for September, 1694, p. 246.

“Our most holy father, Innocent XII., having been apprised, by certain pious persons, that there was reason to fear that the most serene lord, Victor Amadeus II., Duke of Savoy, moved by the continual and importunate suggestions of heretical states and princes, might be induced at last to abrogate those most laudable laws which he had made in favour of the Catholic religion, and against his heretical subjects of the valleys of Lucerna . . . &c. . . . His holiness, in so evident a peril of the orthodox faith, immediately addressed his paternal admonitions to the most serene duke, after having frequently spoken of the matter to the resident of Savoy, and subsequently, by letters-apostolical, to the nuncio and the inquisitor at Turin. These paternal warnings were not without effect for a time. But a few months after, advice having come that the firmness of the duke was shaken, . . . his holiness made every effort to lead him to reject all accommodation with the heretics, because such an agreement would be an offence to God, scandalous to all the faithful, dangerous to neighbouring nations, &c. . . . However, by an edict of 23d May, 1694, the said duke has not only abrogated the above-cited laws, but (which cannot be mentioned without tears) he has expressly permitted that the children of the heretics which had been taken from them should be restored to their parents, to the evident damnation of their souls, &c. . . . Wherefore his holiness, in his zeal for the house of God, and according to the duty of the pastoral charge which has been intrusted to him from on high, . . . has cased, annulled, invalidated, and condemned the above-cited edict, and all that it contains, as being monstrous, impious, detestable, &c., . . . ordaining that this edict . . . shall be reputed as never having been framed nor issued, . . . and enjoining all archbishops, bishops, inquisitors, &c., to act as hitherto against the heretics, without regard to this deed, . . . which is declared to be abrogated in virtue of the present decree.”¹

A number of secondary disputes had preceded this decision,²

¹ This decree may be seen in Borelli. I cannot give it entire.

² The Archives of Turin contain many papers relative to this subject. The fol-

and new disputes followed it.¹ All Europe watched the strife, impatient to know which of these powers would prove victorious. The Duke of Savoy, disconcerted at first by the decree of the Inquisition, aroused himself to display a proper sense of his dignity as a sovereign. "He considered," says a contemporary, "that upon such occasions firmness alone could command success, and that the court of Rome would not fail to crush him if he manifested even the least fear."² He therefore ordered the senate of Turin to examine the decree of the Holy Office. The procurator-general, Rocca, demanded that this deed should be declared ill-grounded, and that the edict for the re-establishment of the Vaudois should be maintained in force, rather as an act of justice than of grace.³ The advocate-general, Frechignone, supported these views, and the senate, on the 2d of September, 1694, passed a decree, by which it cassed and annulled that of the Inquisition, prohibiting, under pain of death, its publication in the dominions of Savoy, and confirmed, in all its provisions, the edict of the 23d of May in favour of the Vaudois.

The Abbot of Pignerol alone, according to the journals of that time, ventured to publish and support the decree of the Inquisition. I am not aware that that ecclesiastic was prosecuted. But Victor Amadeus acted with equal firmness and prudence, for he gave orders to his resident at the court of Rome to communicate to the pope what he had done, and to assure him that no sovereign in Europe would any longer suffer such abuse of power on the part lowing are the titles of some of those anterior to the decree of the Inquisition:—Scrittura del Archivesc. e del Padre Inquisitore di Torino concernente la famigliarità e il commercio de catholici con quelli della religione, &c. . . .—Scrittura del S. Conte Peyrani, contro quella di Monsignor Arcivescovo e del Padre Inquisitore, &c. . . .—Parere d'un Teologo di Roma, circa l'editto de S.A.R. a favore de Valdesi.—Scrittura de mandar a Roma toccante le valli di Lucerna, &c.

¹ The documents connected with the disputes which followed the papal decree are too numerous to be quoted. They consist chiefly of despatches of Marcello Di Gubernatis, the resident of Savoy at Rome, in which he gives an account to Victor Amadeus of his negotiations with the pope and cardinals.—There are also extant dissertations, by Piedmontese jurists and theologians, on the force of the pontifical decree, some of these dissertations forming thick folio manuscripts.—There are, moreover, detached documents, Progetto di lettera all' Inquisizione; and, amongst others, a letter which is entirely in the handwriting of Victor Amadeus, and is addressed to the archbishop of Turin. The envelope which contains it bears this superscription:—Minuta di lettera di S.A.R. all' Archivesco di Torino, in occasione d'una scrittura pubblicata in Torino, contro gl' eretici, &c. (Archives of State, Turin.)

² Lettres historiques, No. for October, 1694, p. 367.

³ Com' un effetto più di giustizia che de grazia. (Copia di ramostranza del Proc. Gen. Rocca, sulla giustizia dell' arresto a sua istanza dato del senato contro il decreto della sagra congregazione, &c. Archives of Turin.)

of the Holy See. Spain and Austria having made similar protestations, the pope seemed to discover that he had gone wrong, and ordered his nuncio at Turin not to publish the decree against which so many voices were raised.

This affair seemed, therefore, to have terminated; but as the court of Rome drew back, the Duke of Savoy became more jealous of his prerogatives, and proceeded further to require that the tribunal of the Inquisition should be abolished altogether, for having arrogated an authority which amounted, as he said, to an usurpation of his own. "You may well believe," says a contemporary, "that that tribunal, the haughtiest and most imperious in the world, is exceedingly enraged."¹ But Victor Amadeus had assumed the offensive only the better to secure his victory; and, after some negotiations, the matter was arranged.

The Vaudois, meanwhile, laboured to restore their ancient organization. Almost all the exiled families, and almost all that had joined the Church of Rome, had returned to the country and to the church in which they had been born. The Vaudois troops had taken their place among the regular forces of Victor Amadeus. The peasants were occupied with the cultivation of their lands, and the rebuilding of their houses and their sanctuaries;² and the spiritual guides of this small people laboured to increase their own numbers, or to make amends for the want of numbers by activity.

In 1692, ere yet the edict had been published which restored them to their former position, having received, by an order of the day, a promise of their speedy re-establishment in the heritages and rights of their fathers, they held a synod, "to begin," its acts say, "the restoration of good order among them, notwithstanding the troubles which always continue to disquiet them."³ Their first act was to appoint a religious festival, to be observed in all the valleys,⁴ to render thanks to God for having brought them back to that ancient sanctuary of the gospel, and a solemn fast, to obtain relief from the trials to which they were exposed.

"In the year 1692," says a memoir of that period,⁵ "there were already twelve churches in the valleys, but they were unable to

¹ Lettres historiques, p. 595.

² In the year 1686, all the Protestant places of worship in the valleys were thrown down to their foundations. Memoire sur l'état présent des Eglises Vaudoises (1705), communicated by the late M. Appia, of Frankfort.

³ Synodal acts of the Vaudois valleys. Archives of the Table. Synod of Les Copiers, 18th April, 1692.

⁴ It took place on the 4th of May.

⁵ Communicated by M. Appia. The substance of it is contained in the Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors at Geneva.

maintain their pastors. Queen Mary,¹ of eternal and blessed memory, having been informed of this distress, extended to them her charity, by establishing twelve pensions, of 100 crowns each, one for every pastor, and a like number, of fifty English crowns each, for every schoolmaster." This assistance was afterwards increased with the number of the parishes, and soon amounted to the sum of £150 sterling, which was annually sent by bills of exchange, payable at Turin. This sum not having appeared in the civil list during the reign of William III.,² the payment of it was suspended for some years after his death. A special deputation of the Vaudois was sent to London, to obtain the renewal of the benefaction.³

In 1692 there were only nine pastors in the valleys,⁴ of whom one alone supplied the valley of St. Martin. Their number increased after the first edict of re-establishment was issued.⁵ During

¹ Daughter of James II., and wife of William III., born Prince of Orange. Queen Mary died on 7th January, 1695—her husband on 19th March, 1702. Both the one and the other always manifested the liveliest interest in the Vaudois, and a constant jealousy of Louis XIV.

² These particulars are derived from the preface to the Records of the Church of Durmentz, a Vaudois colony in Wurtemberg.

³ From the same source. It was the pastor Montoux who was sent to London for this object.

⁴ These were David Léger, pastor at Bobi; James Mayer, at Pramol; Henry Arnaud, at Rora, and at the Vineyards of Lucerna; William Malanot, at Angrogna; Dumas, at St. John; Giraud, at La Tour; Javel, at Rocheplate (the same who was formerly at Stendal); and Montoux (who had been a prisoner from August, 1689, to July, 1690), in the valley of St. Martin.

⁵ In the month of June, 1692, the former pastor of Rocheplate, named Bernard Mayer, having returned to the valleys, was settled again in his old parish; and Javel was then conjoined with Montoux to preach in the valley of St. Martin. A few days after, another minister, Papon, also arrived, recommended by the Duke of Schonberg, who took a great interest in the Vaudois, and by Van-der-Meer, the resident of Holland. The parishes of St. Germain and Pomaret were assigned him as a sphere for his ministry; but in the month of November, the pastor having represented that he found it impossible properly to supply two places so distant from one another, his field of labour was restricted to St. Germain and L'Anvers Pinache. In the course of the same year, the parish of Ville Sèche, to which the Léger family belonged, demanded for their minister David Léger, who was then pastor at Bobi, but who had formerly been settled among them; and received the promise of him as soon as he could go to reside at Ville Sèche. At the same time the parish of Macel received a young minister, named Laurence Bertin, who had just terminated his studies; and next year, M. Cyrus Chyon presented himself, the old colleague of Arnaud and Montoux, who was to have accompanied the Vaudois in their return, but was taken prisoner on the first day. Having been detained at Chambéry till 1691, he then entered the service of the Duke of Schonberg, as chaplain to one of his regiments. He received the promise of the first place that should become vacant in the valleys. He occupied the parish of Pomaret for some weeks, after which we lose all trace of him. Perhaps he returned to the Grisons, where he had left his family in 1690. He was a native of Crest, in Dauphiny, and his first charge had been that of Pont-en-Royans, on the banks of the Isère. How adventurous was then the career of the ministers of the persecuted church!

the course of this year five synods were held.¹ The council for managing the affairs of the church, called the Vaudois Table, was then formed, as follows:—DAVID LÉGER, Moderator; HENRY ARNAUD, Moderator Adjoint; and WILLIAM MALANOT, Secretary. These ecclesiastical officers were charged with the duty of writing to the different Protestant states of Europe which took an interest in the Israel of the Alps, to inform them of their new situation, to thank them for benefits conferred, and to ask the continuance of their kind support, by the help of which alone it now seemed possible that the Vaudois Church could rise from the ruins accumulated in its valleys during six years of calamity.

Holland, in particular, responded to this appeal, sending contributions for the maintenance of a superior school, and for the relief of the more urgent cases of distress. One of the richest citizens of that country, M. Clignet, to whose generosity the Vaudois had been indebted for the pecuniary means necessary to the accomplishment of their expedition of return, completed his work by assisting them to carry out their schemes of consolidation. The universities of Lausanne, Basle, and Utrecht founded bursaries for the maintenance of young students from the valleys, who should devote themselves to the ministry of the gospel in their native land.²

One of the first decisions of the fifth synod of 1692 was (in the words of the synod), "that for the future it means and wishes that all Vaudois candidates for the ministry [proposants] refrain from offering themselves for examination, and from receiving imposition of hands out of the valleys, without the consent and advice of the pastors of the Vaudois Church."³ The synod following was occupied with the discipline of the Church. "The meeting, seeing with regret the excesses which are committed on the Sabbath day, in games and in public-houses, exhorts the faithful to employ that day in the service of God, and charges the consistory of each parish to attend to this matter."⁴ Military habits, a wandering life, and the interruption of regular public worship—all of which causes had exercised their influence on the Vaudois during the immediately preceding years—explain in part the abuses here complained of. But

¹ Viz., on 18th April, 20th June, 28th June, 1st September, and 30th November. The place of meeting was always at Les Copiers, the place of worship there being the only one, it is said, which remained undemolished in 1686.

² That of Utrecht lasted only for twelve years. The first bursary founded in Geneva for Vaudois students was not till 1725. (Succour of different kinds had, however, been regularly enough given them since 1655.) The Queen of England also offered, in 1694, to maintain at her own expense, in the universities of her kingdom, ten students of the Vaudois valleys. (See Synod of 6th October, 1694.)

³ Acts of Synod of November, 1692. (Archives of the Table.)

⁴ Same source.—Synod of 15th and 16th September, 1693.

the synodal meeting did not confine its solicitude to measures of repression; it felt that it was necessary also to prevent and correct; "and concerning the representation which has been made, that great ignorance prevails amongst the people concerning the mysteries of the gospel, it has been resolved that catechetical examinations shall be held upon week days and upon Sabbath evenings, in which adults shall be catechized as well as children."¹ This synod was occupied also with the organization of particular consistories, intended to watch over the interests of morality, and the exercise of discipline in each of the Vaudois parishes.

Next year the act relative to the sanctification of the Sabbath was renewed,² and parishes were exhorted to contribute for the maintenance of their pastors.³ At the same time, the deputies of

¹ Acts of Synod of 15th and 16th September, 1693. (Archives of the Table).—The catechism of Drelincourt was adopted as a manual for these catechizings.

² Synod of 3d June, 1694.

³ Synod of 6th October, 1694. These voluntary contributions, which afterwards became obligatory, were long the occasion of many difficulties. I have passed over in silence the greater part of these painful contentions between the pastor and his parish, or a certain number of his parishioners.—I subjoin, as a memorandum of them, the rates of the spontaneous contributions which were afterwards fixed for each church of the valleys.* These churches were divided into great and small, according to their resources.

The great churches of the valley of Lucerna were to furnish—BOBI, 650 francs for the pastor (it had formerly given 700), and 150 francs for the schoolmaster; † VILLAR (with four annexed churches), 650 and 180 francs; ‡ LA TOUR, 600 for the pastor, and 170 for the schoolmaster. At ST. JOHN there was no pastor, but a master, who received 200 francs. ANGROGNA gave 600 francs to the pastor (it had formerly given 700), and 160 for the schoolmaster; RORA, the only small church of the valley of Lucerna, gave only 100 francs to the pastor. The parish of Prarusting and Rocheplate, situated between the two valleys, and considered as a great church, gave to the pastor 580 francs, and 150 to the schoolmaster. ST. GERMAIN and PFAMOL, ranked among the small churches, gave, the former 500 francs, and the latter 400 francs to the pastor, and 50 francs each to the schoolmaster.

Churches of the valley of St. Martin.—VILLE SECHE, the only great church, which gave formerly 600 francs to the pastor, was now to give 550, but was in so exhausted a condition, that even this contribution was impossible. It continued to pay 48 francs to the schoolmaster. POMARET, although numbered among the small churches, gave 500 francs and 62 francs. MANEILLE and MACEL, PRAL and RODORET, two other small churches, gave 500 francs each to their respective pastors, and 48 francs to the schoolmaster. But the number of teachers was too small, for one for each parish was not sufficient, and yet there were many difficulties to overcome, in order to obtain payment of these contributions, and many delays before they were paid. The pastors who were least urgent in their demands allowed arrears to run up till payment became impossible; and when, pressed by imperious necessities, any of them demanded payment of what was due to him, deplorable

* When the supplies from England were reduced to £268 sterling, in consequence of the necessity of dividing these resources with the Vaudois colonies founded in Germany after 1698.

† There were in this commune four other schoolmasters besides, who taught only in winter, and received 20 francs.

‡ There were here also four district regents, who received 16 francs.

this Vaudois church, so long tossed with tempests, and scarcely yet restored to a position of security, manifested a truly Christian solicitude regarding their suffering brethren; and among the acts of the first synod of 1693 we read as follows:—"The company, sensibly touched with the pitiful state of our poor brethren who are unjustly detained in the galleys of France, resolved to write to the evangelical cantons of Switzerland, to entreat them to use their influence with the king in their favour." The synod then considered the case of those of the Vaudois who were in the same situation.¹ The assistance of a physician,² and the services of a general regent,³ were secured. The latter subsequently became rector of the Latin school. *Colloques*⁴ and conferences were then established, in which the consistories should meet together "for censure of pastors and elders, according to the ancient custom."⁵ Even private persons were invited to submit their differences to the arbitration of these bodies, in order to avoid the scandal and expense of lawsuits.⁶ Finally, as there flowed to the valleys a great number of vagabond foreigners, it was resolved that no one should be admitted to participation of the sacraments, in any congregation but his own, without a certificate from his pastor.⁷ The synod aimed also at forming a collection of documents, which might be of importance for the history of the recent events; but the persons who undertook this task never accomplished it.⁸

In the midst of these arrangements a new event once more changed the aspect of things in the Vaudois valleys. Victor Amadeus having regained possession of Pérouse,⁹ the synod sent a deputation to him, to request that its inhabitants might be permitted thenceforth to form one ecclesiastical body with their brethren of the other valleys.¹⁰ The duke replied in an evasive manner; and disputes arose between the parish and its pastor. Facts of this kind abound in the Archives. (The contributions marked in this note all relate to the period extending from the end of the 17th to the end of the 18th century.)

¹ Synod of 6th October, 1694.

² At a cost of 400 francs, taken from the sum total of the contributions. The first who filled this situation was named Balcet.

³ A sum of 300 francs was assigned for his salary, and was to be paid proportionally by all the parishes.

⁴ Synod of 6th October, 1694.

⁵ Synod of 17th June, 1695. These conferences took place before the Easter festivals.

⁶ In October, 1694.

⁷ Synod of 25th April, 1697.

⁸ At first, M. Dubourdieu voluntarily offered to undertake it (Synod of 27th October, 1693); afterwards, John Pastre was charged with this duty by the Synod of 25th October, 1695.

⁹ By the treaty of Turin of 29th August, 1696.

¹⁰ Archives of Le Villar.—MS. vol. marked Religionarii, fol. 102 and 103.

shortly after he expressly prohibited all sorts of religious connection between the one and the other. Signs began also to appear of an increasing severity against the people of the valleys. The carrying off of children had re-commenced without being punished. Extraordinary contributions were demanded of the Vaudois for the cantoning of troops. The demand was even made that they should pay the public burdens for their lands for the whole time during which they had been exiled and their lands uncultivated.¹ The people, already so impoverished, thus found themselves oppressed with a debt of 300,000 francs, of which they had to pay the interest every year.² "It is impossible to imagine," said Walkenier, "how they can maintain their position in that country. By the burdens imposed upon them they are so laden with debt, that they are already all but compelled to go and seek the means of subsistence elsewhere. They will be obliged to sell their properties at a price far below their value, and for this many Roman Catholics are waiting in expectation."³

The peace which Victor Amadeus concluded with France in 1696, far from bringing to his subjects of the valleys the repose which seemed likely to flow from it, became more onerous to them than the war. The malignant jealousy and wrath of their popish neighbours began to be accompanied with some hope even of a new persecution.

In the spring of 1698, a Jesuit, attended by a number of monks, having visited all the valleys in succession, addressed a report to the pope; and in consequence of this report, the Marquis De Spada immediately set out from Rome for Turin, where he had a conference with the apostolic nuncio.⁴ Louis XIV. at this time was persecuting to the uttermost the Protestants of Dauphiny; and as the Duke of Savoy had just concluded a family alliance with that monarch, it was supposed that the conference above mentioned most probably had for its object a scheme for the total extirpation of the Vaudois. The Vaudois themselves say in a memorial,⁵ "Our condition is so lamentable that it is truly worthy of compassion. We

¹ Dieterici, G. VII.

² Memoir on the State of the Valleys. MS. in the library of the late M. Appia.

³ Letters of Walkenier, the resident of Holland in Switzerland, and reports cited by Dieterici, G. VII. (Year 1698.) Other letters on the same subject; Archives of Berne, compartment E; Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. O, pp. 391, 421, &c.

⁴ These particulars are derived from the letters of Walkenier, quoted by Dieterici, and from others still unpublished.

⁵ Briève description de l'estat pitoyable des Eglises des vallées sous la domination du duc de Savoie. (Quoted by Dieterici.) See also Lettres historiques, t. xiii. p. 163.

are every day alarmed by being told that we will not be long here, and that it has been resolved to make us leave the country."

These alarms were not without foundation. In the treaty of peace, concluded on the 18th of August, 1696, between France and Piedmont, was a secret article,¹ which was not published even after the treaty of Ryswick,² but of which the purport was gradually made manifest. This article was in the following terms:—"His royal highness (Victor Amadeus) will cause an edict to be published, forbidding, under pain of corporal punishment, the inhabitants of the valleys of Lucerna, known by the name of Vaudois, from having any religious communication with the subjects of his most Christian majesty (Louis XIV.), and from this day forth his royal highness will not permit the subjects of the King of France to settle in any manner in the said valleys. . . . He will, moreover, prohibit all preachers from setting foot on the French territory, . . . and, finally, he engages not to permit the pretended Reformed religion in the territories which have been ceded to him." These territories were neither more nor less than the valleys of Pérouse and Pragela.

Accordingly the Duke of Savoy issued, on the 1st of July, 1698, an edict,³ by which he ordained that all French Protestants settled in his dominions, even ministers, notwithstanding any permission previously obtained, should leave his dominions within the space of two months, under pain of death. "Those," he says, "who have become proprietors of lands in the country, and who shall not have sold their properties at that date, will then receive the estimated value of them from the hands of the intendant of Pignerol." All Vaudois pastors are, moreover, forbidden to penetrate into the dominions of the King of France, under pain of ten years of the galleys.

The preamble of this edict bears that it was issued in virtue of the seventh article of the treaties of Turin and Ryswick; "and wishing, therefore," it is then said, "to comply with what has been signified to us on the part of his majesty (Louis XIV.), we ordain all the inhabitants of the Vaudois valleys to have no intercourse with the subjects of his most Christian majesty in regard to matters of religion, under pain of three lashes with a rope (public flagellation) for each offence." It is easy to perceive that great trouble and painful separations must have ensued in the families affected by this edict. The greater part of the foreign refugees were connected with the Vaudois, either by blood or by common sympathies and interests. But now they were driven to seek refuge elsewhere. In the year preceding, the inhabitants of Pragela had already taken steps with this view, for the character of the negotiations of Ryswick and the last orders of Louis XIV. had made them apprehensive of some new calamity. "They treat of peace," wrote Arnaud to Walkenier, "but, according to my poor judgment, it is not yet a time of peace."¹

¹ It is § VII.

² 20th September, and 30th October, 1697.

³ It is printed in the Lettres historiques, t. xiv. pp. 136-139.

Never, in fact, unless in 1686, had these fair regions been more distressfully agitated. More than 3000 emigrants left their home for foreign lands, to which we shall now follow them in the next chapter.

CHAPTER VIII.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS COLONIES FOUNDED IN WURTEMBERG AFTER THE EXPULSION OF 1698.—PART FIRST.²

(A.D. 1698 to A.D. 1699.)

Expulsion of ministers and people not natives of the valleys—Emigration from the valley of Pragela—Proposal for the establishment of a Vaudois colony near Gochsheim, in Wurtemberg—Generous conduct and enlightened views of the Count of Neustadt—He resists attempted intolerance—Three thousand Protestants leave the valleys—Their reception in Switzerland—Their negotiations with the government of Wurtemberg—Difficulties—Energy and activity of Arnaud—Walkenier negotiates for the exiles with the government of Wurtemberg, as plenipotentiary of Holland and other Protestant powers—Terms agreed upon—Pensions for pastors and schoolmasters obtained from England.

OF the thirteen pastors who ministered in the Vaudois Church in 1698, seven were foreigners by birth, and were obliged to leave

¹ Unpublished letter of Arnaud, dated from La Tour, 25th March, 1697. (Archives of Berne, compartment E.)

² AUTHORITIES.—Moser, "History of the Admission of the Vaudois into Wurtemberg." (Zurich, 1798, in German.) The author was a very aged man when he wrote this work; he promised a continuation of it, but was not able to accomplish it. This book contains, in extenso, a large number of lengthy documents, but they are not of very great interest. The narrative is often inaccurate, and always incomplete. (In reference to the return of the Vaudois to their own country, seven years before the period to which this history relates, the victorious expedition of Arnaud is confounded with the abortive and ill-managed attempt of Bourgeois.)—Dicterici, "History of the Introduction of the Vaudois into the Dominions of Prussian Brandenburg." (Berlin, 1831, in German.) This author gives a general epitome of the history of the Vaudois, and of their return under the conduct of Arnaud. The original part of the work is contained particularly in a collection or analysis of letters relative to the settlement of the exiled Vaudois at Stendal.—Erman and Reclam, "Contributions to the History of the French Refugees in the Dominions of the country in consequence of the edict of the 1st of July.¹ Two of them² immediately set out for Switzerland and Germany, to seek an asylum for their fugitive flocks. A number of families had already quitted Pragela, to escape the vexations to which they were subjected by Louis XIV.;³ and about the end of the year 1697, a part of the inhabitants of the Val P rouse joined these first exiles, in consequence of the refusal of Victor Amadeus to allow to the religionaries of the territory ceded by France the same rights with those of the other Vaudois valleys.

These families having passed through Switzerland without being able to settle there, addressed themselves, in the beginning of 1698, the King of Prussia." (Berlin, 1786, in German.) In vol. vi. of this collection, most of the historic part of the preceding work will be found already published.—Lamberty, "Materials for the History of the 18th Century." (Id.)—Keller, "The Present State of the Vaudois" (a work of no great value).—Hahn, "History of the Vaudois and of Collateral Sects" (in German. Stuttgart, 1847, 8vo, pp. 822). It is the second volume of a History of the Sects of the Middle Ages, published by this author. He gives, amongst his proof documents, the complete text of the Vaudois poems in the Romance tongue, of which Raynouard and Monastier had previously published only fragments.—Various Academic Theses (for example, Mayerhoff, "Die Waldenser in unseren Tagen." (Berlin, 1834).—Some narratives of travels may also be consulted.—A learned native of the valleys of Piedmont, the late M. P. Appia, pastor of the French church at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, had made a collection of many documents, which he communicated to me.—Some other documents I have obtained by my own researches in the State Archives of Darmstadt and Stuttgart, as well as in most of the localities where the Vaudois were settled in Germany.—The last of the national pastors in that country, the late venerable and aged M. Mondon, by his recollections and private memoranda, more than once supplied deficiencies in other sources of information.—Various journals may also with great propriety be cited—as the Archives of the Country of Pader, t. I. No. 5, (where are to be seen twelve Vaudois letters, with observations by Mone, who afterwards published his work in a separate form)—the Echo of the (Vaudois) Valleys, containing some letters by M. Geymonat on the same subject—the Historic Annals of Halle, &c.

¹ Viz. :—ARNAUD, pastor at St. John; GIRAUD at La Tour; JORDAN at Le Villar; DUMAS at Rora; PAPON at Rocheplate and Prarusting; MONToux at Ville S che; and JAVEL at Le Pomaret.

The edict was not published in the valleys till the 13th of July; and on the very day on which it was signed, viz., the 1st of July, the pastors Dumas, Jordan, Montoux, and Javel took the oath of fidelity to Victor Amadeus, before the governor of Pignerol. Other inhabitants of the valleys, to the number of 218, were in like manner permitted to take the oath; yet by the edict which was signed at the same moment, they were all proscribed.—See, for the taking of this oath, the Civil Archives of Pignerol, Categoria I., Mazzo 31, No. 27.

² PAPON and HENRI ARNAUD.

³ Letters from Berne, 28th January, 1693, and from Zurich, 30th January, have for their object the preparation of supplies of food and raiment for these expatriated Vaudois. (Archives of Berne, compartment E.) Many summonses and prosecutions before the magistrates still took place in the name of Louis XIV., between April and June, 1698, in order to the erection of five Catholic charges in the valley of Pragela, instead of five Protestant charges. (The documents are in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

to the Duke of Wurtemberg, to obtain lands in his dominions. This prince was himself very favourably inclined towards them, but found obstacles to his benevolence in the Faculty of Theology of Tubingen, who considered the Vandois as tainted with Calvinism, and whose opposition was strongly supported in the ducal council. But a prince of the second rank, the Count of Neustadt,¹ a man of good head and good heart, would not allow himself to be stayed by these prejudices. He considered that the industry of the Vandois would be useful in his province; and there is a letter extant, in which he says:—"The day after my arrival at Gochsheim, thirty-five of these poor people came to me, asking permission to settle in my domains. Not being able to grant this without the consent of the duke, I requested them to wait a few days; and, in the meantime, I made them look through the country for a suitable situation. We agreed upon a plan of settlement and colonization, which will be immediately carried into effect if I can obtain a favourable answer from my dear cousin.² Three delegates have just come from them, asking permission to build huts for themselves before winter, and also the means of so doing, that they may be ready in spring to set about the erection of durable buildings and the cultivation of the ground. I warmly recommend to Councillor Justine³ the petition of these poor people; and I am firmly persuaded that this colony will promote the prosperity of my little town, because they propose to establish a considerable manufactory, and to bring together to the spot as many as 200 families."⁴

The privy council appointed a commission to examine this proposal.⁵ The commission made a favourable report; the council adopted its recommendations;⁶ and, a few days after,⁷ the first patent was issued, in virtue of which lands were granted to the Vandois in Wurtemberg. This deed, drawn up both in French and German, was not yet signed by the grand duke, but only sealed with the ducal seal.⁸ It was immediately forwarded to the Count of Neustadt, who thanked his sovereign for it, as for a boon conferred upon himself;⁹ and, without delay, he assigned to the Vandois a territory for colonization at a small distance from Gochsheim.

¹ Frederic Augustus, lord of the bailiwicks of Neustadt and Gochsheim, a prince of Wurtemberg.—Moser gives him the title of Duke.

² Whose vassal he was.

³ Of Mentzingen, to whom the letter is addressed.

⁴ This number indicates the importance of this emigration as a historic event. The letter is dated 3d August, 1698.—Archives of Stuttgart.—Moser, § lxii.

⁵ By decree of 5th August.

⁶ On 6th August.

⁷ On 9th August.

⁸ It may be seen amongst the proof documents in MOSER.

⁹ By letter of 20th September.

An extent of fifteen arpents of arable land, two arpents of meadow, and as much of vineyard, was reserved for their future pastor. Finally, this kind nobleman desired that the colony should bear the name of Augustistad (Augustus-town), in memory of the interest which he took in its founders.

It must be borne in mind, however, that the patent of colonization was not yet final; and the confession of faith of the Vaudois having been presented to the privy council, a commission was again named to examine it. The judgment of the commission disappointed the expectations of the lord of Gochsheim. It set forth that this confession was neither conformable to the doctrines of the ancient Vaudois Church, nor to those of the Moravian brethren; but that it was the confession of the Reformed Church of France, pervaded throughout with Calvinism, and that, in consequence, the petitioners must be refused admission into Wurtemberg, at least, unless they adopted the Confession of Augsburg.¹ Nevertheless, the Count of Neustadt persisted in his scheme of colonization, generous towards the exiles, and profitable for his own estates; and if the Vaudois were afterwards made welcome in Wurtemberg, we cannot but recognize in his independence of mind, and in the noble example which he then set, causes which must have powerfully contributed to bring about this result.

Meanwhile the edict had been published in Piedmont ordaining foreign Protestants to quit the dominions of Savoy. It is alleged that Victor Amadeus hoped to see them submit to the Church of Rome, rather than to all the hardships of expatriation; but 2000 exiles arose, and made the sacrifice of their country for the sake of the gospel; for these beautiful valleys had indeed become their country; they had dwelt in them for ten or twelve years; they had aided the Vaudois in re-establishing themselves there; they had, in a sense, acquired them by conquest, in combating along with the Vaudois—praying, suffering, and hoping along with them—until the right of residing in that land was guaranteed to them by formal edicts.² Alliances of every kind had been formed among the different elements of the population; and, whether to follow their adopted families, or from fear that the arbitrary will of the sovereign might soon subject them to a similar measure,³ many

¹ This singular monument of intolerance is dated 18th October, 1698, and will be found amongst the proof documents in MOSER (No. xii.)

² Those of June, 1692, and May, 1694, by which Victor Amadeus himself invited to the valleys the refugees whom he now banished.

³ There exist deeds of sale, purchases, and transmissions of immovable property, which afford evidence of these departures, and the motives of them. A Vaudois woman, for example, who had married a Frenchman, sold her property, says the Vaudois resolved to leave their country along with the exiles of foreign birth.¹ Moreover, all the Protestants who remained in the valley of Pérouse were obliged to join them ; for Louis XIV., in ceding that territory to Piedmont, had stipulated, by a special clause, that the Reformed religion should not be tolerated in any part of the ceded territory.

The total number of the emigrants thus amounted to more than 3000. They set out about the end of 1698, in seven bands, each conducted by a pastor. The Duke of Savoy had given orders that their travelling expenses should be paid by the state ; but, from the third day of their march, Gropello, the minister of finance, refused to furnish the requisite money, on the pretext that the exiles abused it, and gave themselves up to intemperance. The real motive, however, was no consideration of morals, nor even of economy, but simply one of proselytism. It was hoped that, the exiles being forced to travel at their own expense, the poorer of them would be prevented from accomplishing their journey, and would thus be obliged to remain in the country, where they would then be under the necessity of embracing Catholicism. But such was the spirit of Christian union and Christian love which animated them all, that not one of them was forced to leave the rest ; the rich paid for the poor ; and all, upheld by confidence in God, arrived at Geneva, that hospitable stage of all our great emigrations, where they were welcomed by their brethren, and relieved by the contributions which Holland and Britain had made haste to send. The evangelical cantons of Switzerland consented to receive them for the winter, on condition that they should quit the country in the spring of 1699, because of the too great population of Switzerland, and the bad harvest of 1698.

During this time Vaudois deputies² went to Wurtemberg, and took steps to obtain a fixed residence there. They arrived at Stuttgart in the month of October, 1698. Three councillors of deed, per non voler ne poter soffrire la separatione del suo marito obbligato absentar da queste valli per l'ordine di S. A. R. del principio di Luglio. (Archives of Le Villar, MS. vol. marked Religionarii, fol. 109.)

¹ These fears appear in many letters of the Vaudois “ Although this edict relates to the refugees alone, it has the effect of shaking the whole body of the valleys, as the greater part of us are allied to the refugees, and apprehend that his royal highness may go farther yet in order to please France. (Letter of Blanchon to Walkenier.—In a report by Walkenier, dated 4th October, 1698, he says, “In the valley of Pérouse they have been deprived of all their properties ; almost all their domesticities, as refugees, are compelled to quit the country.”)

² These were Henry Arnaud, for the refugees and Vandois of the valley of Lucerna, James Pastre for those of Pragela, and Stephen Muret for those of Pérouse and St. Martin. Papon remained in Switzerland.

the government, acquainted with the French language, were appointed to confer with them, and conferences took place on the 19th and 24th of that month. Arnaud, Moser says,¹ was the speaker in these conferences. He showed, with true prudence and wisdom, that the doctrine of the Vaudois had not been modified to assimilate it to Calvinism; and when the confession of faith of the Bohemian brethren was laid before him, he said that he received it as well as that of St. Cyril; he added that, in the spirit of Christian charity, the Vaudois had never refused to take part in the worship of the Reformed churches, wherever it was tolerated, but their church was anterior to all those which sprung from the Reformation; that they acknowledged the Bible only as the foundation of their faith, and that if they were received into Wurtemberg, they would be faithful to the government of the country, both in peace and in war. Upon these explanations, the council of state unanimously adopted a report favourable to the admission of the exiles into Wurtemberg;² and, a few days after,³ the bailiff of Maulbronn⁴ received orders from the privy council to go through the country with their delegates, that they might look out the places most favourable for the establishment of the projected colonies. According to his report, nearly 300 families might have been distributed in a great number of different localities; but the Vaudois opposed this arrangement, because they desired to remain united, and to found villages of their own.

The question of their admission, however, was as yet only provisionally decided; to render the decision final, it required the approbation of the sovereign. The privy council convoked⁵ a general meeting of the superior councils, and of the former delegates of both chambers, that they might give their opinion as to the decision which the government should adopt in this matter. The report was still favourable;⁶ but the theological antipathy which was felt by the Lutheran bodies of Wurtemberg to the admission of a foreign religion into that country, found organs in the council of state, which ordered a new general meeting of the superior councils, and a more thorough examination of the questions of doctrine.⁷ The minute of the proceedings of this meeting was drawn up with care,⁸ and the conclusion of the report was still as favourable as before.

¹ § lxxv.² It is dated 24th October, 1698.³ On 31st October.⁴ Named Gerbert; he displayed much activity and much good-will to the Vaudois.⁵ By decree of 11th November, 1698.⁶ It was agreed upon on 15th November, 1698.⁷ This meeting took place on the 22d of November.⁸ See MOSER, Proof Documents, No. xiii.

In the council of state¹ opinions were divided, some pronouncing for admission, others for rejection. The latter party argued (1), that the petitioners were for the most part refugees, and not Vaudois; (2), that they were too poor to be able to effect an advantageous settlement, without assistance in the first place, which would impoverish the country rather than enrich it; and (3), that there would be a danger of Louis XIV. demanding their expulsion from Wurtemberg, as he had demanded their expulsion from Piedmont. The council decided to reject the petition of the Vaudois delegates, until they should have furnished sufficient security against these contingencies.

The design of thus putting them off was to get quit of them altogether. The young Duke Eberhard Louis displayed more generosity than his council; the example of the Count of Neustadt had confirmed him in his good inclinations. He wished to converse with the framer of the report, and with the delegates; but the latter had already departed, not that they had lost courage, nor that a sort of puerile vexation had precipitated their departure; but, on the contrary, they went to labour with that calm and resolute perseverance which gets to the end of everything, to procure the securities which had been demanded from them.

Henry Arnaud now displayed again all the activity which he had formerly exhibited in battle-fields; he repaired to Holland,² and thence to England,³ obtained considerable collections, stimulated the zeal and activity of the Protestant powers, and was in the highest degree successful. Urgent solicitations in favour of the Vaudois were addressed by these powers to the Duke of Wurtemberg;⁴ and, at the same time, advantageous proposals were made to them by other princes.⁵ The Elector of Brandenburg in particular, with inexhaustible charity, came forward to their relief. He offered to take upon himself the burden of providing for the French refugees, as well as for the other inhabitants of the valleys, who might choose to return to his dominions.⁶ But they were not under the

¹ Or the privy council.

² A letter of the States-General to the Duke of Wurtemberg, dated 26th January, 1699, shows that Arnaud was there at that time.—Archives of Stuttgart.—MOSER, § lxxviii.

³ A letter of Arnaud to Duke Eberhard is dated from London, 22d February, 1699.—Id. It was at this time that the best portrait which we have of him was taken, at the bottom of which are the words, Drawn and Engraved by Van Somer, London.

⁴ By Holland, on 26th January, 1699; by Brandenburg, on 28th January; and by England, on 9th February.

⁵ The Landgraves of Hesse-Cassel, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Hombourg; the Counts of Hanau and Yssemburg, &c.

⁶ Ordinance of 13th March, 1699.—Theatrum Europæum, t. xv. p. 549. In his necessity of going so far to find an asylum. The collections made on their behalf enabled them to bring to Wurtemberg resources sufficient for the establishment of the projected colonies. The duke then hesitated no longer; and notwithstanding the opposition which he still encountered from Lutheran intolerance, the Vaudois were at last permitted to settle in his dominions.

A man of great activity, and at once a great diplomatist and a devoted Christian, Walkenier, was sent by Holland, and recognized by other Protestant states,¹ as a special plenipotentiary, commissioned to treat for the settlement of the exiles on the most advantageous terms. His duty was admirably discharged. Serious conferences were opened at Stuttgart on the 1st of March, 1699; and after a long succession of reports, discussions, protests and explanations, protocols and consultations,² Walkenier obtained at last letters-patent, to the following effect:³—

1. The Vaudois received in Wurtemberg shall be subjects of that state. (Preface.)

2. They shall enjoy perfect religious liberty. (§ i., v., vi., and xx.)

3. They shall have in each church a consistory, composed of the pastor, the deacons, and the elders. (§ iii.)

4. They shall have the power of convoking colloques (synods), and of receiving in them the representatives of the Vaudois colonies founded in the provinces of the neighbourhood; but a commissioner of the government shall be present at these assemblies. The election or the dismissal of a pastor shall be submitted to the approbation of the duke. (§ ii. and iv.)

5. They shall be bound to observe the festivals and fast-days observed in the Lutheran Church. (§ v.)

6. Their pastors and deacons shall never be bound to answer in letter of 21st January, he had said: "We will welcome and entertain all the French, who amount, it is said, to six thousand in number, and the Vaudois, &c., . . . having this confidence in God, that he will be pleased to crown our good intention with his blessing." (MOSER, § lxxviii., at the end.)

¹ Switzerland, England, and Brandenburg.

² See Moser, from § lxxix. to § lxxvi. These preliminary proceedings were so long protracted, that in the interval between their commencement and their conclusion, Walkenier repaired to Darmstadt and Ysemburg, where he obtained (on 2d May and 11th August, 1699), favourable terms for the settlement of the Vaudois, whom he then began to introduce into these countries. This taking place on the frontiers of Wurtemberg, led to the ultimate decision of the latter country to receive the exiles likewise. Moser even speaks of a sum of 1000 florins, destined for their relief, and which had served to procure for them some venal friends. (Id. § lxxii.)

³ They were published in 1700, and republished in 1769, at the expense of the Vaudois colonies (Synod of Heimheim, May, 1764), in virtue of the 17th article of the Synod of Knittlingen (May, 1759). I give here only the principal provisions.

judicial proceedings as witnesses, concerning those things which have been committed to them under the seal of confession, except in regard to the crime of high treason. (§ vii.)

7. One-half of the property of those who shall die without heirs, during the first twenty years of their residence in Wurtemberg, shall be distributed among the poor of the parish in which they shall have died. (§ viii.)

8. Certain exemptions from taxes shall be granted them for some years, which shall be specified when they shall be settled. (§ ix. and xii.)

9. Not being able to point out precisely the localities which they are to occupy, we assign them as their place of settlement the bailiwicks of Maulbronn and Leonberg; bestowing upon them, as a free gift, all the lands which, since the great war of Germany,¹ have lain uncultivated and unoccupied in these districts. (§ ix. and x.)

10. They shall choose in these lands the places most agreeable to themselves for the construction of villages; and these villages shall enjoy the same privileges with the other villages of the country. (§ xiii., xiv., and xv.)

11. They shall be exempt from taxes and compulsory services for ten years. (§ xiii., xiv., and xv.)

12. For the administration of justice and of municipal affairs, they are authorized to establish, in each community, a secular council, to be chosen by the majority of votes, and to consist of a mayor, a sheriff, and such other persons as shall be deemed most capable. The council shall pronounce judgment in regard to the sum or value of twenty florins; but the parties shall have it in their power to appeal to the council of the bailiwick, to which cases of greater importance shall be carried at once. In other respects, the judicial usages of the country shall be followed. (§ xvi. and xvii.)

13. They and their descendants shall have power to remove themselves and their families whithersoever they will, without being subjected to the right of recal,² nor to any other kind of bondage. (§ xviii.)

14. No foreigner shall have the power of settling in the colonies which they have founded, without their consent and ours. (§ xix.)

15. They are permitted to trade throughout the whole of the

¹ The Thirty Years' War, which lasted from 1618 to 1648, and was terminated by the Peace of Westphalia, concluded on 24th October of the latter year, and subsequently ratified in 1654 by the Diet of Ratisbon.

² This right of recal, a species of serfdom, or adstriction to the soil, still exists in Swabia, under the name of leibeigenschaft.

duke's dominions, and to import into them, or export from them, all sorts of merchandise, upon payment of the duties fixed by law. (§ xxi., xxii.)

16. Their artisans shall not be obliged to take out a ticket of their craft¹ in the presence of foreign judges. They shall have power to elect judges and inspectors for themselves by majority of votes. (§ xxii. art. 1 and 4.)

17. They shall be empowered to establish such markets and fairs as they shall have need for. (§ xxii. art. 6.)

The same privileges shall be accorded to the Vaudois who shall settle in the lordship of Gochsheim. (§ xxiii.)²

These conditions were in great part copied from those which, at Walkenier's instance, the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt had just granted to the Vaudois. They served as the basis or model for almost all the other concessions of this kind which took place in the neighbouring states.

The eighth article of these letters-patent bore, that in order to aid the colonies in the maintenance of their pastors, schoolmasters, and physicians, a certain extent of the territory granted to them should belong to the community, and should be perpetually exempt from public burdens. It is easy enough to perceive, however, that this assistance must have been insufficient for people who had everything to create, and who themselves lived at this time on the bounty of foreigners. But Arnaud, during his stay in London, had provided against this difficulty. He had obtained the consent of the government to the proportional division, with the colonies now being founded, of the sums granted from the civil list to the pastors of the valleys. These pensions, which amounted at first to £555 sterling,³ were interrupted under the reign of George I.

¹ Maitrise, a diploma of ability.

² The impression of 1769 consists of 28 folio pages.

³ The following document affords evidence of the amount, and explains the origin of this supply. "To the Lords of the Treasury.*—Their majesties King William and Queen Mary, of glorious memory, having obtained from the Duke of Savoy, when he joined the party of the allies, the concession to the Vaudois of the free exercise of their religion, . . . and their said majesties having found that the churches of the valleys were too poor to provide for the maintenance of their ministers and schoolmasters, . . . graciously appointed for their maintenance an annual pension of £550 sterling, which pension was regularly paid . . . until the death of Queen Anne.†

" . . . The foreign pastors having left these valleys along with the French, in the year 1699, settled in Wittenberg, &c., . . . and there formed seven churches, the seven pastors and seven schoolmasters of which continued to receive their proportion of the said pension of £555 sterling.

" . . . It is proposed to put them on a permanent and stable footing, by

* [A translation of a translation].

† Which took place on 12th August, 1714.

The Vaudois sought them again from him, sending a deputy for this purpose to London in 1716, who spent almost a year there in the prosecution of this affair. This deputy was Montoux,¹ pastor at Rohrbach, in the country of Hesse-Darmstadt. At his instance, the landgrave of that country himself wrote to the King of England, and received the following reply:—"I have for a long time intended to re-establish the pensions of the said churches; but various difficulties which have arisen with regard to the fund on which it was proposed to place them, have hitherto prevented this affair from being brought to a conclusion. I hope that next session of parliament will not pass without terminating it," &c.²

The king then caused a report to be made to him concerning this matter. In that report it is said, "Agreeably to your majesty's orders, notified to me by your secretary, Lord Stanhope, I have examined, &c. . . ." and the conclusion is as follows: "The funds of the Savoy hospital, which has been suppressed, are now at your majesty's disposal, and your majesty can lawfully give therefrom the payment desired, or dispose of them otherwise, as may please your majesty."³ George I. charged Lord Stanhope to speak of this subject in parliament, which that minister did in the following terms:—"My Lords,—The king has been most humbly petitioned, for some time past, to continue to the poor Vaudois the pensions which they had during the preceding reigns, for the support of their ministers and schoolmasters; and that the pensions should be paid to them from the rents of the Savoy hospital. This matter having been laid before the attorney-general, and his report having been taken into consideration by his majesty, he commands me to state to you on his part, that it is his gracious pleasure that placing them upon a fund destined for pious uses; and there is none more proper for this purpose than that of the Hospital of the Savoy, which was abolished and united to the exchequer under the last reign. On which point the attorney-general, . . . having been consulted on the part of the king, gave the most favourable reply possible, on 30th May, 1716, of which a translation is here subjoined;* whereupon his majesty sent the annexed order* to the treasury for the establishment of the pensions in question upon the said fund. This order not having been executed, because of the king's departure for Germany, it is now humbly prayed that it may be carried into execution. . . .

"Signed, for the Vaudois colonies of Germany, by Montoux, their deputy at London for the promotion of their suit."

(This document is in the old consistorial record of Dürmentz, now forming part of the MSS. of the late M. Appia of Frankfort.)

¹ It is his petition which the preceding note contains.

² Letter of George I. to the Prince Ernest Louis, Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt. (State Archives of Darmstadt.)

³ Signed, Edward Northey, Whitehall, 30th May, and afterwards 9th June, 1726 (this ought to be 1716).—Paper copied into the Record of Darmstadt.

* All these papers are joined together at the back.

you present him with the necessary warrants for making over the sum of £555 sterling per annum, from the rents of the Savoy hospital, to be at the disposal of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Carlisle, Lord High Almoner to his majesty, and Messrs. Wil and Chetynd,¹ to be distributed by them as they deem best for the support of the before-mentioned Vaudois ministers and schoolmasters."

It would seem that parliament was favourable to this proposal; for, in the beginning of the following year, the banker Schetynd wrote to the Vaudois colonies and to the valleys, to announce that the supplies would speedily be sent, according to the plan which the Bishop of London, the Archbishop of Canterbury, &c., had adopted for their distribution.² There remained some arrears, which were afterwards obtained.

I have thought it proper to give these details even before recording the establishment of the colonies to which they relate, in order not to interrupt their history by falling back upon facts so remote from the present state of things.

¹ The exact orthography of these proper names ought, I believe, to be Wilns or Milns, and Schetuynd or Chetyrynd. So at least they seemed to me to be written in the autograph signatures of these persons.

² These subsidies, under the reign of George II., amounted only to £500 sterling. Their distribution took place half-yearly, in the manner following:—

£500 sterling per annum, for six months	£250	0	0
Deduct, Tax on the Civil List, 6 d. per pound	£6	5	0
„ Payer's Fee	6	5	0
„ Land Tax	37	10	0
Total Deduction	50	0	0
Remaining to be divided	200	0	0
To each of the fifteen ministers of the valleys,* £6 11 0 = 90 13 9	129	19	8½
To each of the thirteen schoolmasters, 3 0 5½ = 39 5 11½
To each of the seven ministers in Germany,† 6 13 4 = 46 13 4	70	0	0
To each of the seven schoolmasters . . . 3 6 8 = 23 6 8
Balanced	£200	0	0½

(From the Records of Darmstadt.)

These supplies were again suspended from 1765 to 1767, and also in 1804; but, upon new petitions, payment was again resumed.

* The number remaining was six in 1699; it was thirteen in 1700; fourteen in 1710; and fifteen on 25th March, 1728, the date of this paper.

† These seven ministers were those of—1, GROS VILLAR; 2, DÜRMENTZ; 3, PINACHE, 4, LUCERNA or WURNBERG (pronounced Voorberg), in Wurtemberg; 5, the minister of ROHRBACH, WENBACH, and HEIM, in the grand-duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt; 6, the minister of WALDORF, near Frankfort; and, 7, the minister of DORNHOLZHAUSEN, near Homburg. The pastors of Waldenberg, Pérouse, Nordhausen, and New Ernestedt, received a small pension from Holland, which will be noticed in the following chapters.

‡ The sum total amounts, in strict accuracy, only to £199, 19*s.* 8½*d.*

CHAPTER IX.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS COLONIES FOUNDED IN WURTEMBERG AFTER THE EXPULSION OF 1698.—PART SECOND.¹

(A.D. 1639 TO A.D. 1824.)

The Vaudois settlers in the bailiwick of Maulbronn—The settlement at Pérouse, in the bailiwick of Leonberg—Pinache, in the bailiwick of Wiermsheim—Luccerna or Wurmberg—Serres—Chorres and Sengach, in the bailiwick of Dürmentz—Mülacre—Schönberg—Reminiscences of Arnaud—Grand Villar, near Knittlingen—Disinclination of some of the exiles to settle in any place away from their own valleys—Remonstrances of Walkenier—New Engstedt, in the bailiwick of Calw—Another emigration from the valley of Pragela—Settlement at Nordhausen—Habits of the people—Endeavours made to induce the Vaudois churches to unite themselves with the National Lutheran Church—Introduction of the German language in their public services—The union with the National Church is finally accomplished.

Six months before the letters-patent were signed which authorized the Vaudois to settle in Wurtemberg,² the greater part of them had already arrived in the bailiwick of Maulbronn.³ They had been lodged for the meantime in the redoubts and *blockhouses*⁴ erected at the time of the last French invasion.⁵ The States-general of Holland had furnished money to assist in their settlement.⁶ In the month of July, 1699, Walkenier had begun to distribute a part of it amongst the settlers.⁷ The worthy bailie of Maulbronn says, in a report dated in the month of August, that in the community of Pinache men, women, and children had made a very good beginning; that they had grubbed up the fields which had lain uncultivated for half a century, and which might now, therefore, receive the seed before the end of the year. He praises their way of proceeding in agriculture, and their industrious and orderly

¹ AUTHORITIES.—The same as in the preceding chapter.

² These letters-patent are dated in September, 1699; and on the 18th of April eighty Vaudois had already arrived. Seventeen hundred arrived on the 12th of May.

³ The list of the Vaudois families which had arrived in that bailiwick on the 1st of April, 1699, is printed by HAHN (Proof Documents, No. iv.), p. 774.

⁴ An isolated fortification, built of wood. ⁵ The invasion by Louvois, in 1638.

⁶ Erman and Reclam say 10,000 crowns.

⁷ To every man above sixteen years, three florins; to every woman, and to boys and girls between ten and sixteen years, two florins; and to every child under ten years, one florin. The Grand Duke of Wurtemberg afterwards granted, for the support of the Vaudois pastors, two timer of wine, fifteen sacks of spelt, and thirty-five florins per annum; and to every schoolmaster, two simri of silk and two sacks of spelt. (Note of the Dean, or Perpetual Moderator, as he designates himself, of the Vaudois and French Churches of Germany, dated from Canstadt, 12th October, 1816.)

behaviour, and signifies his expectation of happy results for the country from their settlement there.

The autumn and winter of the first year were, however, very trying for these poor settlers. The greater part of them had no proper dwelling; their huts could not protect them from the cold; and besides, they had no seed, and no cattle, and wanted many things of the first necessity. Through the attentive kindness of the Dutch ambassador and of the government of Wurtemberg, these wants were gradually supplied; and in this way the following villages were erected, all of which bear names borrowed from places in the Vaudois valleys.

In the bailiwick of LEONEBERG,¹ there were more than 1000 arpents of uncultivated land in the neighbourhood of Heimsheim, and here it was that the colony of Pérouse was founded.² It is a village of no great size, the houses of which are almost all separated from one another by little gardens, and surrounded by orchards. The place of worship is built upon the rising ground of the Halberg, and the view is bounded upon one side by hills covered with forests, and upon the other by an undulating and verdant plain, which extends as far as Eltingen, where also a few Vaudois families subsequently settled.

In the bailiwick of WIERMSHEIM is Pinache, a settlement consisting originally of seventeen families, which divided themselves into three groups, in order to settle in three different spots,³ determined by the extent of the lands of which they had the disposal. Some of the surrounding communes also ceded to them some waste lands, in order to augment their lot. This colony was one of the most active and flourishing. The lower part of the houses is built of stones, the middle part of bricks or of clay, all striped with rafters which are visible from the outside. The upper part is sometimes of wood, and the roof often of thatch. Here also the horizon is bounded by forests. The use of the patois was long retained here after the French language had disappeared.

At a small distance to the south is the colony of Lucerna, of which the German name is Wurmberg.⁴ It is only of late years

¹ The village of this name is celebrated as the birthplace of the philosopher Schelling.

² A list of names of the families which settled in this locality, and in the other colonies of Wurtemberg, is given by HAHN, p. 233, note iii. This note terminates as follows:—"A number of these families must have removed to other places soon after their settlement; for there are, at the present time, scarcely seventy or eighty Vandois families at Pérouse."

³ On the one side towards Dürmentz; on the other, towards Grossen-Clappach and Iptingen.

⁴ This village is situated, I believe, in the bailiwick of Dietlingen. The want of that it has enjoyed a place of worship. The houses are of wood; the supporting beams project upon the outside, and are sometimes painted black, and present to the spectator coloured lines, lozenges, and crossings, not without some analogy to the fantastic ornaments of savages. In a great number of German villages, however, we meet with this peculiarity of houses seemingly tattooed. The inhabitants of this colony possess flocks of sheep and of geese, and cultivate fruits and grain.

Between Lucerna and Pinache is the hamlet of Serres. The miserable cottages of which it is composed are scattered without order on the side of a gently sloping hill. Here also the use of the patois was preserved longer than the French. Some thorny shrubs bound its paths, but the great roads are shaded by fruit-trees.

Beyond Pinache, towards the valley of the Eintz, but separated from it by a table-land covered with magnificent forests, we enter the bailiwick of DÜRMENTZ. Here 115 Vaudois families were to be settled; but, besides these, ninety-six other persons still presented themselves. These different settlers were divided on the two banks of the Eintz; on the one side under the imposing ruins of the castle of Loeffelstetzel,¹ which forms the principal feature in the landscape; and on the other towards Lommersheim and Ortisheim. The villages which they erected received the names of Chorres and Sengach. This colony had a pastor of its own, resident at Sengach. The artisans were authorized to settle in Dürmentz itself, where they built a street, which still bears the name of the Welchstrass.² They formed part of the church of Schönberg. This station was called Queyras. On the opposite bank of the Eintz is Mulacre, where a few of the Vaudois also fixed their residence. Here is to be seen the house which Arnaud built, and in which he lived.³ This is the only place, of all that were founded by the Vaudois, which presents anything of the regularity and elegance of a little town. Its situation is also extremely beautiful. On one side extends a plain, sprinkled with villages, and on the other side a chain of hills, beyond which appear the blue and picturesque summits of the mountains of Maulbronn.

Crossing over these hills, we arrive at Schönberg,⁴ formerly maps on a large scale prevents me from giving these particulars with entire certainty. Annexed to Lucerna was New Barenthal. (Manuscript cited by Hahn, p. 233.)

¹ In the patois of the country it is called Mugensturn.

² French Street.

³ It is the last but one, on the left, in leaving the village by the road to Durlach.

⁴ Or Schoenenberg, i.e., beautiful mountain. The Manuscript of the Alterthverreins, fol. v., quoted by HAHN, p. 233, gives as annexed to Schoenberg—Corrès, Sengach, and Lommersheim.

called Les Muriers, where, also, some of the companions of Arnaud found a resting-place. He himself resided there for twenty years,¹ during which he was subjected to many annoyances, and even to odious accusations;² but he was always sustained by his serenity of character, and his confidence in God. Not knowing the German language, he found himself much embarrassed at first in his new country; but he went every day to visit his companions in exile, and to encourage them in their labours. "God hears all languages," said he to them, "when prayer comes from the heart. Work on, take courage, have confidence in him." Such were the words which were often on his lips—the only words of his which the aged men of that village were able to tell me, with even the measure of certainty which tradition can give. His remains repose in the humble place of worship at Schönberg, in which he so often preached the gospel. His tomb is marked only by a flat stone, placed in front

¹ He died in 1721, aged eighty years. The inventory of his goods was taken on 29th January, 1722. He left five children; three sons, of whom Scipio succeeded him at Schönberg, and was afterwards pastor at Gros Villar. (He had two sons, of whom the one died at Campe, in Holland, and the other in America.) John Vincent was a pastor in the Vandois valleys. William was, at the time of his father's death, studying law in London. Arnaud had also two daughters, of whom Margaret was married to Joseph Rostan, at La Tour, in the valley of Lucerna; and Elizabeth became the wife of Philip Kolb, receiver of taxes at Bretten (or Bretheim, the birthplace of Melancthon). All these were the children of Arnaud by his first wife, Margaret Bastie, of La Tour. By Rénée Rebondy, his second wife, he had no children. He had also a sister, married at St. John to a M. Gauthier. Queen Anne gave him a pension of £226 sterling, and William III. gave him a colonel's commission, as appears from the terms of the following commission, granted to one of his grandsons:—"William III. . . . To Daniel Arnaud, called La Lozière, greeting. We, confiding in your fidelity, courage, and good conduct, appoint you, by these presents, lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of infantry in our service, of which HENRY ARNAUD, Vandois pastor, IS COLONEL. We appoint you, also, captain of a company in the same regiment, &c. . . . Given at the Hague, the 14th day of March, 1690, and of our reign the third year. By the king.—NOTTINGHAM."

This document (derived from the memoirs of Paul Appia, representative of the canton of Lucerna in the general council of the Po, under the French empire) is cited by Hahn, p. 225. The title of colonel afforded a delicate method, by which the King of England could prevail upon Arnaud to accept the pension which he gave him. (See the Return, dedication, fol. 12, right hand page.) I find, moreover, in the old consistorial records of Dürmentz (p. 31), that a Demoiselle Arnaud, settled in Germany, received a pension from the crown of England in 1727. It may be supposed that this pension was allowed to the widow of the celebrated pastor; for at that period the title of demoiselle was applied to married women, as well as to those who had never been so.

Messrs. Bracebridge and Acland have published interesting particulars concerning the life and family of Arnaud. I have given some, hitherto unpublished, in a note to the chapter which treats of the return of the Vandois, and in a subsequent place, in the years 1704 and 1707.

² With regard to these, see the Archives of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. S., pp. 823, 826, 837, and vol. T., p. 15, where the accusations are aside as disproved.

of the pulpit, under a table which is used for the dispensation of the Lord's Supper. Two inscriptions are engraved upon it, but they are already almost illegible.¹

The environs of Schönberg present an open and smiling landscape, but the summit of the hill is covered with forests of beech and pine. Passing through these, we arrive at the bailiwick of Knittlingen, adjacent to that of Maulbronn. "Here it was," says M. Monastier,² "that, only a few leagues from the place of their destination, the Vaudois exiles took possession of the land, by depositing in it the remains of one of their faithful pastors, named Dumas, to whom death scarcely allowed time to reach a place of refuge, there to die."

These sad and tedious emigrations were indeed attended with many circumstances of affliction. Bands of ragged³ strangers wearily making their way through a country of whose language they were ignorant, were regarded with more suspicion than sympathy by the people among whom they came to settle.⁴ In many a village the poor Vaudois were made the subjects of coarse jests,⁵ or were enviously repulsed from the inhospitable neighbourhood. We shall soon see how they afterwards gradually renounced their primitive character, and became assimilated to the German nation.

¹ Around the margin of the stone is this inscription:—Sub hoc tumulto jacet Valdensem Pedemontanorum pastor nec non militum prefectus vener. ae. str. Henr. Arnaud. Above an escutcheon, very coarsely traced, on the upper part of the slab, is the following:—Nescit tibi virtus; and below it, Ad utrumque paratus. The principal inscription is as follows:—Cernis hic Arnaldi cineres, sed gesta, labores, infractumque animum pingere nemo potest. Millia in Ailophilum Jessidis militat unus, unus et Ailophilum castra ducemque quatit. Obiit et Sct. 1721. Ann. æt. 80.

² ii. 163.

³ The picture, drawn by eye-witnesses in various letters (Moser, Dieterici), the circumstances of their departure, and the fatigues of the journey, make it certain enough how applicable this description must have been.

⁴ This feeling of suspicion endured for almost a century, and was owing, above all, to the differences of religion and of race. Illustrative facts might be stated in abundance.

⁵ An anecdote, selected from amongst those which are least offensive, and perhaps more authentic than many others, may give an idea of this:—An aged Vaudois woman having bought a bacon bone to season her soup, used it for a number of days in succession; and the neighbours—so the story went—came and asked it from her, one after another, saying, Coumagne, prestame un poc votre SAVOUREIRE (Gossip, lend me your seasoner for a little); so that the poor condiment made the round of the village, bearing the common tribute of its meagre savour successively to all the pots of the vicinity.

⁶ Many of the poorest communes, and of those most disinclined to receive the Vaudois, with a view to oppose their settlement within their bounds, pretended to cultivate, before their arrival, lands which had received no cultivation within the memory of man, in order that the new-comers might not be able to settle upon them, as upon the waste lands which had been granted to them.

But the foundation of some other colonies still remains to be noticed.

More than 300 families arrived in the district of MAULBRONN. They were divided into three groups. One group, towards Derzingen, founded the villages of Petit Villar and Pausselot, on the elevated parts of the uneven, and by no means very fertile tract which was to be brought into cultivation. Another group received 300 arpents of land, on the banks of the Lake of Bretheim,¹ not far from which are Bahnbach and Mutschelbäch,² belonging to the grand duchy of Baden.³ The third group remained nearer to Knittlingen, and founded the village of Grand Villar,⁴ which became the most considerable of these little colonies.⁵

Two streets, intersecting one another in the form of a cross, form the whole village. The place of worship is built at their point of junction, and its front looks down that street which represents the support of the cross. A small steeple rises above the entrance gate; it has a clock, the vibrations of whose pendulum are heard on the outside—the pulsations of time, which passes slowly and painfully in exile, and often seems too long to the distressed. The houses of this village, like the greater part of those of the peasantry in Swabia, have only a ground floor, with small windows and very steep roofs. The gardens, which are not remarkable for their luxuriance, are surrounded with indifferent plum trees, the sour fruit of which the inhabitants boil with toasted bread, and sometimes use this plum soup instead of other soup at their meals. Grace is always said, both before and after meat, except in the public-houses and at marriage feasts. In a number of families in which the use of the German language had already prevailed, this grace was long said in French, and sometimes without being understood. “The churches of these humble villages are in keeping with the poverty of the inhabitants; but their doors are never closed, and the traveller may enter at all times, either for contemplation or for repose. The Bible is to be found in every house; and a work entitled *La Nourriture de l'Ame*⁶ was in former days the most popular book of devotion.

A few cottages detached from Gros Villar form the hamlet of

¹ Or Bretten, the birthplace of Melancthon. Not far off is Goehsheim, where also a number of Vaudois were settled. (MS. cited by Hahn, p. 233.)

² Balmbrook and Shellbrook.

³ Mutschelbach belonged to Wurtemberg till 1805.

⁴ Or Gros Villar. This name, as well as that of Petit Villar, was given by the Vaudois to these new villages, in remembrance of Villar Pinache and Villar Pérouse, from which they had come.

⁵ Its population amounted to 1000 inhabitants. (Monastier, ii. 164, note i.)

⁶ The Food of the Soul.

Tiphbach,¹ where there exists now only one family of Vaudois origin.

Two years after their expulsion, however, and when these expatriated families had founded the colonies above mentioned, there still remained a considerable number of persons without any fixed place of abode. Many hoped to be able soon to return to the valleys, as had been the case two years and a half after the expulsion of 1686. A few even bent their steps thither again, and were made fast in the bonds of apostasy. The firm and severe language of Walkenier put a stop to these scandals. He published a circular, in which he said, "We certify all the French and Vaudois who are under our direction, that having learned with sensible displeasure . . . that numbers run about from place to place, and that others of them return, some to France and some to Piedmont, . . . &c. . . . that they must renounce all such thoughts in the present state of things. For those who have returned, have been obliged on their arrival to abjure their religion, and to promise that they will never embrace it again, declaring that they look upon their ancestors as persons damned to all eternity, . . . publicly asking pardon before the Popish churches, in their shirts, with their feet bare, a taper in their hand, a rope about their neck, and other similar indignities. . . . We therefore command the mayors and sheriffs of each colony to grant no succour to any one whomsoever, . . . until they shall first have solemnly taken oath to continue faithful all their lives to God and to our holy religion. . . ."

Through these remonstrances, the last of the emigrants, who were still scattered and wandering from place to place, were induced to assemble and settle. The most productive lands were already occupied. "But what matters it," said they, in their obstinate love of their own country, "what lands they give us? Be they great or small, fertile or arid, these temporary possessions will suffice us very well for a few days, and sooner or later we will return to our valleys."³ They were located in the bailiwick of CALW. In

¹ Or rather Diefenbach. This village, as well as Gochsheim, was annexed to Grand Villar till 1795.

² This circular is dated from Frankfort, 10th May, 1700, and is to be found in the State Archives of Hesse-Darmstadt, as well as amongst the papers of several Vaudois colonies.

³ These particulars have been gathered from the lips of a woman almost 100 years of age, who had herself known many of the first emigrants. "How often have I heard our old people tell," said she, "that in their days, in the midst of the first labours of colonization, if they had but heard an air of their own country accidentally sung by their children, it would have made them stop short in their work, and shed tears. In the evening we used to assemble in one of our straw huts (for the houses were not then built), and there we spoke about our own country, which the midst of the Black Forest, on a table-land entirely covered with pines, an extensive cleared space is to be seen, of treeless meadows, in the centre of which are some humble cottages with little gardens around them. It is the last of the Vaudois colonies that were founded in Wurtemberg after the expulsion of 1698. The settlers called it Bourset, after a village of that name situated in the valley of Pragela; it is now known, however, by the name of New Engstedt, which it has derived from a neighbouring village. Its inhabitants found their chief resource in the manufactories of Calw, in which they obtained work. They afterwards made upon their own account large quantities of stockings, by means of a knitting frame. This branch of industry is now almost extinct. Pastor Keller, the author of a little German work, which exhibits no very friendly feeling towards the Vaudois, was minister of the parish of New Engstedt for a few years.¹

The administration of these little communities was confided to a syndic and a deacon, who were usually also elders of the church. Besides these, there were two other elders, and all together bore the name of justiciers. Either the pastor or the syndic presided in the consistory. At Pinache, a syndic, six councillors, a secretary, and a serjeant² were elected. At Grand Villar it was the same, except that the number of councillors was reduced to four.

Four years after the foundation of these colonies, new events forced 1000 persons more to leave the valley of Pragela. These also were received in Wurtemberg, and subsequently located in the district of HEILBRONN, near Brackenheim. This situation offered advantages very superior to those of the other colonies. The land was capable of growing vines and mulberries; and was not so immediately in the vicinity of great forests. Holland furnished the means of building a church and a school. Some of the settlers, being natives of Usseaux, some of Mentoules, and some of Fenestrelles,³ they each wished to give to the village which they built the uninviting appearance and unproductive soil of the lands we had to break up made us regret the more. Sometimes the supper hour passed in these conversations; for our grief prevented us from feeling hunger; and there, as we called to remembrance the events of our history, some prayed, and others deplored their fate; and some, with their elbows on their knees, held their head with both hands; and you might see the tears run from their eyes, whilst they wept without ceasing." The worthy old woman from whom I derived this account, nearly twenty years since, had then thirty one grandchildren, and six great-grandchildren.

¹ During this time he was always at law with his parish, about a field which he desired to appropriate to himself, and which he could not obtain. (Note communicated by the late M. Mondon, the last of the Vaudois pastors at Grand Villar.)

² A public functionary, combining the characters of officer of court, constable, and rural policeman.

³ A part of the inhabitants who forsook these same villages founded the colony

the name of that in which they were born; but as their lands were situated between Nordheim and Hausen, they agreed that it should bear the name of Nordhausen. For some time, however, the upper part of the village received amongst its inhabitants the name of Mentoul, and the lower part of Fenestrelle. There are districts in the neighbourhood which bear the names of other localities in the Vaudois valleys, as Lanvers, Les Vignes, La Cartéra, Le Saret, La Giourna; and there are some with names derived from the Bible, as Goshen and Horeb.

This colony is situated in a pleasant little valley, surrounded on one side by vineyards, and by orchards on the other. The bottom of the valley is occupied with meadows, separated by rows of willows. The climate is mild, and there is little snow in winter; the roofs of the houses are, therefore, less steep in their slope than in other localities. It is richer than any other of the colonies which we have seen, and is the only one which can be considered as entirely Vaudois; for it cannot be denied that the majority of the exiles of 1698 were French refugees. The parish of Nordhausen was not erected till 1703.¹ Here the traces of Vaudois origin have been most perfectly retained, in the costume and accent of the people. Here has been preserved, as in the Vaudois valleys, the custom of presenting to the guests at a marriage festival, a small piece of ribbon, known by the name of a livery. The very profiles of the people often bear some resemblance to the Italian type. Keener eyes, darker hair, and features less expanded, generally form the characteristics by which these inheritors of a warmer blood, still telling of a southern sun, may, for a long time, be recognized in the midst of a German population.

One thing which must have contributed much to maintain their national peculiarities, was the care which these emigrants long took to contract marriages only amongst themselves, and the difficulty which they even found of being admitted into other families. They were accustomed also to meet often for conversation regarding of Waldensberg, in Hanau, in the principality of Yssemburg. Some account will be given of it in next chapter.

¹ The emigrants arrived there under the guidance of their pastor, John Martin. (Note by M. Schmidt, pastor of Waldensberg, 5th June, 1824.) But it would seem that this minister did not long survive his banishment; for the first pastor of Nordhausen who is mentioned is M. Geymar. (Records of Nordhausen, consulted in 1833.) This colony, with Pérouse and New Engstedt, did not participate in the English subsidies; but its pastors received a pension of 200 francs from Holland. The French colony of Canstadt was indebted to the same quarter for the support of its pastor. (MS. paper by M. Archausser, pastor of the French churches of Canstadt and Ludwigsburg.) This pension was afterwards withdrawn. Application was then made to the Duke of Wurtemberg, who granted eighty-five florins per annum to the pastor, and forty or fifty florins to the schoolmaster.

former days. The traveller who came from their own land was asked many questions concerning the life which the people led there, the aspect of the country, and the value of land. They introduced into Germany the culture of the mulberry and the potato, the latter of which would, no doubt, have become general without them, but which was then little known.¹ Some of their communities possess flocks of 100 or 200 sheep. The profit of these flocks is ordinarily farmed at a fixed rent. The peasants still wear little leathern caps, such as may be seen in the portraits of Luther and Calvin on the heads of these Reformers. They have no forests, but they have the right to gather dry branches and dead wood in the neighbouring forests. Some of these forests contain stags, roebucks, and wild boars. Hence in every village may be seen a hostelry with the sign of the stag.

During the wars of Napoleon, the inhabitants of these peaceful colonies were often chosen to serve as interpreters to the French, and when the use of the French language was lost, the patois of the Alps was still spoken in the domestic intercourse of families; but a large number of German words and phrases were soon mingled with it. At the present day the primitive idiom is completely forgotten, except by the aged; whereas at first there were instances of the German children of the neighbourhood learning and speaking it. The device of the Vaudois, a lamp surrounded with stars, is still painted on the pulpits of some of the churches,² but the only language now heard in them is that of the adopted country.

The Grand Consistory of Stuttgart had always earnestly desired to accomplish a union of the Vaudois with the National Church;³ indeed, they had been received into Wurtemberg only upon their declaration that they were not Calvinists, and in the expectation that they might one day be induced to join the ranks of Lutheranism. These two branches of the same stem were destined to approach one another more nearly in their further growth; and now they intermingle their foliage. The union of the two churches is now only a question of ritual uniformity, rather than of doctrinal differences. But at first it was not so.

¹ In 1710 the German physicians still considered potatoes as injurious to health. A Vaudois, named Signoret, brought 200 of them to Arnaud, who cultivated them at Schoenberg (in 1701), and afterwards sent some of them to each Vaudois colony. (Letter of Arnaud, dated from Les Muriers de Schönberg, 24th November, 1710, quoted by HANN, pp. 231, 232, with many other particulars.) We read in Moser (§ lxxviii.), that the Duke of Wurtemberg having caused 200 mulberry trees to be bought, in order to be sold again to the Vaudois, the Vaudois refused to take them. But this only proves how well they understood the cultivation of that tree, which requires a preparation of the ground beforehand; and the name of Les Muriers, given to a place at Schoenberg, sufficiently attests the interest which they took in it. They extended the cultivation of the vine also to Nordhausen and Gros Villar.

² Particularly at Grand Villar and Petit Villar, Balmbach, and Waldorf. (But this observation refers to 1833.)

³ "At first there were Vaudois families in almost all the villages of the bailiwick of Maulbronn. Those in which they were most numerous were Ottisheim, Schmiche, Oelbronn, Kaisersweiler, &c." (MS. cited by HANN, p. 233.) These scattered families were the first to join the National Church.

Promises and threats were employed in succession, to induce the particular consistories of the Vaudois churches to acknowledge the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Lutheran consistory. As long as Wurtemberg was governed by Catholic princes—which was till 1797—the government of that country had no interest in favouring the one more than the other. Under the reign of Frederic,¹ the first Lutheran sovereign, some of the French pastors ministering in the Vaudois colonies were induced to sign a petition, in which they set forth that the employment of the German language having now become most general among their parishioners in the ordinary intercourse of their neighbourhoods, it would be a proper thing to introduce it in public instruction and in preaching. The government replied that his majesty would permit the introduction of the German language in the colonies, if it were not opposed by any of the Vaudois. But this qualifying clause was not made public. The Dean of Stuttgart only announced that the introduction of this language was authorized, and he ordered that religious services should thenceforth be everywhere conducted in German. The king was then at Ludwigsburg; some of the Vaudois complained to him, and Frederic ordered that the use of the French language should be immediately resumed.² He even added an express prohibition of all innovation, and a severe admonition addressed to those who had taken upon them to introduce these changes.

In 1806, it was merely granted, as a thing pertaining to regularity, that the particular administrations of each colony should be placed under those of their respective bailiwicks. This was at once to subordinate the Protestant to the Lutheran consistories. In 1808, it was ordained that all civil registers, then intrusted by the state to the pastors, should be kept in German. The Vaudois, however, had still their General Dean,³ who maintained the apparent integrity of their ecclesiastical constitution. But after the death of Frederic, and the accession of William I. to the throne, new attempts were made to germanize the Vaudois churches. This was first done by favouring mixed marriages between Vaudois and Lutherans; but the spirit of nationality was still too strong in the Vaudois to be overcome by this means. The schoolmasters were next requested to teach the German language along with the French; and finally, as their maintenance, along with that of the pastors, was too heavy a burden for these poor colonial parishes, an offer was made of provision for all this, if they would accept German pastors; but the reply was an unanimous refusal.—“We will rather work with our hands,” said the colonists, “to support our pastors and teachers, than show ourselves so forgetful of our ancestors, and cease to be their children.” “Is not this in bad feeling?” it was said on the other hand. “Is not this to despise the king’s kindness? Do not these southerners¹ thus display their haughty and obstinate character?” Such were the sentiments with which that refusal was listened to when it reached the ears of those who stood around the throne.² At last an assembly of the states, held at Stuttgart, in 1821, decided that a sum of 12,000 florins should be allowed annually to the ecclesiastical administration of the country, for the relief of those Vaudois churches which had given up, or should yet give up, to that administration the right of choosing their pastors and schoolmasters.

¹ Frederic I., who obtained the title of King, in virtue of the treaty of Presburg, in 1805.

² This prince had passed his youth at Montbeliard (till he was 10 years old), and at Lausanne (till he was 18). He was very well acquainted with the French language, loved the Reformed Church, and was not displeased to see both churches flourishing in his dominions.

³ Called Moderator in their first Synodal Acts.

Then began a period of annoyance and agitation, resistance and manœuvre of every kind, the design being to induce each of these little colonies to conclude a separate arrangement for itself upon this basis. The pastors and schoolmasters, who alone were to profit by the 12,000 florins, almost everywhere, and with very few exceptions,³ strongly recommended compliance with the terms proposed. The people alone resisted; but although they had the right of sending lay deputies to the synods, the difficulty which a countryman always feels in expressing himself on questions which are not familiar to him, and the silence to which he is reduced by the first observations made in opposition to what he says, paralyzed their energies in that sphere.

The last general synod of the Vaudois churches in Wurtemberg was held at Stuttgart in 1823.⁴ Much was said about effecting a

¹ Welches, an expression of contempt employed in Germany against the French.

² I owe the reply of the Vaudois, and the observations which follow, to a privy councillor, who himself took part in these events.

³ The schoolmaster of Nordhausen, for example, by name Clapier, far from seeking this augmentation of his salary, refused to receive it, when the germanization of the Vaudois churches had been resolved upon by the Synod of 1823.

⁴ One of the members of that assembly said to me, “The last really free synod fusion of the two Protestant churches into one, under the common name of Evangelical, as had already been done in Baden. The Vaudois deputies said that they were very far from being opposed to that union, but that they wished to preserve the use of the French language in their churches. "But," they were asked, "are you not obliged to make use of the German language every day, and will you refuse to allow it to be taught in your schools?"—"No," they replied.—"If then," it was urged, "you are not opposed to the union of our churches, there remains no objection to the Lutheran children of the villages which you inhabit going to the same schools with yours, and vice versâ. You would thus also obtain schoolmasters better remunerated and better superintended." This point being gained, they were given to understand that when all their children should know German, and these children, being grown up, should form a new generation, there could then be no reasonable motive for refusing to allow German sermons in their places of worship. They dared not to protest, but they insisted that at least no modification should be made in their worship before the decease of their present pastors. They demanded also the preservation of the same discipline, and stipulated for the translation of their religious books into German for the use of the new generation.

In consequence of these arrangements, each parish came to undergo the change singly on the death of its pastor; but the greater part of them made only a conditional renunciation of their right of election. Pinache had given up the right only for one time; these words were not inserted in the deed of renunciation, and the right was lost. Nordhausen, having built a place of worship, of which the expense was very considerable, gave up this right on condition that the king should pay the cost of this edifice. He paid only a part of it, but kept the right entirely. New Engstedt demanded that the crown should take upon itself the entire maintenance of the pastor and schoolmaster, in order to be able to sell the lands which had been set apart for this object, and so to pay the debts of the commune. These conditions, also, were but partially fulfilled. Le Villar required only the erection of a minister's house at the expense of the government, and an annual allocation to the minister's use of some loads of wood from the state forests; but the right, which was given up, was lost, and nothing was obtained instead. In fact, each parish made its arrangements separately, and regret was soon felt everywhere that so much had been conceded.

was held in 1821; for in 1823 no anxiety was any longer felt as to what we might do."

Under the pretext of reforming the consistorial boundaries, these little churches were dismembered, and the number of their pastors was diminished.¹ The revenues of the suppressed parishes proved nearly sufficient to cover the sum of 12,000 florins, which had been granted in order to effect these changes. The Vaudois complained; but it was too late. German preachers were sent to them even before their French preachers died, and those of the French preachers who still survived, were caused to retire, and received a pension to spend their latter years in peace,² whilst they beheld the parochial duties discharged by a young German minister, who was designated the vicar.

"It grieved us beyond expression" said an old man to me, "when we then entered our churches, and heard in them a foreign tongue. Numbers refused to go to them; some absented themselves from the communion; almost all kept silence when other songs than our own good old psalms were sung. There were even some who never set foot again within their accustomed sanctuaries. Others went a number of leagues every Sabbath, to hear a French sermon in some great town. But ere long these pulpits also were closed.³ There remained to us, then, nothing but our hereditary

¹ Those of Lucerna, Schönberg and Dürmentz, Sengack and Chorres, were suppressed. All the ecclesiastical lands of the church of Dürmentz were sold for behoof of the Lutheran deanery. The seats of the church, and the pastor's house itself, shared the same fate. There remains only a portion of the steeple still rising above four deserted walls, as if to attest that the Vaudois formerly had a church there.

² The last two pastors of Vaudois origin who enjoyed this retiring pension, were those of Grand Villar and New Engstedt. The latter, whose name was Geymonat, was born at Le Villar, in the valley of Lucerna. After having learned English in the house of M. Paul Appia, then pastor at Bobi, he went to England, where he became for the first time a communicant. Afterwards, coming to Geneva, he learned watchmaking there, which he abandoned at the age of twenty-three years, and competed for a bursary at Lausanne. Having obtained it, he completed his studies there. Being subsequently called to minister in the Vaudois churches, he died unmarried at New Engstedt, at an advanced age. His learning and talents made his company to be desired, but his uncouth manners often repelled visitors. He spent much in charity, but was more forward to do so in the case of strangers than of his own compatriots; he even expressed himself concerning his parishioners in a manner not very favourable; and his last days were spent in complete isolation.

The pastor of Grand Villar survived him some years. He was thus the patriarch and the last of the Vaudois ministers in Wurtemberg. He was a native of Bobi, in the valley of Lucerna, and his name was Mondon. He had studied at Basle, and was called to the Vaudois colonies in 1792. He died at the age of almost 100 years, in his adopted country, leaving there five children, and a memory venerated throughout the whole neighbourhood. I regret that the tribute of gratitude, called forth by the remembrance of his kind hospitality, can now only be paid to his memory.

³ The French churches of Canstadt, Stuttgart, and Ludwigsburg were suppressed at this period.

bibles, and I can assure you," he added, "that before we admitted into our houses the German bibles, there were in each village assiduous conferences, which lasted more than a year, during which meetings were held in the evenings, to examine, line by line, if all that was contained in the new editions was really accordant with our own old text.¹ But upon being assured that they were accordant, we were a little comforted. Besides, our children no longer understood French. We alone had those recollections and associations, which made the change distressful. When we shall be no more, no one will regret the absence of an unknown language, and of the distinctive character which was left us by our fathers."

The whole population, however, looked upon these changes with regret.² There resulted therefore an estrangement between the pastor and his flock,³ and thence again a religious indifference, of which the traces subsist to the present day. Yet it must be acknowledged that in many respects the union of the Vaudois colonies at that time to the National Church was opportune—that it put an end to many abuses, was attended with some happy results, and would sooner or later have become inevitable. The French language was, in fact, falling into disuse in these little villages, lost in the midst of a German population; the attention of their mother-country was more and more withdrawn from them; in the election of pastors, and more particularly in that of school-masters, there were often intrigues, divisions, and very bad choices made. Ecclesiastical discipline had lost its power. In this matter, consistency and regularity, at least in administration, have taken the place of weakness and capriciousness. The schools are more carefully conducted. All the children learn reading and arithmetic. They attend school for five hours each day, from the age of six to that of fourteen years. Then they are confirmed, and from fourteen to eighteen years they only attend the Sabbath-school, where they are questioned as catechumens. Scholars from the age of ten to fourteen years are also required to attend on these religious instructions. Formerly they were caused to learn and repeat the catechism; now they are only taught the gospel. Expositions, specially intended for the young, were held at first on

¹ There were still, however, many poor families who did not possess the means to purchase a bible. The German pastor in London, M. Steinkopf, a member of a religious society for diffusing the Sacred Scriptures, zealously exerted himself to procure bibles for them. (Note by Dean Anhaeusser.)

² The Vaudois then numbered 3000; in 1699 there had arrived only 700 or 800. (Same source.)

³ In some of these Vaudois parishes the people even refused, for some days at first, to sell to the new German pastor the provisions necessary for his house, such as milk, vegetables, and fruit.

Sabbaths, Wednesdays, and Fridays. They are now less frequent. Inspections and pastoral visitations, conferences and colloquies exercise a happy influence on the state of these churches. The service of song is better conducted than in former times. Moreover, the separation which existed between the Vaudois and the inhabitants of the country, diminishes every day. When the Vaudois spoke amongst themselves a foreign tongue, they inspired distrust. The independence of their church excited also a certain jealousy on the part of the national church. These causes of division have at last disappeared.

Under these external forms—important, certainly, but which are often so remote from life—may they be enabled to preserve in its integrity the faith which gave being to their church! for it was because they would yield up nothing of their faith, that their fathers were proscribed. May the memories of the Janavels, the Arnands, and all the other illustrious confessors of the Crucified One be ever preserved among them! Above all, may their piety endure—that best inheritance which the children of the Israel of the Alps, in days still future, can derive from the former periods of its history!

CHAPTER X.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS COLONIES FOUNDED IN HESSE-DARMSTADT AND OTHER PARTS OF GERMANY, IN CONSEQUENCE OF THE EXPULSION OF 1698, AND SUBSEQUENT EMIGRATIONS.¹

(A.D. 1698 TO A.D. 1818.)

Application to the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt in 1686—Letters-patent authorizing the settlement of Vaudois in Hesse-Darmstadt in 1699—Description of the Vaudois villages—Painful consequences of the French Revolution—Emigrations to America—Vaudois settlements in the grand duchy of Baden—Vaudois settlement of Waldensberg, in Hanau—Vaudois colony of Dornholzhausen, near Homburg—Minor settlements.

AT the time of their first expulsion, in 1686, the Vaudois had made application to the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, with the view of obtaining an asylum in his dominions. They suffered for their religious opinions, for their attachment to the gospel, and because of the regard which they had to their conscientious convictions; and, in the confidence of their sincere faith, they did not hesitate to say in their petition:—"As the ark of the covenant, when it was received into the house of Obededom, brought great blessings upon him and upon all his house, so every Christian suffering for the truth, that is received by your most serene highness, will infallibly bring blessings from heaven upon your sacred person and your most serene family."¹ The faculty of theology of Giesen was called to give its judgment concerning their admission. It decided that they should be admitted, on condition that they should avoid all religious controversy, and that they should acknowledge the sovereign as head of the church (Summus Episcopus), without, however, being required to make any modification of their confession of faith.²

¹ AUTHORITIES.—The same as in Part III., Chapter VIII., except Moser, Keller, and Dieterici; with the addition of some documents, which are indicated at the bottom of the pages.

The reader has already been informed how these poor exiles afterwards returned to their own country in 1689; how they were re-established there in 1692; what part they took in the war which Victor Amadeus waged against France; and what welcome the French refugees, proscribed by Louis XIV. in 1685 and subsequent years, received in the valleys, with the consent and even the express encouragement of the Duke of Savoy. But after the duke had made peace for himself with the King of France, the whole aspect of things was changed; the influence of Louis XIV. was again in the ascendant, and the persecutions which he directed against his Protestant subjects of the valleys of Pragela, La Doire, and Bardonnèche, awakened the just fears of their brethren in the neighbouring valleys, under the dominion of the Duke of Savoy. Then one of those Vaudois pastors, who were soon to be proscribed, wrote to the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt a letter, in which he said—"My lord, things have so changed in this country, that the greater part of those who fear God think only of leaving it, and seeking a retreat elsewhere. Each has his own intention, and mine is simply to take a few good families with me, and to retire into the dominions of your highness."³

This design, voluntarily conceived, was soon to be hastened to compulsory execution. The edict of 1st July, 1698, by which

¹ State Archives of Darmstadt. This document bears no date, as is the case generally with all the ancient petitions of the Vaudois, whether in Piedmont or in their colonies. The date of the petition is often to be discovered only from that of the reply to it.

² This report is dated 4th September, 1688, and is quoted by HAHN, p. 241 (from a manuscript notice of it).

³ This letter is dated from the Val Lucerna, the 25th of October, 1696, and is signed by Papon, who was then pastor at Rocheplate and Prarusting. Transcribed from the State Archives of Hesse-Darmstadt.

Victor Amadeus banished from his dominions all Protestants of French origin, gave a complete triumph to the persecuting influence of Louis XIV.; and the author of this letter, along with six other ministers of the Vaudois valleys, were obliged to leave the country. A great number of the inhabitants of the country, who had allied themselves to the French refugees, as well as the refugees themselves, and all foreigners who happened to be in the valleys, found themselves under the necessity of leaving the dominions of Savoy in the autumn of 1698. The greater part of the exiles passed the following winter in Switzerland, and in the spring of 1699 resumed their designs of colonization in Germany. We have already seen how a part of these emigrants settled in Wurtemberg; but the first grants made to them were in Hesse-Darmstadt. These grants, signed¹ by the Landgrave Ernest Louis, served as a model for those which they afterwards obtained from Eberhard Louis, Grand Duke of Wurtemberg. The following were the terms of the letters patent which they obtained from the landgrave:²—

“His Britannic majesty, and their high mightinesses the States-General of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, having in a very particuliar manner recommended to us the Vaudois who left the valleys of Piedmont in the month of September last (1698), in consequence of an express order of his royal highness the Duke of Savoy, and some electors and Protestant princes of the empire having afterwards written to us very strongly in their favour, and the Sieur Peter Walkenier, in his capacity of envoy extraordinary of their high mightinesses, having made application to us on the same subject;

“And we, being moved with lively compassion in beholding that people wandering about, despoiled of everything, and in quest of a retreat and asylum in Germany, have resolved, in the exercise of our sovereign power, and with the advice of our council, to set apart for them a portion of our dominions, in which they may be settled, and received under our protection. . . . So that no one shall have any title to disquiet or vex them in any way whatever, whilst they conscientiously observe our orders, and submit themselves to our laws, conformably to the privileges which it is our good pleasure to grant them in the articles following:—

“I. They, and their descendants for ever, shall enjoy the free exercise of their religion. . . . They shall have the right of conducting their worship in French, Italian, or German, . . . in their churches or houses, . . . preaching the word of God . . . according to the rules of their own Discipline.

¹ On 22d April (2d May), 1699.

² According to the second edition, printed at Darmstadt in 1734 (a quarto of eight leaves, not paged).

"II. They shall have the power of choosing as many pastors and schoolmasters as are requisite for them, and of calling them, by their own synod, from whencesoever they think fit. The pastors shall take the oath of fidelity to the landgrave, and shall be inducted by a commissioner of the government.

"III. Each parish shall be entitled to have its consistory (conventum ecclesiasticum), composed of elders, deacons, and the pastor.

"IV. They shall have synods 'to maintain good order, to terminate disputes, . . . to suspend, depose, or dismiss pastors of heterodox doctrine or of scandalous life;' all in accordance with their own discipline, and with the approbation of the government.

"V. They shall be entitled to hold general synods, composed of representatives of all the German colonies, in whatsoever state they may be founded, and wheresoever the synod may be held. The landgrave reserves to himself the right of sending a commissioner.

"VI. 'Neither they, nor their descendants, born, or to be born, shall ever be obliged, under any pretext whatsoever, to recognize any other customs than those which belong to themselves, or any other ecclesiastical government than that of their own Discipline.'

"VII. Their pastors shall have power to visit with full freedom all sick persons of their own nation, in whatsoever part of our dominions they may be, 'showing the ordinary civilities to the pastor of the place.' The same authorization is granted as to the visiting of prisoners.

"VIII.¹ Their pastors and deacons shall never be required to answer in courts of justice, as witnesses, concerning things which may have been revealed to them in secret, 'or in their ecclesiastical assemblies, sub sigillo confessionis,' except in case of the crime of high treason.

"IX. For the administration of justice, they shall have the right to establish amongst themselves a secular council, composed of mayors and sheriffs, with other capable persons, elected by them and approved by us. This council shall have power of deciding without appeal in regard to sums not exceeding fifty florins. It is our pleasure also that it take cognizance of their criminal cases, and pronounce sentence in our name; but the sentence shall not be carried into execution without our ratification, . . . we reserving to ourselves the right of pardon. No seizure shall take place of the person or goods of any Vaudois, without the sentence of the aforesaid council.

¹ This number is marked thus, IIX. in the original.

X. Besides this council, which shall also regulate and administer matters of police according to their customs, it is our pleasure that they shall likewise have, of their own number, sergeants, notaries-public, and other persons necessary for the preservation of order in society.

"XI. The right of carrying arms and of exercise in the use of them, is granted in perpetuity to the inhabitants of these colonies. In case of war, they shall form a corps by themselves, commanded by their own officers; and they shall never be obliged to bear arms beyond the limits of our dominions.

"XII. We declare them and their descendants, from this time forward and for ever, to be admissible to all public offices—civil, political, or ecclesiastical—for which they shall have the requisite qualifications. Their children shall be admitted into the colleges and universities.

"XIII. Their pastors, and persons holding office in connection with the administration of justice, or with matters of police, or as military officers, shall perpetually enjoy the same honours and advantages which are enjoyed at the time by functionaries of the corresponding class in our dominions.

"XIV. They shall have power to dispose of their properties according to their own pleasure. If any of them shall happen to die intestate, his property shall fall to his nearest relatives; if he shall have no heirs, it shall be divided between the state and the poor of his commune. In this latter case, a council of administration, named by the consistory, shall have the management of the property.

"XV. The Vaudois colonies shall be subjected to no servitude, and shall hold of the sovereign alone.

"XVI. No stranger shall be entitled to settle among them without their consent.

"XVII. During the fifteen years of exemption from taxes which are granted them, they shall be free from all charge for the lodging of soldiers.

"XVIII. All their public institutions and public property shall be exempt from public burdens.

"XIX. They shall be entitled to trade in any part of our dominions, without authorization or patent.

"XX. They shall be permitted to carry on any kind of manufacture, under the management and direction of persons appointed by themselves.

“XXI. ‘If, by the blessing of God, they shall extend, prosper, and multiply, they shall have power to establish a council of merchants, to judge and decide in litigations connected with commerce.’

“XXII. We grant to them that, when it shall please God to visit them with pestilence, they shall not be forced away from their villages.

“XXIII. They are exempted for fifteen years from excise duties (indirect taxation).

“XXIV. The lands which shall be assigned them¹ shall be their own property.

“XXV. With regard to the woods and other undivided properties belonging to the people of the communes in which they shall settle, they shall have the same right to them that the people of these communes have.

“XXVI.—We authorize the Vaudois, and other Protestants who shall settle there, to build a town near Keltersbach, where lands shall be allotted to them without price.

“XXVII.—They shall be entitled to divide these lands amongst themselves, and to cultivate them as they think fit.

“XXVIII.—Facilities shall be accorded them for procuring timber for carpenter-work, and for the transport of materials.

“XXIX.—They are exempted from compulsory services, taxes, and burdens, for fifteen years.

“XXX.—These exemptions shall be continued to their heirs, if those who now enjoy them shall die within that time.

“XXXI.—After that period they shall pay taxes like our other subjects.

“XXXII.—During these fifteen years they shall pay no tithes; and after that period a part of the tithes shall be given up to them for the maintenance of orphans, the poor, or the servants of their church.

“XXXIII.—They shall, in all respects, be treated as the other inhabitants of the country. Our successors shall sign the present letters-patent, as we sign them ourselves.”²

It will be seen that in this deed the Landgrave Ernest Louis expressed himself in the most generous terms. But letters-patent will no more suffice to people and enrich a country, than constitutions will to make it moral. There is mention in this grant of cities to be founded, of tribunals of commerce to be instituted, of manufactures to be established upon a great scale; but alas! there were in reality only a few poor little villages to be constructed in the midst of the forests, sad hiding-places of misery and adversity, less resembling towns than temporary hamlets, reminding the spectator of the huts of travellers, or the tents of the patriarchs in the desert.

¹ In the communes and dependencies of Areilghem, Merselden, Russelsheim, and Keltersbach.

² This paper bears only two signatures, that of Ernest Louis, Landgrave of Hesse, and that of Valkenier, Envoy Extraordinary of the States-General of the Netherlands.

To the north-east of Darmstadt there stretches a monotonous expanse, whose serrated horizon line indicates the vast extent of the forest. The ground is undulating, and exhibits a confused mass of little hills, presenting sometimes bare and arid summits, and sometimes bushy declivities, where the bushes are closely interwoven by brambles and hops. These sombre woods are traversed only by bad and tortuous roads, full of mud and stones, and almost everywhere inaccessible to wheeled carriages. Stagnant waters fill the hollows, on the banks of which stand trees of great age. Here and there picturesque scenes occur, but they are not gladdened by any appearance of life. After some hours' walking, the traveller arrives at the hills of Schlampeberg, beyond which he finds the pleasant little town of Ober Ramstadt, which has the honour of having given birth to Lichtemberg, a man of literary eminence, remarkable at once for erudition and for originality. Hills less wooded then present themselves, and less fertile lands are seen, and having passed through these, we come to the Vaudois settlements.

Hesse-Darmstadt contains five of these. Rorbach,¹ Wembach, and Heim,² are situated in the district we have now supposed ourselves to enter. There were some Vaudois settled also at Raunen and Aarheilgen,³ villages of the neighbourhood. The other two are Waldorf and Welchneureth, which is pronounced simply Neireth, and is not far from Waldorf, but is situated, I think, in the neighbouring territory of Hesse. Rorbach is situated in a little hollow formed of meadow-land, bounded by forests or fields of little fertility.⁴ It was the residence of Montoux,⁵ and a sort of capital for

¹ Or rather Rohrbach. The word signifies The Brook of Reeds.

² Sometimes written Haam or Halm.

³ Pronounced Arleiguen. The Archives of Darmstadt contain petitions addressed to the landgrave by the Vaudois of these localities. Those of Raunen demanded leave to quit that country, because of the pernicious fevers engendered by the marshes. (This petition has no date, but it bears the signature of Montoux.)

⁴ In 1834, the burgomaster of Rorbach was of the name of Geymet, and the schoolmaster's name was Pastre. The latter still knew a little of the patois of the Vaudois valleys.

⁵ The name of the pastor Montoux, who left the Vaudois valleys, was Jacob.—His son Daniel, who, in 1730, was pastor of Dürmentz, in Wurtemberg, became pastor of the parish of Rorbach after the death of his father.—The son of the latter was John Montoux, who was also a pastor in the Vaudois colonies.

the other colonies founded in the neighbourhood. Wembach is at a short distance. The situation is almost exactly similar, but the country is still poorer; and finally, a small group of houses, like a handful of stones and chips of wood flung down upon the slope of a hill, constitutes the hamlet of Heim.¹ It is on the frontiers of Hesse. In front of the village magnificent forests cover an abruptly terminating table-land. Not far from this is Waldorf, which, like Rorbach, was the residence of a pastor. It is a small village, of which the houses are mingled with orchards and gardens, hidden amidst woods, on the left bank of the Maine, a few leagues from Frankfort. These woods, broken by frequent pieces of open ground, forming wet meadows of considerable extent, contain, in the district of Waldorf, a number of isolated farms, of which some are occupied by descendants of the Vaudois.

All these humble parishes, founded by the exiles from Piedmont, remained closely connected with those of Wurtemberg. Associated as members of one body, they lent each other mutual assistance. They held their synods in common; their pastors participated in the same supplies from foreign parts, and were removed from one colony to another, according to the wants of the flocks, without at all changing their ecclesiastical connections, even although their abodes were in different states. But in respect of material prosperity, the colonies in Wurtemberg enjoyed it most; those of the grand duchy of Darmstadt were poorer, and had much to suffer, especially after the French Revolution. Deprived of foreign aid, they made sacrifices beyond their strength, without being able to supply the want of it. The position of the pastors and schoolmasters became more and more painful. They remained, however, at their post, both from motives of duty and of affection. But some of their villages were ravaged by the wars which took place between that period and 1814. They were thus deprived of the resources previously at their disposal.

"In Wurtemberg," says a manuscript note,² "the king made up the loss to them in part, by incorporating them as much as possible with his other subjects.¹ But in the grand duchy of Darmstadt their situation has become intolerable, for they are now crushed under the double weight of the tithes which they owe to the sovereign as farmers² of his domains, and of all the annual imposts which his other subjects pay to him. In this last respect they have been assimilated to the people of the country since the invasion,³ without the return of peace having brought them any relief. Their poverty has therefore dreadfully increased. Twenty-five or thirty families, at least, have already emigrated to America. Almost all the population of one village had engaged to go to Brazil, but received warning that the founder of that scheme of colonization was a knave, and this false step has aggravated their misery. In this state of things many families would still be ready to emigrate, if they were assured of a good settlement, and of facilities for their passage. They would be composed of artisans and hardy labourers, accustomed to a rough life, and acquainted only with hardships."⁴

¹ In 1820 there were at Rorbach 53 families, composed of 243 persons; at Wembach, 38 families, or 180 persons; at Heim, 14 families, of 73 persons in all. (HAHN, p. 241.)

² This note, which has no signature, was transmitted to me as a document, by M. APPIA, of Frankfort. It is dated from Paris, 13th September, 1830, and concludes thus:—"The author of this note knows the wants of these unfortunate churches; and without having received from them any commission to act in that matter, he knows, from previous transactions, in which he was engaged on their behalf, that facilities of emigration would be eagerly embraced by them as a deliverance."

"About 1801," says another document,⁵ "a colony of sixty-five or seventy families, among whom were four families of Vaudois,⁶ set out for America, putting into the hands of their leader⁷ the whole price of what they had possessed. With this a great tract of country was purchased near Philadelphia, which they brought into cultivation. At the end of seven years it was sold again at a considerable profit, and the colonists purchased in its stead another larger and more fertile tract on the banks of the Mississippi. There this little colony, which has now become very populous, resolved that no stranger should ever be permitted to settle within its territory." Accounts are given of its prosperity, and of the manner

¹ This incorporation took place also in Darmstadt. It was effected there even sooner (1821) than in Wurtemberg (1824); the latter country having to assimilate to itself a greater number of communes. But the true causes of the distress of the Vaudois in Hesse will be pointed out afterwards.

² This word cannot be taken in the sense which we now give to it, for the lands occupied by the Vaudois had been granted to them as their own property. (Letters-patent of 22d April, 1699. Arts. vi., xv., xvii., and from § xxiii. to xxxii.)

³ This assimilation took place in 1815.

⁴ In a subsequent part of this paper it is said, "A Vaudois writes me from Brussels, that perhaps General Lafayette, the friend of all the oppressed, will consent to recommend these descendants of the martyrs to one of the United States of America, that they may obtain a district to clear. . . . But the government of Darmstadt impedes all emigration, by chancery difficulties . . ." &c.

⁵ Communicated by M. Mondon, the last of the Vaudois pastors in Wurtemberg.

⁶ Viz., one from Gros-Villar, two from Petit-Villar, and one from Tiplbach.

⁷ The name of this leader was REPLET. He was a native of Iptingen; he was first a weaver, afterwards a Communist preacher. It is said that at his death he left property worth six millions [of francs, £250,000].

of life amongst the colonists in these distant regions,¹ which are too extraordinary to be admitted into this history without inquiry, or without more precise information.

Some of the Vaudois also settled, in 1699, in the GRAND DUCHY OF BADEN. The privileges granted to them by the Grand Duke Frederic Magnus, were almost the same with those which they enjoyed in other states. The free exercise of their religion, and the use of the French language, were accorded to them by article v.; the maintenance of their ecclesiastical discipline by § vi. to ix.; the privileges of their pastors by § x. and xi.; and concerning the support of their pastors, we read, "His most serene highness aforesaid, also promises to the petitioners to contribute thereto an annual sum of fifty florins. They shall receive, moreover, five coupes of wheat, ten coupes of rye, and a whole cask of wine. Their regent (schoolmaster) shall receive the half of the above; and all shall be furnished by the Economy of Durlach."² (§ xii.)

These provisions related especially to the colonies of Balmbach and Mutschelbach,³ situated on the frontiers of Wurtemberg, to which they belonged for some time. The situation which they occupy is verdant and wooded, but cold. The use of the French language has been completely lost there since the commencement of the present century.

Some interesting details have been published concerning the difficulties of various kinds which the colonists had to encounter.⁴ The colony of Frederichsthal was founded in 1710, near Carlsruhe, by some French refugees, with whom were associated a few Vaudois of Pragela. This little village is situated in a level country, entirely surrounded by forests, and at a short distance from the Rhine. Its first pastor was not called till 1720.⁵ His name was Isaiah Aubry

¹ All their labours, it is said, are performed in common. Property belongs to the community, &c.

² Derived from the Archives of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. T., p. 176, where we find "Extract of the privileges which his most serene highness Frederic Magnus, Margrave of Baden and Hochberg, granted in the year 1699 to the Vaudois Reformed, his petitioners, in the time of their universal desolation, by a regular deed."

³ The second of these was annexed to the first (until 1821, when the fusion of these parishes took place with the German church). Mutschelbach formed part of the bailiwick of Neunberg (Wurtemberg) till 1805.

⁴ In the Archives of the Country of Baden, vol. i., No. v (a German journal, published at Carlsruhe).—This number contains twelve letters concerning the Vaudois, with observations by F. J. MONE (who was professor of history at Louvaine before 1831, when that university was suppressed). The Universal Gazette of Halle (No. lix., March, 1821) gives an analysis of this publication. The publication itself I have not had opportunity to examine.

⁵ About Christmas, with the approbation of the grand duke, and upon the recom-

It was by his care that the scattered members of the Reformed Church were organized as a parish, elected a consistory, and commenced public worship; but of this pastor they were soon deprived by the puerile intolerance which then prevailed in the State Church.¹

It is impossible to indicate precisely all the places in which, at this period, some of the Vaudois families may have settled, which left the valley of Pragela singly, or in little groups, from 1698 to 1730; but a distinct parish was founded by them in the country of HANAU, in the principality of Yssemburg, and bailiwick of Wacchtersbach. When Arnand and Papon came to Germany, in 1698, they addressed themselves to the greater part of the Protestant princes of that country,² in order to obtain an asylum for their compatriots expelled from Piedmont. The Count Charles De Yssemburg was one of the first to reply to them favourably,³ and on the 11th of August, 1699, he signed the letters-patent for their settlement. Drawn up under the influence of Walkenier, who so indefatigably exerted himself to find a resting-place for so many wandering families, these letters-patent contain almost exactly the mention of the Ecclesiastical Senates of Heidelberg.—Extract from an attestation given by the church of Frederichsthal. (Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. T., 178.)

¹ The circumstances were these:—The daughter of a Protestant woman had been baptized by a Romish priest. She was married at Altenthal, in 1672, and continued always to live in the Reformed religion; but in her old age, being attacked by hypochondria, she imagined that the baptism which she had received was invalid, and that the priest, instead of having blessed her, had devoted her to Satan. In her gloomy visions, she professed to see the devil, who pursued her everywhere to claim her soul. For a number of years she had demanded to be re-baptized according to the rites of the Reformed Church, assured that Satan would then have no more hold of her. She went from church to church to ask this favour, but all the pastors refused to do it. These reiterated refusals threw her into a sort of frenzy. At last she found the pastor of Frederichsthal, and flung herself at his knees, weeping, and entreating him in the name of Jesus that he would restore peace to her soul. M. Aubry yielded to her desire; and he himself gives the following account of the scene:—"Having caused her to make a brief confession of her faith, I made her kneel down, and then I invoked the name of Jesus over his poor and wretched servant; and after my prayer, which she repeated in her heart, I poured water upon her head, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. She went away rejoicing, blessing God, and persuaded that she would henceforth be delivered from the persecutions of the evil spirit." Thereupon Aubry was accused of being an Anabaptist. The consistory of Carlsruhe pronounced his dismissal, 1st June, 1722. Aubry appealed to the grand duke, who asked the judgment of six faculties of theology, of which three were Protestant, viz., those of Geneva, Basle, and Marburg; and three Lutheran, Jena, Halle, and Tubingue. But the deprivation of the pastor of Frederichsthal was sustained, contrary to the petitions of his congregation. (Registers of the Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. T., pp. 169, 172, 178.)

² From the same source. (Cited by HAHN, pp. 238-240.)

³ By his letter of 19th May, 1699, addressed to his brother (no doubt the Count Maximilian). It is preserved in the Archives of Wacchtersbach.

same articles in favour of the exiles which had been already adopted in Darmstadt, and the adoption of which in Wurtemberg he obtained a few days after.¹

The free exercise of their religion was guaranteed to the Vaudois. (§ i., iii., iv., and v.)² Until they should have places of worship of their own, they were authorized to hold their religious assemblies in the churches of Spilberg or Widgenborn, except only at the hours appropriated to the German services. (§ ii.) Their secular council was not to have power to judge in regard to sums exceeding eighteen florins. (§ vi.) They were exempted for ten years from all compulsory services, contributions, and military taxes. (§ xvii., xix.) They were required to establish their settlement at their own expense; but the succours received from Holland and England enabled them the more easily to do so.

Such was the origin of the village of Waldensberg.³ It is situated on an elevated plain, which rests, like an immense bench, against the mountains of Vogelsberg. In order to reach it, it is necessary to pass amidst a succession of little hills and valleys, which are often very picturesque. Upon the summit of a hill at Golenhausen, three towers, apparently threatening to fall, still mark the remains of the castle of Barbaroussa. Walnut and other fruit trees are scattered over the landscape; the highways are sometimes lined with them; but as we approach Waldensberg we find the roads in worse repair. It is a melancholy looking, isolated village. The luxuriance of a few little gardens beside the houses, alone redeems its mean and miserable aspect.

The exiles who founded it came from Mentoules, in Pragela; they had left their country in the autumn of 1698, and had passed the winter in Switzerland, and the spring of 1699 in Darmstadt. They were not all assembled even in 1700. Walkenier made continual efforts to bring to one spot the members of this dispersed flock,⁴ and to prevent them from being lost by a dissemination, which would have resulted in their being completely forgotten.

¹ At Darmstadt, on 22d April, 1699; at Homburg, on 4th May; at Yssemburg, on 11th August; and in Wurtemberg on 18th September.

² These letters-patent contain twenty-eight articles. They are issued in the name of Ferdinand Maximilian, Count of Yssemburg and Bidingen; and are signed both by the count himself and by Walkenier.

³ The Hill of the Vaudois. This name is sometimes written Valdbert or Falsbert, Waldsberg or Waddenberg; but only in old papers, of a period when the Vaudois were not acquainted with German orthography. In a paper contained in the Archives of Waechtersbach (of date 1700), we read that the Vandois of Waldberg asked for waggons, to go to Hanau for their luggage and their children.

⁴ Letter of 10th May, 1700, to induce the Vaudois to settle. (Obtained at Waldensberg.)

The first pastor of Waldensberg was settled in that parish on 27th July, 1701, by Walkenier himself.¹ But this colony had no proper building for public worship till 1739. The following is a fragment of the sermon preached at its dedication, in that year, by the pastor, David Plan:—"See," said he to the Vaudois, "how, in the extremest affliction which men could endure, God has raised up for your deliverance means in which his power and providence are singularly observable. You have seen the greatest powers of Europe interest themselves in that just quarrel in which you suffer for the truth." And then, taking notice of what Holland and England had done, and of the manner in which they had been received by the Count of Badingen, he adds, "From thenceforth you had at once a sovereign, a father, and a country. From thenceforth you were confounded with his natural subjects. What did I say? Confounded! You were distinguished by the most important privileges, . . . and you have enjoyed them to this day, which is itself a new token of the love of God to you."²

They had, however, painful trials to encounter. At the commencement of their residence at Waldensberg they had no church, no schoolhouse, and no minister's house; but, by the help of collections made for them in foreign countries, and by their own exertions, they had succeeded, at the end of half a century, in obtaining all these. For the stipend of their pastor they were at first obliged to give up fifty arpents of the lands which had been assigned to them, and twenty-five for the salary of the schoolmaster. These were let to farmers of the country, at about one florin per arpent. This yielded seventy-five florins, of which they were obliged to take ten, for ringing the bells and winding up the clock. Such are the terms of the entries in their account-books at that period. But their situation gradually improved; they received assistance from Holland; the colony was increased by additional refugees in the end of 1730, as we shall see in the history of Pragela; and a pastor of Waldensberg (whose name was Barillon) undertook a tour for the purpose of collecting money on behalf of his congregation. The object of the collection was the erection of a place of worship at

¹ This pastor's name was Roman. He was a native of Baden, in Switzerland. The minute of his installation is in the Archives of Wacchtersbach, signed by Walkenier. Nothing less authoritative than this document would have led me to set aside the following words, written by the pastor of Waldensberg in 1824:—"This colony was at first without a minister, and the name of its first minister was Mr. John Archer." (Note by M. Schmid, transmitted by M. Appia.)

² La construction de Béthel, ou sermon sur le chap II., 19-22, de l'Ep. aux Ephés., Pour le 14 du mois d'Octobre, 1739, jour de la dédicace du temple de Waldensberg, colonie Vaudois réfugiée. 4to. Frankfort, 1740.

Waldensberg. The surplus of the sum received having been placed at interest, afforded an annual revenue of 100 francs, which improved the circumstances of this poor parish. A sum of thirty-five florins had at first been granted by England for the support of the public school, but this pension ceased in 1740.

"The inhabitants of the colony," says a pastor of the place,¹ "are almost all poor; not one of them is rich; some, however, are in easy circumstances, and there is not a beggar among them,² although there are a number of indigent families.³ Besides the cultivation of their lands, which are not very good, they have to gain their subsistence by two branches of industry, which almost all of them understand. Some of them make stockings for the manufacturers of Leiblas, a village near Gelnhausen, or for travelling merchants; and others are flax-dressers. Those who devote themselves to this occupation, disperse themselves in autumn to work in the villages of the neighbourhood, from the end of harvest to the middle of winter. Most of them return on Saturday evening, to pass the Sabbath with their families, and attend public worship. They retain such a love for their religion, and such pure and simple manners, that they are loved and honoured throughout the whole country—'praising God, and having favour with all the people,' as it is said of the first Christians.⁴ These people, however, are too poor to be able to devote much time to education. They spoke at first the patois of their own country, and understood the French language, but now they speak a German patois, and scarcely understand the language when correctly spoken.⁵ The schoolmaster is so poorly paid, that no man, however pious, excellent, and devoted, could raise himself above mediocrity, because he must have recourse to manual labour to earn his daily bread. The pastors generally remain here only for a few years, when they remove to parishes where they enjoy greater emoluments; and when a minister leaves

¹ M. SCHMID. In a note of 5th June, 1824, transmitted by M. Appia.

² "But the most of the families give, perhaps, too much to beggars, and maintain themselves in tolerable circumstances only by assiduous industry, and by extreme simplicity in their living; even those who are in more easy circumstances are so only by their industry, and by their simple mode of life. Their houses, their furniture, their dress, and their food, all indicate poverty." (Another note by the pastor, M. SCHMID, dated from Ostheim, 9th February, 1827.)

³ Charles Nagel, burdened with five children, carried on at one time a little merchandise, but all he had was taken from him in 1813, by some robbers, in the forest of Budingen.—Peter Peleng is a widower with six children, &c. . . . (Note of the condition of the poor of Waldensberg, transmitted by the pastor, M. SCHMID.)

⁴ Acts ii. 47.

⁵ It was in 1815 that the use of the German language was substituted for that of French in public worship.

the colony, it almost always remains for a long time destitute of a pastor. This deserted condition is sometimes prolonged for whole years." But public attention, and the care of the government, having of late been directed to this interesting spot, many improvements have already been effected.

Others of the Vaudois settled also at Offenbach, Yssemburg, and Hanau.¹ "I am not aware," says a recent author, "that there ever were any Vaudois colonies in the ancient landgravate of Hesse-Cassel;"² but a few Vaudois families were received into the Walloon community of Hanau, and I think, also, into the communities of French refugees in Marburg and its neighbourhood,³ and afterwards into that of Cassel itself."⁴

But at a short distance from Homberg is the Vaudois colony of DORNHOLZHAUSEN. This name, which signifies the Thorny Wood Houses, or Bramble Houses, indicates the uncultivated and barren state in which the country was when the village was built. The situation is not, however, without its recommendations. With a vast pine forest behind it, on the gentle slope of a hill formed by the last undulations of Mount Taunus, this little town lies pleasantly exposed to the southern sun, and looks upon a rich landscape. The air, however, is very cold; the fields are by no means fertile, the meadows are poor, and the trees of the orchards gnarled and stunted; but every house has its little garden, in which are a few fruit trees.

The deed by which this barren hill was granted to the Vaudois, is dated 4th May,⁵ 1699, and is signed by the Landgrave Frederic, and by Walkenier. I shall not here exhibit its terms, because they are in accordance with those of other documents of the same nature, already quoted in this chapter. There were at first only twenty-three Vaudois families at Dornholzhausen; a few others, indeed, settled at Homburg, of which this town of brambles is a sort of dependency and rural suburb. The pastor of the Vaudois colony, who ministered also to the French congregation in Homburg, participated annually, to the extent of 400 florins in the English subsidies destined to the support of seven of the parishes founded by the exiles of Piedmont.⁶ (This stipend, after several interruptions in

¹ According to a document dated 28th Jan., 1716. (Archives of Wacchtersbach.)

² There were, however, a few isolated Vaudois settled at Frankenheim, near Cassel.

³ Viz., Louisendorf, Schwabendorf, and Todtenhausen.

⁴ Manuscript account, quoted by HAHN, p. 243. ⁵ Or 28th April, Old Style.

⁶ In 1723 they were served by the following pastors:—PETER RICHER at Homburg and Dornholzhausen, RESPLANDIN at Waldorf, JACOB MONToux at Rhorbach, JOHN FAUCHER at Grand Villar, SCIPIO ARNAUD at Dürmentz (where he supplied also the church of Schönberg, from which he went to that of Grand Villar).

its payment, ceased altogether in 1805.) It was not till 1755 that the Vaudois of Dornholzhausen, by means of collections made in foreign countries, were enabled to build a place of worship, and to call a pastor.¹

Their manner of life is as simple as that of their brethren of Waldensberg. Poor and laborious, they are obliged to eke out the insufficient produce of their lands by the resources derived from some small branches of manufacture. The principal of these branches of manufacture is the weaving of woollen stockings, which once afforded the means of subsistence to almost all the population of Dornholzhausen, but which has considerably diminished since 1808. The reputation recently acquired by the baths of Homburg, attracting to that town a great number of strangers every year, the Vaudois have found opportunity of engaging in different sorts of manual service, which have to a small extent compensated them for the resources which they have lost. Their lands, although bad, are heavily burdened with taxes. The commune is in debt, and the people very insufficiently educated. Much encouragement has recently, however, been given to elementary education. Bible societies have provided with the Word of God the families previously destitute of it; and assistance has been afforded in various ways to the poor people of Dornholzhausen. The late M. Appia, pastor at Frankfort—an eminent man, deriving his descent, like themselves, from the valleys of Piedmont, and remarkable alike for his talents and his Christian charity—displayed the most active solicitude in their favour, and was well entitled to be called the benefactor of this colony.

I subjoin some interesting notices, which will exhibit its condition at the commencement of the present century. They have been obtained from the local authorities, and their own words are here employed:—

“The accounts of the commune are quite distinct from those of the church.

“The lands of Dornholzhausen are far from being productive, and contain only 194 arpents.

“In consequence of various arrears of taxes and sums of money borrowed, the commune was in debt in 1810 to the amount of 1700 florins. In 1815, in consequence of the war, its debt had increased to 8000 florins. To pay the interest of this sum, a tax is levied from the inhabitants every year, in proportion to their means; but many of them are so poor that they can contribute nothing whatever towards this object.

JOHN MONTAUX at Pinache, S. WOLFF at Warmberg or Lucerna. (Extracted from the Records of the Central Consistory of Dürmentz.)

¹ Notice published by M. Appia in the Echo des Vallées, first year, No. IV., pp. 57-59.

"In consequence of the suppression of the English subsidies, and of loans which it has contracted, the church, burdened with the support of the school and of the pastor, is in debt to the amount of 1800 florins.

"Its revenues amount to 408 florins,¹ its expenses to 265 florins.² But to the latter must be added a payment of 110 florins allowed to the pastor, which raises the total expenses to 375 florins."³

"The pastor of Dornholzhausen still remained in that village," says M. Appia, "for three years after 1806, when the English subsidies ceased to be paid, living in poverty, and always hoping that communications with England might be reopened, and that he might be enabled to continue in the discharge of his pastoral duties. But on the 1st of October, 1809, constrained by the inflexible law of necessity, he removed from his parish, which was thus reduced to a state of involuntary widowhood. Nor was this church left only without a resident pastor, but completely destitute even of public worship, because the French refugee church of Homburg had also been suppressed."

This state of abandonment continued till 1817. "At that period, Frederic Joseph, Landgrave of Hesse-Homburg, had asked and obtained the hand of the Princess Elizabeth, the sister of the King of England. He went to London in 1818, for the celebration of his marriage. Having, whilst there, informed his brother-in-law, King George IV., of the truly Christian history and the necessities of the church of Dornholzhausen, formerly supported by his illustrious predecessors, that monarch was pleased to send to the landgrave, as one of the marriage presents, the sum of £500 sterling, destined for the formation of a permanent fund, the interest of which should place this interesting community in circumstances always to pay a stipend to a pastor, and to resume public worship."⁴

Some causes of delay prevented the re-establishment of a gospel

¹ Viz., 263 florins from landed property of the church, disposed of as hereditary fees; 60 florins from country tithes; 80 florins from rent of the minister's house, as at that time there was no minister.

² Viz., 100 florins for schoolmaster's salary; 90 florins for interest of the debt of 1800 florins; 50 florins for maintenance of public buildings, and 25 florins for insurance against fire, seigneurial dues, and various other expenses.

³ These are extracts from a manuscript report, dated at Dornholzhausen, 19th October, 1816, and signed Abraham Bertalot, elder; Francis Bertalot, elder; Louis Achard, mayor.

⁴ Echo des Vallées, No. IV., notice already quoted.

ministry at Dornholzhausen till 1824. A little festival was then held, like one which had been held in 1801, on the centenary of the first settlement of the Vaudois in these countries. At this time the landgrave and his court came to Dornholzhausen. The inhabitants of the country went to meet them, singing the forty-second psalm, which their ancestors had sung more than a century before, when they came to thank the great-grandfather of that landgrave for the permission which he had granted them to settle in his dominions. Verdant arches were erected at the entrance of the village, and in the public square there was a pyramid, composed entirely of significant emblems. At its base were wild herbs, brambles, thistles, great stones, and young pines and thorns, strikingly figurative of what the Hill of Brambles was before the arrival of the Vaudois. A little higher up were rye, oats, and potatoes, the first-fruits obtained by cultivation after the ground was cleared. Higher still were wheat, maize, and delicate roots, the produce of a more improved soil. After these appeared in succession all sorts of plants of the kitchen garden, the results of colonization; and finally, vines and fruit-trees, evidence of the progress of the colony. The pyramid was terminated by a fine vase of blooming flowers, an emblem full of the promise of prosperity, of the progress of the arts, and the first sweets of civilization. A choir of little boys decked out with bouquets, and of young girls wearing crowns, then gratified the court by singing to an appropriate air words adapted to the occasion; after which all repaired to the church, where the landgrave renewed, and signed upon the altar the grant of the privileges of the Vaudois. He was then invited, with his court, to a rustic banquet, where the young people of the village served the guests. A religious service in the evening terminated this patriotic festival.

Since that time public worship has continued to be celebrated in the French language at Dornholzhausen. "Thus," says M. Appia, "the Vaudois of Piedmont may still fraternize in feeling with a small remnant of their brethren in religion, sprung from the same race with themselves, and who, although exiled to the side of a German forest, read the Bible and worship God in the same tongue. As to the other thirteen colonies, they are irrevocably Germanized. May the same voice come from their tomb which comes from that of Abel!"¹

I will add but a few words, to mention that upon some of the different emigrations which took place from the Vaudois valleys to Germany, between 1698 and 1730, there were a few families which settled at Frederichsdorff, not far from Dornholzhausen;¹ at Erlangen, in Franconia; at Neufville, near Nuremberg; at Dupphausen and at Braunfels, near Wetzlar, in the county of Salms, at that time forming part of Nassau, and now of Prussia. Some of them also settled at Greiffenthal, a place ecclesiastically annexed to Dupphausen; at Dodenhausen, near Malburg; and in some small villages of the neighbourhood, as St. Ile and Gethsemane. Finally, it remains to be added that a few retired to the Valteline, where they settled near Gressoney, and where they have retained the use of the Vaudois idiom, it is said, to the present day.

¹ Echo des Vallées, No. IV.; notice already quoted.

The difficulty of procuring exact information is extreme. No complete account has yet been published. I have myself visited these colonies, and have looked through all their archives, but I cannot affect to doubt that their history is still incomplete. To render it otherwise, much greater space would need to be assigned to it, and the accumulation of materials would require resources more abundant than I have been able to command. What I have done, in regard to this part of my subject, is at least in proportion to the rest of the work. May it have the effect of reanimating, in the hearts of these descendants of the martyrs, the faith of their fathers, too easily forgotten! Recalling to mind the distresses which they endured, may it move the Vaudois of the present time to increased zeal and gratitude in the enjoyment of the peaceful lot which Providence has assigned them!

¹ Documents transmitted by the mayor of that commune, No. III. In my own possession.

CHAPTER XI.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.FIRST PERIOD.—THE VALLEYS OF BARDONÈCHE AND OF THE CLUSON UNDER THE REIGN OF CHARLES IX.¹

(INTRODUCTION; COMMENCING WITH THE MIDDLE AGES. HISTORY DOWN TO 1574.)

Description of the valley of Pragela—Flourishing state of the church there before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes—The church in Pragela in earlier times—The Synod of Le Laus before 1332—Vaudois missionaries in France—Temporal condition of the inhabitants of Pragela—Pragela under the Dauphins—Inquisitors and persecution in the fourteenth century—Persecutions in the sixteenth century—The Vaudois of France and Piedmont mutually support one another—The religious wars in France—The Baron Des Adrets disgraces the Protestant cause by his proceedings in Pragela—Unhappy consequences to the Protestants of the valley—Combats and massacres—Exploits of the Vaudois at Exilles—The Edict of Amboise—New dangers—Fast—St. Bartholomew's Day—Conversion of the people of Pramol to Protestantism—The Vaudois defend themselves against Birague, the French governor of Pignerol—The “War of La Rade.”—Accession of Henry III. to the throne of France.

THE history of the Vaudois of Pragela² is quite distinct from that of the other Vaudois valleys. They were often persecuted when these enjoyed tranquillity, and they sometimes had seasons of tranquillity when these were persecuted; for Pragela belonged to France, whilst the other valleys belonged to Piedmont. This state of things lasted till 1713. I could not, therefore, mix up the history of the Vaudois of Pragela with that of their brethren.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—Almost nothing is derived from printed works. The manuscript authorities are very numerous, principally in the State Archives at Turin, and in those of the bishopric of Pignerol, those of Fenestrelles, and those of Briançon; also in the Records of the Council of State of Geneva, and in various public and private libraries. I cannot here give a detailed list of all these documents: the reader will find, at the bottom of the pages, notice taken of those of which I have made use.

² It is often written Pragelas, but erroneously; for the word signifies Cold Meadow, and has not the s in old authors (Perrin, Gilles, &c.) It was originally applied only to the upper part of the valley of the Cluson, extending from the Col de Sestrières to La Rua. The lower part bore successively the names of Val de Laus, Val Cluson, and Val Pérouse. The Princess Adelaide of Suza made a donation of the whole of the valley of Pragela, as far as Pierre de Sestrières, to the abbey of Pignerol, by a deed of 29th April, 1078, afterwards confirmed by a bull of Calixtus II. The name is, therefore, employed either in a more restricted or a more general sense. In the latter sense, the districts of Oulx and Exilles may be regarded as forming part of Pragela, although situated in the valley of the Doire.

Neither could I place it by itself, before or after theirs, because their history begins before it, and continues after it. I thought, therefore, that it would best be exhibited at the period when the same events, becoming common to both countries, decimated both, and sent forth, from both of them at once, bands of exiles, to found in Germany the colonies of which an account has just been given.

The country with which we have now to do, extends along the banks of two rivers, whose courses are nearly parallel—the Cluson and the Doire. It descends from the highest ridge of the Alps as far as Pignerol on the one side, and on the other to Bussolino, near Suza. The adjacent valleys, which open into or prolong that of the Doire, are those of Mathias and of Méane on the right; those of Chaumont, Exilles, and Bardonnèche on the left; and those of Thures and Sauzet, towards the bottom of the valley. These latter fork away from one another at Sèzane, and the higher parts of them are concealed amongst the peaks of the Alps. The Col de Sestrières separates this region from the valley of Pragela, where the Cluson flows; and from this branch off the lateral vales of Traverses, Le Puy, Pourrières, and Le Villaret. The latter, again, communicates by a mountain-pass with the narrow valley of Méane, which returns and opens towards Suza. The history of the Vaudois who have inhabited these regions has hitherto been entirely unknown; yet, before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, they had eleven parishes there, eighteen churches, and sixty-four places set apart for religious assemblies, where worship was conducted morning and evening in as many hamlets.¹

¹ The following is a list of the places in each valley. The names in capital letters are those of the villages in which there were places of worship; those in italics were places where regular religious meetings were held:—

On the course of the Doire. VALLEY OF SÈZANE: Thures, Remille, Sauzet, CLAYIÈRES, Sèzane.

VALLEY OF BARDONÈCHE: Melèzet, Merdavine, Rochemolle, MILLAUZE, Bolard, Savoulx.

VALLEY OF OULX: Déserts, FENILS, Chanal, Chateau Dauphin, Oulx, St. Eugène.

VALLEY OF EXILLES: Bonets, Exilles, CHAUMONT, Rama, Closniers, SALABERTRANS, Mollaret, Gravet, Suza.

VALLEY OF MÉANE: Méane, Lageard, Serre, La Buisse, Jalas, Gattoudié, Sauvage, Jartouzières, Le Passaur, LA CHAPELLE, Larche, Méronne. (In the adjacent vale of Mathias.)

On the course of the Cluson. VALLEY OF PRAGELA: Sestrières, LE PLAN, Jossau, La Dut or Durit, TRAVERSES, Rullières, Pragela, LA RUA, ZUCHIÈRES or SOUCHIÈRES, Le Puy, Rullières, Great and Little Fayet, Les Fruises or Fraissen, Porrières, Chargin, Lard, Balbouset or Barbonté, Rivet, Laval, Patemonche, Tronchée, Rif, Eleus, Allervé, Balbouset d'Usseaux, Fruisses d'Usseaux, Le Laur, Almont, Garniers, USSEAUX, Fenestrelles, Chambons-Gleisole, Vignaux, Fayet, Pecquerel.

Gilles merely makes incidental mention of the six communes of Pragela,¹ from which the Vaudois, towards the end of the fourteenth century,² proceeded to establish themselves in the valley of Méanc, and on the banks of the Doire, in the higher parts of its course; but from the most ancient times they occupied the banks of the Cluson; for the greater part of their old manuscripts in the Romance tongue have been derived from the valley of Pragela.³ In these we have evidence, valuable from its antiquity, concerning the gospel in the middle ages, and most precious monuments of those hidden churches, which expanded in the light of the Sun of Righteousness. Whether near to one another or remote, all these Christian communities formed part of the same ecclesiastical body, confirming their unity of spirit by the bond of peace, and their unity of action by a complete organization. They had general assemblies, in which the most distant were represented.

It was at Le Laus, in Pragela, that the famous synod was held, in which 140 pastors were assembled,⁴ and which must have met almost two centuries before the Reformation, if a simple comparison of circumstances can be allowed to establish with certainty a historic date.⁵ As these regions formed part of Dauphiny, or opened into that province, it was, therefore, here that those missionary colporteurs penetrated into France, whose patient and secret work of evangelization is one of the most striking features of the Vaudois

VALLEY OF LE ROURE (of the oak): Le Roure, La Balma, MENTOUL, VILLARET, Bouvet, Petit-Fayet, Ville Close, La Latte, Fon-du-Fan or de Fantina, La Clée, Serres, Boursat, Chabert, Bosco, Lara, Gamiers, Tournons, CHATEAU DU BOIS, Charabásiers, Vignals, Nonflières, Sappey, Cazette, Chargeoir, and Chazald.

VALLEY OF PÉROUSE: Ailbone or Arbona, Agrevol (the name of a branch stream), L'Eyra, Les Granges, Bonisoles, Pérouse, Le Rif de la Briéra, Le Séné des Artics, La Chalme, La Branca, La Baisse, and Champlan.

VALLEY OF PINACHE: Rochin, Tronferes, PINACHE, Colombier, Rivoire, Valfrid, La Moretière, L'Albarcia, Rochas, Soleil-Bauf, L'Eyral, La Combe, Les Balcecs, La Grangette, Rousset, Doubton or Diblon, Le Grand Doubton, Le Puy, Servières, Talucco, VILLAR-PINACHE, Chenèvrières, Chambeyroux, Riz de la Grua, after which we come to St. Benoit, and the Abbey of Pignerol.—It must be observed, that the churches and places of meeting above noted were not all open for worship at any one time; but in 1675 there existed at once more than seventy of them.

¹ Ch. i. p. 10.

² Ch. ii. p. 18.

³ See LÉGER, Part I. p. 23; Perrin, p. 57. Actes Synodaux of the assembly held at Mentoules in 1612, &c.

⁴ Gilles, p. 17.

⁵ In the brief of John XXII., dated 23d July, 1332 (Rorengo, p. 16), it is said that heresy is so widely spread, that the Vaudois had recently held synods of more than 500 deputies, In quibus, quingenti Valdenses fuerunt congregati. But Gilles speaks of 140 pastors, each of whom being accompanied by two or three lay deputies, there results a number approximating to that mentioned in the brief. The most numerous of these synods has attracted the notice of Gilles, and he places it at Laus: it has attracted the notice of John XXII., and he places it before 1332. Thus it seems that the place and the date may be determined.

Church in those remote times. They had spread the knowledge of the gospel as far as the Diois and the Valentinois. "Fifteen years ago," says an author of the fifteenth century,¹ "one Talmon of Beauregard said to me, 'There are two men in my house, whose discourse is full of sweetness and wisdom; will you come and hear them?' I went; and the most aged of these persons began to read a little book which he carried with him, assuring us that it contained the precepts of the Divine law. And, indeed, he delivered excellent maxims, such as 'Thou shalt not do to another what thou wouldst not that he should do to thee;' and he said that the Sabbath should be observed with more respect than all the other festivals, which have been established only by the church; that God alone has power to save us, and that good works done by a man before his death, will profit him more than those which are done for him when he is no more; and, finally, that the clergy have been corrupted by wealth, whilst the Barbas have always remained in evangelical poverty."

This language may recal to our thoughts that which Reynerus puts into the mouths of the Vaudois, when he makes one of their colporteurs say, in offering some jewels to a gentleman, "I have stones still rarer, and jewels more precious than these, and I will give you them for nothing if you desire them;" after which he begins to speak of the gospel.² But it is surprising that an ecclesiastic did not recognize the gospel in that little book which was in the hands of the Barbas. In these two persons, the one young and the other old, we cannot but perceive the regidor and coadjutor of our Vaudois missions.³ The author from whom we have borrowed this narrative, adds with great simplicity, "This sect has the peculiarity of imposing upon men by an appearance of holiness, and of always appealing for its doctrine and conduct to the examples of the primitive church."⁴

Independence and frugality were also hereditary characteristics of the inhabitants of Pragela. "This country is rugged, of little fertility and exceedingly cold," says an anonymous author; "for justice, it depends on the bailiwick of Briançon and parliament

¹ CHRISTOPHE DE SALIENS, secretary to the Bishop of Valence, in his Mémoires, cited by COLOMB DE MANOSC, De gestis Episc. Diensium et Valentini., l. iv. p. 330.

² REYNERUS, contra Valdenses, ch. viii. Quomodo se ingerant familiaritati Magnorum. GRETZERUS, t. xii. Quoted entire, Muston, t. i. (published in 1834), pp. 200-203.—Pseudo-Reynerus, GIESELER, iii. 16, 17.

³ See the first chapter of the Israel of the Alps.

⁴ "Habebat hoc proprium secta, quod specie sanctitatis blandiebatur hominibus, et vitæ exempla ac doctrinam ab ipsis ecclesiis Christianæ exordiis repetebat. (Johannis Columbi Mannasc. opusc. varia, Lugduni, 1563, lib. iv.)

of Grenoble. There are here four or five communes which have their consuls, about seventy villages or hamlets, and more than 15,000 inhabitants. . . . The people have somewhat the same character with the country: they are rude and poor. The richest live only on the produce of the dairy, and on the little which they derive from their fields or from the sale of cattle. Their houses are, for the most part, only built of pines, cut in the neighbouring mountains, and fixed in the soil in the form of a palisade, the inside being rudely plastered with earth and mud. During summer, almost all the men disperse themselves over the plain and throughout the neighbouring districts to earn a little money; in winter they return home, passing a good part of the year in the stables with their cattle, in order the more easily to secure themselves against the severity of the cold. In the whole valley there is not a single noble family, nor any temporal or ecclesiastical superior except the king. This renders the people proud and haughty, notwithstanding their wretched condition; accordingly, the people of this region esteem themselves all independent, . . . and it is a remarkable thing that, during almost twenty-four years, no person in the whole valley has ventured to make profession of the Catholic religion."¹ Some search was necessary to find its adherents, even before the Reformation;² however, "there were anciently but five Barbas, or ministers, for the six communes of Pragela."³ Subsequently several annexed churches were erected: one at Les Traverses for La Rua, one at Les Chambons for Mentoules, and one at La Balma for Villaret; but besides these eight ministers, there was in every village an elder, who conducted prayer and instructed the people in a little place of worship, to which all the hamlet was called by a bell."⁴

Such was the representation of the state of the Vaudois which was made to two kings of France,⁵ when on their way to Italy, and

¹ Sommaire de l'état de la religion dans la vallée de Pragela en Dauphiné (4to, without date or place of publication), pp. 1 and 2.

² Protocol of the notary Orceel, showing that the Catholic religion was professed in Pragela prior to 1531, as is evident from pious legacies, &c. . . . A very thick 4to manuscript, very ill written. (In the State Archives at Turin, No. of series, 578.)

³ "One at La Rua, for the commune of Pragela; a second at Usseaux, a third at Mentoules, a fourth at Fenestrelles, and a fifth at Villaret, for the community of Le Roure. (Rélation historique des Vallées, &c. . . . MS. of 22 fol. pages, in the library of Professor Camille Aillaud, at Pignerol.)

⁴ Description des vallées du Piémont . . . avec une carte dressée sur les mémoires de Valerius Crassus et de Jean Léger. A Paris, chez J. B. Nolin; Quai de l'Horloge, MDCXC.

⁵ Charles VIII. at Oulx (named Ours), 2d Sept., 1494.—Godefroy . . . p. 195. Louis XIII. at Sezane and Suza (from 23th April to 4th March, 1629); Sommaire de

as a prelude to a petition for the establishment of the Catholic religion by force in a country where prayer and the Christian virtues still reigned alone. This was in effect to ask that Bible doctrines should be put down, as we shall soon see that they accordingly were; but the Vaudois did not now for the first time suffer persecution.

Before their country had become a part of the dominions of the kings of France, it had been under the sceptre of the dauphins,¹ and in the accounts of the Delphinal chatelain, given in on the 6th of November, 1315, for the valley of the Cluson, we find enumerated amongst the disbursements the charges due to the inquisitors of that valley for the exercise of their functions;² and it appears, from the accounts of the year 1345, that proceedings of the inquisitors against the heretics of the valley of Pragela were then carried on with great vigour, because we find amongst the receipts and disbursements many items occasioned by these persecutions.³ After having mentioned those which took place in 1556 against the evangelical Christians of Piedmont, an old author adds: "A few days after, the Vaudois churches of Larche, Méronne, Méane, and Suza were very fiercely attacked. The minister of Méane was taken and cruelly put to death. The church of Larche was also much tormented. To give a particular account of all the tricks, intrigues, robberies, outrages, and cruelties which were perpetrated there, would occupy a very long time."⁴ l'état de la religion dans la vallée de Pragela, 4to, p. 3. (Archives of the Court at Turin, No. of series, 548.)

¹ The upper parts of the valley of the Cluson, where Pragela is, and those of the Doire, where Bardonèche, Exilles, and Salabertans are, belonged to the ancient domain of the dauphins, as appears from various acts (those of the 17th of the Calends of July, 1243; of the Ides of August, 1253, &c.), mentioned in the inventory of the Archives of the Court of Accounts at Grenoble (Registers of the Embrunois, t. i. fol. 283). The valley of the Cluson was ceded to the King of Sicily by a deed of May 5, 1344 (id. fol. 701), but it continued to pay seigneurial dues to the dauphins (acts of October 14, 1441, fol. 705; of 1st August, 1344, fol. 702, &c.)

A few communes redeemed these burdens; but they always depended on the French jurisdiction, on that of the Parliament of Grenoble in civil matters, and on that of the Bishop of Embrun in matters of religion. These two jurisdictions were often confounded.

² "Item, pro expensis Inquisitorum, reddit litteras 63, 6, turn. item, pro expensis eorumdem 24, 9 (i.e., in all, 93 livres tournois, and 3 deniers, being 92 francs of our money). Extract from the Archives of Fenestrelle, examined by Professor Aillaud of Pignerol.

³ These receipts resulted from the sale of the confiscated properties of heretics. In the accounts of 1345, there is mention of one Simon de Challier, burned alive for heresy. The expenses were the inquisitor's charges, purchase of pulleys, rings, and iron hooks, for torturing heretics, &c. Same source.

⁴ Histoire des persecutions et guerres faites contre le peuple Vaudois, &c. Nouvellement imprimé, MDLXII, 8vo, p. 43. This work was published in Latin, under the name of Reichardus. It is to be found in Crecpin (folio edition), fol.

Persecution was not then a mere ecclesiastical measure, but an affair of party; and the different Vaudois communities reciprocally supported each other as often as they were menaced. The reader will recollect the attack which the seigneurs of Le Perrier made with an armed force upon the inhabitants of Rioclarét in 1560, and how the latter were assisted and delivered by the Vaudois of Pragela. "The fugitives were restored to their homes with great thanksgivings to God, and to the defenders whom he had sent them."¹

"The valley of Pérouse," says Gilles, "was not oppressed by the seigneurs, but it had at its gates other enemies not less formidable, and far more inveterate—the monks of the abbey of Pignerol. As they were very wealthy, and the sovereign had given permission to every one, and even ordered his own troops to molest the Vaudois,"² these monks took into their pay a band of about 300 fanatics, full of hatred against the Reformed, but of affection for their properties, who robbed and ravaged throughout all the neighbouring country, killing men and women, or carrying them prisoners to the abbey. There they awaited the coming of the commissioners,³ who condemned them without fail to the stake or to the galleys, if they refused to abjure their religion."⁴ The Vaudois of the valley of Lucerna now, in their turn, sent defenders to their compatriots of the banks of the Cluson, and the latter, by reason of the presence of their brethren, were able to apply themselves to their field labours, and to terminate their harvest work without being disturbed.⁵

In the year following, these children of the same country and the same faith, although belonging to two different states,⁶ desirous 532-547. These events are not more particularly related by Gilles, ch. xiii. p. 75, nor by Rorengo, p. 40. They took place under the influence of the inquisitor Giacomello, to be afterwards mentioned.

¹ Gilles, ch. xiii. pp. 89, 90.—Israel of the Alps, part ii. ch. i.

² In 1560, Emmanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy, forbade all the inhabitants of his dominions from going to hear the Vaudois ministers, and forbade these ministers from celebrating their worship beyond the bounds of the valleys. (Edict of Nice, 15th February, 1560; Rorengo, pp. 39, 40.) But this edict did not precisely specify the extent of the territory of the Vaudois valleys, and special delegates were appointed, under the name of ducal commissioners, to watch over its execution. These officers committed many cruelties. These measures were adopted at the instigation of the court of Rome, and of the court of Spain. (Gilles, p. 72.)

³ These commissioners were De Corbio (senator) and Giacomello (inquisitor). Rorengo, p. 40.

⁴ Gilles, ch. xiv.

⁵ Id. p. 93. The inhabitants of Suza, Larche, and Méane, were, however, subjected to much annoyance by the chatelain of Suza, because they went to the preaching at Pragela. Id. pp. 215, 216.

⁶ The valley of Pérouse was only given back to France in 1562, with Pignerol, Savillan, and Levadis; but Pragela and the higher parts of the Doire already formed part of Dauphiny.

of confirming the union which had always existed between the Vandois valleys of Dauphiny and those of Piedmont, renewed amongst themselves the solemn oath mutually to support one another in all circumstances in which their church might be concerned;¹ and they were indebted to their union for the concession of liberty of conscience, which was made in 1561² to all those of them who dwelt within the dominions of the Duke of Savoy. But all the country to which this chapter relates belonged at that time to France, except the small valleys of Mathias and Méane, to which alone, therefore, this concession brought any advantage.³ The religious meetings of the last-named little valley were even held in a hamlet⁴ situated on the boundary of the two states; so that the Protestant place of worship was in the dominions of the Duke of Savoy, and the pastor's house was in France.⁵ The road from Méane to Pérouse terminated at Le Villaret, the last village to which the cultivation of the vine extends, its cultivation being impossible in all the upper part of Pragela.

France was at this time troubled by religious wars; and Charles IX. was too feeble to resist, even if he had wished to do so, the influence of the Guises, the Marshal Du Retz, and Catherine De Medicis. The Protestants, on the other hand, had the Princes of Condé, Admiral De Coligny, and the King of Navarre for their defenders. Their worship, still prohibited within the precincts of towns, was authorized in the country parts;⁶ but by what precise mark could towns be distinguished from villages? Many conflicts took place in consequence of this very measure, which had been adopted to prevent them. The chiefs of the Huguenot party in Dauphiny were the intrepid Montbrun⁷ and the savage Des Adrets.⁸ The latter disgraced their cause by needless acts of violence. He invaded Pragela at the commencement of the year 1562, laid waste the Catholic institutions, burned the monastery of Oulx, allowed his troops to pillage, interdicted the celebration of mass, and sought to impose the Protestant religion upon every one,

¹ Gilles, ch. xxii. p. 136.

² Treaty of Cavour, 5th June, 1561.

³ "Their properties which have been confiscated shall be restored, &c. . . . to all the fugitives of the said valleys persevering in their religion, . . . and to those of Méane." (Gilles, ch. xxviii. p. 170). Larche formed part of it. (Id. p. 173.)

⁴ La Chapelle.

⁵ Gilles, ch. i. p. 10.

⁶ By edict of January 1562. (The Parliament of Paris refused to register it, and only did so after three successive orders.)

⁷ Surnamed the Brave. In 1570 he bade defiance to the Catholic army of the Marquis De Gordes, governor of Dauphiny; he marched against the troops of Henry III. when they were besieging Livron, in 1570, and was arrested at Die, and executed at Grenoble, in 1575.

⁸ He died in 1587.

under pain of death.¹ He did injury only to his own church, which he exposed to the same reproaches of violence so often brought by her against the Church of Rome.

The responsibility of the lawless deeds which he perpetrated at that time, pressed afterwards, and for many years, very cruelly upon the valley of Pragela, although its inhabitants had nothing to do with these excesses. But, indeed, they were the first to suffer for them. The Baron Des Adrets having been repulsed from the valleys of the Cluson and the Doire, the Catholic party took revenge for their momentary defeat by perpetual aggressions upon the Protestants of these regions. "In some places," says Gilles,² "the Vaudois durst no longer celebrate their worship, except at night; for if they attempted to hold their meetings in open day, according to the liberty which was then allowed to their brethren of the same religion throughout the rest of France, they were assailed by armed parties seeking their destruction." These audacious attempts were favoured by their isolation. Their party,

¹ As his proclamations are rare, I subjoin a few passages of that which, upon this occasion, he addressed to the inhabitants of Pragela:—"On the part of the King Dauphin, our sovereign lord and master; the ordinance of my lord the Baron des Adrets, gentleman in ordinary of the king's chamber, colonel of the legions of Dauphiny, Provence, Lyonnais, and Auvergne, chosen commander-in-chief of the companies assembled for the service of God, the liberty and deliverance of the king, and of the queen, his mother, conservator of the greatness and authority of their majesties:

"It is commanded to all the countrymen and inhabitants of the places [i.e., towns or villages] and parishes of Mentoules, . . . that they attend and hear the preaching of the Word of God. . . . It is forbidden to celebrate masses and other papal ceremonies from this time forth, . . . also public dances, and all confraternities whatsoever; . . . and to be present thereat, in any parish whatsoever, under pain of banishment . . . and of confiscation of goods.

"Moreover, it is commanded to the above-named consuls, countrymen, and inhabitants of the places and parishes of Mentoules, that they immediately, and without delay, produce the images, copes, chasubles, crosses, chalices, cloths, and other things appropriated to the papal mass, in order that they may be disposed of as shall be decided by the commissioners, under pain of death.

"Finally, it is commanded to all persons capable of bearing arms, that they appear with their arms at Fenestrelle, this day, at two o'clock afternoon, under pain of hanging and strangulation."

In this proclamation it is ordained that all shall learn and know the catechism within one month, . . . under arbitrary penalties.

(A copy of this document is given at the end of the Sommaire of the Archives of the Prévôté of Oulx.) According to these Archives, the monastery of Oulx was burned in 1562, at the instigation of some chiefs of Oulx itself, and of Césane; the steeple was demolished in 1574, by the malice and wickedness of Oulx, and the bells taken away by those of the pretended Reformed religion; and the hospice was destroyed in 1574, by those of the pretended Reformed religion in Pragela and Valengrogne.* Numerous judicial investigations ensued upon these devastations.

² Ch. xl. p. 279.

* It was destroyed because their enemies sought to intrench themselves in it.

which was powerful in Dauphiny, was not, however, able to defend them upon the extreme frontier of that province. The Vaudois of the Piedmontese valleys alone were able to render them any assistance. This they did not fail to do; and by their devoted friendship secured the repose of their brethren, after having sealed with their blood the act of union which bound together their ancient valleys.

A great number of petty combats took place at this time between the Vaudois and their enemies, in the valley of the Doire and in that of the Cluson. The Papists were commanded by a captain belonging to Oulx, named La Cazette,¹ and by the Seigneur De Mures, who, like him, made war for pleasure, and who sometimes came from Lower Dauphiny with a troop of volunteers, to his assistance; for, "for one death on the side of the Vaudois," says Gilles,² "there were almost always a number amongst the aggressors; and what they imagined that they had gained one day, they lost upon the morrow, to their great astonishment, but to the glory of those whom they assailed; who upon that account, were for a long time dreaded by their neighbours, and held in great reputation."

However, the Vaudois experienced reverses also. At Briançon, for example, of which they obtained possession for a short time, they were surrounded by the French troops, and massacred without mercy. It was in mountain warfare that they triumphed, where combatants seem to multiply their numbers by their activity, and where the advantage of positions, surprises, and ambuscades makes amends for paucity of numbers; but whenever they adopted the course of shutting themselves up in a stronghold, or in a limited place of defence, they almost always experienced some disaster. Thus it was that half a company of their soldiers was also massacred, which had retired into a ruined chapel between Rouillères and Pragela. A similar misfortune, says Gilles,³ befell forty men of the Val Lucerna, who allowed themselves to be shut up in a paltry village near Bardonnèche, where they had neither provisions nor munitions of war.

This story is related in the following manner, by an elegant writer of that period, whose narrative is composed in Latin:⁴—

¹ " . . . Vulgo dictus, le gros La Cazette; ejus etiam ductu aggressi sunt Catholici, dictos Hugonotos, Sezania, &c. . . . (MS. relation of 1563.)

² Ch. xl.

³ P. 280.

⁴ I add, in foot-notes, some passages which I have not translated.—Propter rebellantium hereticorum rabiem, nulla huic erat fides nec securitas, inter parentes et vicinos, religionis causa, ac præsertim in Plebania Utiensi. (In the Plebanie of Oulx.)

"In 1562," says he, "the snows of winter still lay upon our mountains, till their first melting caused a terrible inundation in the month of May, an evident presage of the approaching ravages of the Calvinists. These came from the valley of the Cluson and the valley of Lucerna. Many bloody rencounters took place at Chalmont, at Les Chenevrières, and at Salabertrans; and although victory was sometimes equally balanced, the Huguenots always gathered strength. However, the Catholics ranged themselves under the command of the great La Cazette, who surprised the unbelievers at Sezane, and cut in pieces as many as 150 of them.¹ To recover from this loss they called new reinforcements to their aid,² and marched upon Briançon. They passed over Mount Genève, and came within a mile of the place; but meeting there with a different reception from what they expected, they fell back towards the source of the Duranee, into the valley of Les Prés,³ and, pursued by those whom they had come to attack, they gained the heights of the mountain of L'Echelle,⁴ from which they fled into the valley of Bardonnèche, and there remained for some days. There it was that the illustrious De La Cazette surprised them in broad day, with his ordinary guard,⁵ augmented by a few courageous soldiers, not without having taken precautions to prevent his being discovered; and being supported by the Catholics of the place, he cut them in pieces. The Vaudois not being able for the contest, on account of the inferiority of their forces, retired in disorder into the castle, as into a fortress. There they defended themselves till night; and all who did not perish in the flames, were destroyed by the sword.⁶ "Thus," adds our author, "that pest of heresy disappeared from the valley."

It does not appear, however, that the defeat of the Vaudois was so complete as his account would lead us to infer; for a few days

"Ut notat Bellonius, scriba publicus Ulcienſis, de cujus ſcripto manu propria authenticato, hæc omnia translati fideliter. . . ."

² "Supplementum militum a ſociis, vallium dictarum Cluſoni et Angroniæ, acceperunt. . . ." ³ "In vallem pratorum deflectere coacti ſunt.

⁴ "Per montem, Scalæ ut dicunt, Bardoneſcham ingreſſi. . . .—(I quote the paſſages which contain proper names, to ſecure myſelf againſt all charge of inaccuracy.)

⁵ Ibi, jam aliquibus diebus morabantur, cum ecce egregius De La Cazette, ſumptis ſecum aliquibus e ſuis militibus, quos cuſtodire cauſa ſecum ſemper habebat, et adjunctis aliis incolis hujus regionis . . . pleno meridie, caute tamen et prudenter adortus, magnum eorum impetu edidit ſtragem, adjuvantibus præcipue dicti loci incolis," &c.

⁶ "Quos enim flamma comburere non poterat eoſdem interficiebat gladius."—The anonymous author of this narrative makes the number who thus periſhed no leſs than 140. Gilles reduces it to 40 (p. 280); but perhaps the latter number only refers to the Vaudois of the Val Lucerna, who were included in this catastrophe.

after, they seized the fortress of Exilles, a place to them of far greater importance than all the places hitherto mentioned. But when they entered upon possession of it they found it destitute of munitions, and they were besieged in it by La Cazette, without having it in their power to procure any. This captain kept up a very strict blockade, in order to reduce them by famine. With them were the best chiefs and the best soldiers of the valleys; they made vigorous sorties, but were not able to break up the blockade of the place. All the valleys, says Gilles,¹ then made a great effort, and did their duty marvellously in order to rescue them. Their people having passed the mountains which separate the Cluson and the Doire, in front of the fortress, approached it so that they could communicate with the besieged without being seen by the besiegers. The fort of Exilles is situated on a precipitous rock, which rises isolated in the midst of steep mountains pressing closely upon it upon every side, in one of the narrowest parts of the valley. The Vaudois, captives on this rock, saw their brethren come to their assistance. Captain Frache, who commanded at Exilles, taking his sword in both hands, then rushed out with all his band upon the troops of the enemy. He cleared their barricades, penetrated into their intrenchments, and overthrew all that opposed his passage. Whilst he thus attacked the enemy in front, his compatriots rushed from the mountain heights, and fell upon them in the rear. The troops of La Cazette, thus caught, as it were, between two avalanches which met at their ranks, were broken and dispersed. Their chiefs made fruitless efforts to keep them firm, or to rally them. The place was released from siege, the whole garrison escaped by this audacious breach, joined the corps which had come to its assistance, and along with it regained the mountains, ready for new combats. It was at this period also that the affairs of Abriès and St. Crespin took place, of which we have already spoken in the history of the Vaudois of Queyras.

The religious wars in France were calmed for a moment by the edict of pacification which Charles IX. signed at Amboise, on the 19th of March, 1563. The conditions embodied in this edict were more favourable than any which the Reformed had previously obtained; but it was modified by a royal ordinance, issued from Lyons, on the 9th of August in the following year.² A peace, threatening and precarious like the calm which precedes a storm, deadened for a short time the political passions which religious quarrels had exasperated, and over which they exerted a predominating power. The haughty and artful Catherine de Medicis, whether from motives of kindness or of duplicity, had sought for a little to reconcile the two parties. In secret, however, she was raising troops to fight against the Huguenots. This was in 1567. The king resided at the park of Monceaux. Condé and Coligny formed the project of carrying off both him and his mother; but this design failed.

¹ Page 281.

² It was at Lyons, also, that Charles IX. issued, five days before (4th August, 1564), the edict which fixed the commencement of the year at the first of January. At this time Catherine de Medicis was causing the foundations of the palace of the Tuileries to be laid at Paris.

The Duke of Clèves passed through Piedmont at this time with a Spanish army, intending to proceed to Flanders. He arrived at Pignerol. The valleys of the Cluson, the Pragela, and the Upper Doire all belonged to France, as well as the marquisate of Saluces. The Queen of Spain was the sister of Charles IX. The Duke of Clèves was the king's lieutenant. No sooner had he heard of these events, than he ordered all the Reformed, Vaudois or strangers, to come and have their names individually taken down by the governor of the province in which they dwelt.¹ The same measure was adopted with regard to those who belonged to France.² The object of it was to know the number and strength of the party. Moreover, Birague, who was then governor of Pignerol, forbade all who were under his authority to lodge Protestants, under pain of death.³ The steps which the Protestants had taken to obtain more liberty in their religious exercises, became the very heads of accusation against them.⁴ From all sides the Vaudois received disquieting news, or heard ominous rumours. Now it was said that the Spanish army was going to exterminate them; now, that their worship would be completely prohibited; but it was agreed upon all hands that near and imminent dangers gathered around their church.⁵

The Vaudois churches held a synod in the Val Cluson,⁶ and

¹ "Louis Gonzague of Clèves, Prince of Mantua, Duke of Nancy, and governor and lieutenant-general of his most Christian majesty on this side of the mountains, with the advice of his majesty's council of state, sitting at Pignerol. . . . We ordain . . . that every religionary shall, within twenty-four hours, present himself before the governor, and have his name taken down." (Pignerol, 10th October, 1567.) Mentioned in the Chronique des Sollaro. MS. of the Royal Library at Turin.

² By edict of October, 1567.

³ " . . . Quale si colui che alloghera, come quello che sara alloggiato; inconerano, per la prima volta, a chiaschedun d'essi nella pena di cento scudi; la seconda, di doi batti di corda e ducento scudi; e la terza, della perdita della vita e beni." (Pignerol, 19th October, 1567.) Chronique des Sollaro.

⁴ Same source, under date 28th November, 1567.

⁵ Gilles, p. 238.

⁶ End of May, 1567.

appointed an universal fast, to turn away, by humiliation and prayer, *the chastisements of the Lord and the fierceness of his wrath.*¹ And, like a cloud which, being driven by the wind, carries elsewhere the thunders with which it was charged, these mournful omens and causes of fear passed over the valleys without any harm.

But this respite was not of long duration.² St. Bartholomew's Day drenched France with blood.³ Alarm again extended over Piedmont. The Catholics, says Gilles,⁴ made great rejoicings, and mocked at the religionaries, as if God had been abolished. Protestant worship, at least, was interdicted in the French dominions. The inhabitants of St. Germain and of Pérouse complained to the governor of Pignerol. "When our valley was ceded to France,"⁵ said they, "it was agreed that the privileges which we enjoyed at that period should be secured to us."⁶ Birague paid no regard to this; and the pastor of St. Germain, whilst the place of worship in his parish was shut up, ascended to Pramol, and invited the parish priest of that place to a public discussion. The priest fled to avoid it, and the Protestant pastor won the whole of that commune to Protestantism, it having previously been Catholic.

This produced great excitement among the clergy; and the Vaudois continuing their worship in the fields or in private houses, Birague was urged to proceed against them by force of arms; but he dreaded the valour of these mountaineers, of which they had already given proof, and the mutual aid which they afforded to one another. To prevent the valleys of Lucerna and St. Martin, which belonged to the Duke of Savoy, from carrying assistance to their brethren of the Val Pérouse, he complained of their intervention, as if it had already taken place. The Duke of Savoy, dreading

¹ Gilles, p. 239.

² On 28th September, 1571, Charles IX. had even written to the Duke of Savoy a pressing letter in favour of the Vaudois. It will be found in Gilles, pp. 242, 243.

³ From the 23d August to the 2d September, 1572. During the interval the Moriamur crusade was organized against the Reformed (12th March, 1568). This association had taken for its device, Eamus nos, moriamur cum Christo. The peace of Longjumeau was concluded on the 27th of March, which lasted only till September, 1568. In 1569 the battle of Jarnac took place, where the Prince of Condé was killed by a traitor. The King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., put himself at the head of the Reformed. The battle of Montcontour was fought on the 3d of October, 1569, where Admiral De Coligny was defeated by the Duke of Anjou. On the 15th of August, 1570, the peace of St. Germain-en-Laye was concluded. Catherine de Medicis attracted to Paris the Queen of Navarre, the mother of Henry IV. (Jeanne D'Albret), who died on 10th June, 1572. Her son married the sister of Charles IX., on the 18th of August. Five days after, the massacre of the Protestants commenced.

⁴ P. 250.

⁵ In 1562.

⁶ Petition of 2d August, 1573. Archives of the Court at Turin, No. of series, 226.

that political difficulties might arise with France,¹ prohibited the Vaudois of his dominions from crossing the frontier in arms;² and Coestrocuzo, who was charged with the transmission of this order, endeavoured to make the syndics and pastors of the communes responsible for its execution. They, being assembled on the 5th of January, 1573, began by protesting their loyalty to their sovereign, and representing to him that they had no executive power in their hands—that their exhortations, always directed to the object of keeping every one within the path of duty, were nevertheless often fruitless—that, therefore, they prayed him not to make the whole of the Vaudois responsible for the faults of a few—that besides, he himself, in ceding the valley of Pérouse to Charles IX., had guaranteed the maintenance of the privileges which it enjoyed, and that the Vaudois could not see their brethren destroyed without feeling themselves impelled to succour them, by considerations of duty as well as of affection, and that they therefore humbly entreated his royal highness to be graciously pleased to exert his influence, that the inhabitants of Pérouse and St. Germain might be allowed to remain in peace.³

Under the respectful language of this document there is manifest evidence of the firm resolution of the Vaudois to stand by one another for mutual defence. This resolution caused a suspension of the proceedings against the Val Pérouse. Meanwhile, Charles De Birague succeeded his brother Louis as lieutenant of the King of France in the government of Pignerol. Anxious to signalize his entry upon his office by some striking measure, and urged moreover by the royal council⁴ of that city, which was itself stirred up by the clergy, this governor ordered the Protestants of the country to cease from all religious assemblies.

They refused. Birague armed his garrison, and marching by night, surprised the town of St. Germain before dawn.⁵ Five men were seized, who were hanged shortly after on the trees of La Turina; but the rest of the inhabitants defended themselves vigorously; the alarm was given, and Captain Frache, one of the most valiant men of his time, the chronicles say,⁶ hastened from the heights of Angrogna, with the veteran band which had so gloriously broken up the siege of Exilles, rescued St. Germain, and drove the troops of Birague above La Pérouse and below Pignerol.

¹ Resigo di tirarmi la guerra alle spalle. . . . Instructions to the senator De Ruffia, delegated to the valleys, 10th August, 1573. (Archives of Turin, No. of series, 226.)

² By letters of 30th December, 1572.

³ Gilles, ch. xxxvi., pp. 251–253.

⁴ Sometimes also called the Senate of Pignecrol.

⁵ On 22d July, 1573.

⁶ Gilles, p. 255.

These troops, however, returned to the charge a few days after, under the command of Colonel De La Rade. All the communes of the Val Lucerna sent a contingent for the defence of their brethren, notwithstanding severe measures and special commissions, by which the Duke of Savoy sought to prevent them from so doing.¹ Many engagements took place upon the banks of the Cluson during the whole of the month of August. In one of these skirmishes, Peter Couper of La Tour, a man distinguished for his intrepidity, but too confidently bold, was killed at the head of his troop, near Pinache, where the collision had taken place.

The numerous losses which the assailants had experienced in these encounters, and the trouble which resulted from them to the Vaudois in their agricultural labours, made both parties desirous of peace. These conflicts have received the name of the War of La Rade, from the leader of the enemy, who especially signalized himself in it. At last the Vaudois of the manor [châtellenie] of Pérouse, in a spirit of accommodation, offered to Birague to suspend the publicity of their religious services for a month, and to send away their pastor,² on condition that arms should be laid down upon both sides, that prisoners should be restored without ransom, and that no prosecution should be instituted upon account of anything that had taken place.³ Birague himself, before the commencement of hostilities, had asked no more of the Vaudois, in order to his leaving them in tranquillity, than that they would interrupt their worship for a month;⁴ but they had refused, in the fear that this concession would only render their adversaries more difficult to deal with, and encourage them to make greater demands. However, Birague did not demand anything more after this than he had done before the resistance commenced; and these stipulations were

¹ Very full particulars on this subject are contained in a paper in the Archives of Turin, entitled, Istruzione a voi Messer Cesare Cambrani di signori di Ruffia, Messer senatore, di quello che haverete a fare e dire in le valli di Lucerna, Angrogna, San Martino, &c., per servizio nostro. It is dated 10th August, 1573. The following are a few passages from it: "Farete intendere che havano trovato strano, che quei populi, nostri sudditti, senza proposito, se siano levati et habbino tolto le arme . . . per volere diffendere quelli di San Germano, che sono di aliena giurisdittione . . . contro un principe tanto potente con e il Re di Francia . . . e se vi dicono che essi delle valli sarrano usciti in adiuto di quelli della valle della Perosa e di Pragellato per essere tutti scritti (formati) in Xrispo (Christo) com' essi dicano . . . li poteti rispondere che qui non si tratta di religione, ma de rebellione, &c. . . ."

Mention is made, at the end of this paper, of a letter which the Duchess of Savoy wrote on the same subject, to Stephen Noël, pastor of Angrogna.

² Francis Guérin, who had brought about the renunciation of the Popish Church by all the inhabitants of Pramol.

³ By petition of 31st August, 1573. Gilles, p. 257-259.

⁴ Id. p. 254.

converted into a treaty.¹ The king approved it; but he desired that the Vandois of the Val Pérouse should renounce their public worship entirely. Birague signified to them this resolution. They replied, with dignity, that they set a higher value upon religious life than upon the mere life of the body, and that there was no need for their having laid down their arms if it was intended to compel them so soon to take them up again. This language induced Birague to refrain from insisting; and it was even given out that he had been authorized, by a secret permission from the king, to tolerate the exercise of public worship, according to the Reformed religion, in the valley of Pérouse.

But in the following year Charles IX. died of a tragical malady,² and Henry III., his brother, furtively quitted the throne of Poland, to which he had been called two months before, and came to assert his right to the crown of France. Passing through Turin on his way, he was received with great honours, and he testified his gratitude to the Duke of Savoy by restoring to him, as a royal gift, the towns of Pignerol, Savillan, and Levadis, along with the valley of Pérouse. The inhabitants of this locality, therefore, returned for a short time under the government whose blessings were then enjoyed by the Vandois of Piedmont, and had some years of repose. They will demand our attention again in the course of this history; meanwhile, let us consider what took place in the high valleys of the Doire and Pragela.

¹ Concluded at Pignerol, 1st September, 1573.

² At Vincennes, 30th May, 1574.

CHAPTER XII.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.

SECOND PERIOD.—LESDIGUIÈRES IN PRAGELA.

(A.D. 1574 TO A.D. 1601.)

Reign of Henry III. in France—THE LEAGUE—Agitations in the French Vaudois valleys—Assassins—Jesuits—Rumours of impending danger—Settlement of Popish priests in the parishes of the Plebanie of Oulx—Progress of the Protestant cause—Death of La Cayette—Lesdignières invades Piedmont—Various events of the war—Unjust attempt to deprive the Vandois of Pinache of their place of worship—Attempt to massacre them—Polemical discussions—Letter of Lesdignières to the Piedmontese Vandois, promising them protection—Apostasy of Captain Jahier of Pramol—His miserable death—Peace of 1601 between France and Savoy.

IMMEDIATELY on his return to France, and before he had even reached Paris, Henry III. declared against religious liberty. His mother, Catherine de Medicis, had gone to meet him as far as the bridge of Beauvoisin. There Montbrun, the chief of the Calvinists of Dauphiny, plundered the equipages of the new king. For this Henry III. retained a feeling of personal resentment; and no sooner did he arrive at Lyons¹ than he held a great council, in which, contrary to the advice of the wiser part, it was decided to continue the cruel intestine war for the destruction of the Huguenots.

The Huguenots very soon had at their head three princes of the blood.² Their enemies were then forced to think of peace; and, by an edict of the 14th of May, 1576, the Protestants obtained the free exercise of their religion, admission into the parliaments, and a certain number of fortified places, which were to remain in the possession of their troops, as a sort of hostages, under the name of places of security. These concessions excited the liveliest dissatisfaction among the Catholics; the more ardent leagued themselves together; the crowd followed them; ambitions men put themselves at their head; the indecision of the king allowed them to gain strength; and thus the League arose.

¹ On 6th September, 1574.

² The Prince of Condé, who had just returned to France; the Duke of Alençon (afterwards Duke of Anjou), who made his escape from the court of his mother (Catherine de Medicis) on the 15th of September, 1575, to go to join the confederate Protestants; and the King of Navarre (afterwards Henry IV.) who had espoused Margaret of France, the sister of Henry III. and of Charles IX., and who also rejoined his brethren in religion in February, 1576.

To repress it, the party whom it threatened demanded a meeting of the states-general, which were opened by the king at Blois, on the 6th of December, 1576. But the Calvinists did not derive the advantage from this which they expected. This assembly, of which all the members were Catholics, revoked their privileges, sanctioned the League, and compelled the king himself to sign it. No enemy could have given him worse counsel. The civil war was thus kindled again with more fury than ever; but ere long, apprehensive that the Reformed might call in foreign troops to their assistance, Henry III. granted them a new Edict of Pacification.¹ It was the sixth, but it was not more durable than the others. The war continued, sometimes in secret plots and intrigues, sometimes in open violence, sometimes general, sometimes confined to particular localities, but always full of hatred and fury.

These great convulsions, which shook France to its centre, were attended with corresponding local commotions in the Vaudois valleys which belonged to it. The archives of the monastery of Oulx,² in the valley of the Doire, have preserved the remembrance of some of these shocks, in so far at least as they affected that establishment; for it frequently had to suffer from them,³ although rather at the hand of Calvinists who came from the interior of the country, than of the Vaudois who were settled in the neighbourhood itself. The latter, indeed, exhibited, even towards the missionaries who were sent to convert them, the mildness and generosity which result from the long-continued influence of the gospel—qualities which were acknowledged by their adversaries. Now we find the Capuchins pursued by robbers, and taking refuge in the house of a Vaudois, to whom they are indebted for their lives.⁴ Now a pastor accords to these monks an obliging hospitality.⁵ Again, we

¹ According to a treaty signed on the 17th of September, 1577, at Bergerac, and ratified by the king, on the 5th of October, at Poitiers.

² I have seen only the Sommaire, which is a manuscript of 838 pages, in small folio, deposited in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.

³ See fol. 25, fol. 37 (right-hand page), 38 (left-hand), and 39, 117, 314 (left-hand), 315 (right-hand), &c.

⁴ Notes on the Missions of the Capuchins in the Vaudois Valleys, in Italian, without any particular title; in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol. In the paragraph beginning with these words: S'introvano in queste valli, un eretico banditto famoso . . . uomo perverso, inimico de catholici, di Dio, e massime delli Capuchini.

⁵ "Audando noi per una terra di Pragela . . . andassimo alla casa d'un ministro, per provare se l'haverebbe fatto la carita. E lo trovassimo a canto alla porta. Li chiamarsino limosina. E il ministro rispose cheravamo troppo scrupulosi d'andar per il mondo senza denari.—Il Padre Giovanni li rispose: che noi imitavamo are told of some poor villagers who are astonished at seeing them walk barefooted,¹ a circumstance which of itself proves how little the presence of monks was then familiar to the inhabitants of Pragela.

But whilst displaying this kindness and good nature towards these inoffensive personages, the Vaudois of Pragela evinced no common energy in repelling armed aggressions. They were then, it is true, supported by their brethren of the other valleys,² according to the covenant of union which both they and their brethren had sworn to observe. Thus, the superior of the abbey of Pignerol having, in 1583 and 1584, arbitrarily caused some of the Protestants of the Val Pérouse to be arrested when they went into that city on their private business, their compatriots took up arms for their deliverance; and the governor of La Tour, having ordered the inhabitants of the Val Lucerna not to intermeddle with this affair, the Vaudois replied that they would never make any opposition to the regular course of justice, but that if the chiefs of a rival religion attempted to encroach upon their recognized rights, they could never abandon one another.³

Shortly afterwards the minister of St. Germain, and the minister of Le Roure, in Pragela, were assailed near La Pérouse by some soldiers of that garrison, who left the latter covered with wounds. The report of his death having immediately spread, the people ran together in arms, from all the mountains, to avenge their pastor. The principal inhabitants of La Pérouse, although Catholics, had caused the wounded man to be transported into the town, and bestowed upon him all the attention which his circumstances required. "But," says Gilles, "they were greatly afraid when they heard with what fury the people were animated; wherefore the governor of the castle, having come down to the town, requested the pastor of Pinache, Elias Schliop by name, a grave man and much respected, Giesu Christo e li Apostoli.—Dice il ministro che la nostra povertà era volontaria. —E poi ne fece entrar in casa, conducendosi permanto. Fece preparar subito la tanla; e mentre mangiamo, stette sempre in piedi, con il capello in mano: servendosi la ministra (the pastor's wife), con grande riverenze, tagliandosi fin al pane. . . . Tutte le ragione che il Padre Giovanni diceva al ministro, egli le teneva per buone. N'accompagno poi fuori della casa, facendone esebitione della cosa e di denarii." (Notes on the Missions of the Capuchins in the Vaudois Valleys.) to go and meet this torrent of people, in order to calm them, by representing to them that the minister Garnier was not dead, that care would be taken of him, and that the guilty would be punished. Pastor Schiop succeeded in his mission of conciliation; but the people, although appeased, crowded into the town of Pérouse, and around the house where the wounded man lay, whom they took and bore in their arms to his own place of residence. He recovered, but his assailants were never punished.

¹ Same Manuscript.

² I find, under date 8th June, 1579, a notarial paper, in twelve folio pages, containing the testimonies of a great number of people, who give evidence that the Vaudois of the valleys of St. Martin and Lucerna had recently brought assistance, by arms, to those of Pragela. This paper is followed by various letters from the syndies of Le Villar, Bobi, St. John, Rora, and Angrogna, replying that this was done without their participation. (All these documents are in the State Archives at Turin, No. of series, 317-320.)

³ Gilles, ch. xli. p. 285.

After the assassins, the Jesuits came to trouble the valley. They appeared there in 1584. Although their assaults did not cause blood to flow, yet they were a precursory indication of new calamities.

The League, which had been formed in France for the destruction of the Reformed, emboldened the enemies of the Vaudois in Piedmont. They spoke of nothing less than a coalition between Henry III., Philip II.,¹ and the Duke of Savoy, to annihilate the church of the valleys. To these rumours of extermination, and lofty threats, the Israel of the Alps responded by a public fast, a time set apart for humiliation and prayer.²

The Vaudois valleys, which were under the dominion of the Duke of Savoy, then enjoyed tranquillity, for that prince, far from joining the League, condemned its excesses. But the valleys of the Doire and the Cluson, whose history we now write, had their share of these commotions. As Henry III. had been declared chief of the League, it was in the name of his government that, in the year 1583, the Plébanie of Oulx began to be visited by persons appointed to settle priests in all the Protestant parishes;³ and upon representations, addressed by the archbishop of the diocese to the court of the Parliament of Grenoble, a formal edict was issued on the 14th of August, 1603, rendering that restoration imperative. All gentlemen holding ecclesiastical property were to be declared plebeians, and to have their own property confiscated, if within the space of one month after the publication of the edict they had not restored to the clergy the patrimony which they kept from them.

These proceedings were continued till 1618.⁴ Nevertheless, Pro-

¹ King of Spain, father-in-law of Charles Emmanuel.

² This public fast took place in all the valleys on the 15th and 16th, and also on the 22d and 23d of May, 1585.

³ Visites générales de la Plébanie d'Oulx, 1583 and 1584. (A thick 4to MS. in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.) These visits were made in virtue of a special ordinance of the Parliament of Grenoble in 1583. Louis De Birague intrusted the Grand Vicar of Oulx with the execution of it, by a mandate of 7th October, 1583.

⁴ In 1605 Jerome De Birague (for first Louis, then Charles, and afterwards Vol. II.

testantism still triumphed. Lesdiguières had, in the meantime, acquired a predominant power in Dauphiny. The personal enemies of the Vaudois became more timid. Captain De La Cazette was taken in 1590 by orders from the Protestant headquarters, in spite of a guard of twenty-four men, who watched day and night around his house. A detachment of forty picked men, sent on this inglorious expedition, came to Oulx by night, surrounded the abode of the persecutor, burst open the doors by means of a petard, and accusing La Cazette of treason, slew him, without giving him opportunity of making any defence. But, even in order to punish a traitor, is it right to act like traitors? This blow seems to have been struck by order of General the Count De Gattinara, whose army remained for some time, in 1590, in the valley of La Pérouse, which they oppressed by taxes and contributions. This army had been brought thither in consequence of the invasion of the marquisate of Saluces, which the Duke of Savoy had seized in 1588, and of the incursion which he afterwards made with an armed force into Provence.

The clergy of Suza took advantage of this absence of their sovereign to get the Vaudois of Mathias and of Méane interdicted from the exercise of their religion; but they, having made a representation of the case to the Duchess of Savoy, who was always favourable to them, obtained, though not without some considerable expense,¹ the confirmation of all their privileges.²

Meanwhile Lesdiguières, desirous of uniting the interests of the crown of France with the exercise of the power which he had acquired in Dauphiny as leader of the Huguenots, prepared to invade Piedmont, in order to punish the Duke of Savoy for his seizure of the province of Saluces, and his invasion of Provence. A similar expedition had already been attempted, in 1591, against the valley of Lucerna, by Colonel De Perdeyer, which failed before the fort of Mirabouc. Lesdiguières was more successful; and having occupied Sézane on the 26th of September, 1592, he descended next day by the valley of Pragela, sending an advanced guard to apprehend all the inhabitants, lest they might precede him, and betray the secret of his march. He thus appeared unexpectedly under the walls of Pérouse, and entered it in the evening,³ by the clear light

Jerome were governors of Pignerol) commanded the prior of Suza to come in person, and be present at these inspections. In 1609 he ordained that in all parishes the Romish worship should be celebrated according to the ritual adopted by the Council of Trent. In 1611 he employed the vicar-general to visit certain priories, and in 1617 to inspect the whole Plébanie. (These documents are in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

¹ For the sum of 650 golden crowns.

² Under date, 10th May, 1591.

³ Saturday, 27th September, 1592.

of the moon. The keeper of the gates was killed; the garrison had only time to retire into the castle, with the governor, Cachéran, who was exceedingly mortified at having allowed himself to be surprised. No one was killed in the town, except a man who was found in the street armed with a pike and a cutlass. His name was Rouger, and "he had," says Gilles,¹ "the appearance and manners of a proud soldier, rather than of a humble parish minister." He was, however, the ecclesiastical director of a Catholic parish of the neighbourhood; but his flock themselves were ashamed of his ministry, not so much for his military air as for his immoral life.² A few days before, he had drawn his sword against a Protestant pastor, who was then defended and protected by the Papists of La Pérouse. The Vaudois did not seek to avenge themselves for this assault; but the French soldiers having taken Priest Rouger for a leader of the enemy, killed him in the public square. His body was left exposed on the ground, without the Catholics themselves taking the trouble to perform the last rites for a man who had brought much scandal upon their church, by his dissoluteness and his cruelties.

Lesdiguières marched upon Pignerol that same evening, in order to surprise it, but was not able to seize that city, and so returned to the siege of the castle of La Pérouse, which he compelled to surrender on the 2d of October, 1592. However, the inhabitants of the valleys of St. Martin and of Lucerna had taken up arms to resist the invasion. They were exempted from it upon payment of a heavy contribution, the amount of which was agreed upon at Grand Doublon, on the 1st of October, between their deputies and Lesdiguières. That general then turned towards Briqueras, and (in 1593) caused the castles of La Tour and Pérouse to be demolished.

To oppose these conquests, Charles Emmanuel, who had returned from Provence, again ascended the valley of the Doire, accompanied with a powerful force.³ His design was to seize the fortress of Exilles, which guarded the frontiers of Dauphiny. Lesdiguières retraced his steps to defend this place. He ascended the valley of Pragela, and stopped at Oulx, not having been able to prevent the capitulation of Exilles, which, however, did not surrender until it had sustained more than 2000 cannon-shot. A murderous combat afterwards took place at Salabertrans, between the armies of France and Savoy. Both parties equally claimed the victory; but Lesdiguières retained the upper part of the valley. Charles Emmanuel, shortly after, caused the fort of St. Benoit to be erected on the limits of his territory, between Pérouse and Pignerol.

¹ P. 293.

² See the particulars in GILLES, p. 293.

³ Not wholly derived from his own dominions, but consisting also of troops furnished by the King of Naples, the King of Spain, and the Emperor of Germany, his allies.

Towards the end of the year the French troops withdrew from Piedmont, retaining possession, in that country, only of Cavour, Miraboue, and a few other places. But in abandoning to Charles Emmanuel the valleys which he had conquered, Lesdiguières stipulated that religious liberty should be guaranteed for ever to their inhabitants.¹ The Vaudois, who had enjoyed it most completely during the occupation of their country by the French, had hastened to multiply their places of meeting in Pragela. The Duke of Savoy, when he became master of these countries, was solicited by the Papists to forbid the Reformed worship altogether. Fearing that he might decide accordingly, the Vaudois addressed a petition to him, in consequence of which they obtained the preservation of their privileges, on condition, however, that the newly-erected places of worship should be closed, and that the forsaken chapels, which had been appropriated to Protestant worship, should be restored to the Catholics.² This last article related particularly to the dependencies of the provostship of Oulx, which had suffered from the presence of Lesdiguières, as formerly from that of Des Adrets.³

But the probability of such sufferings was not yet over, for the war was still prosecuted between Savoy and France. The upper part of the valleys of the Chuson and the Doire belonged to the latter power, and Charles Emmanuel thought to make himself master of them. His troops, having surmounted all obstacles as far as Suza and Mentoules, fortified themselves in the narrowest part of the gorge which opens into the valley of Méane, as well as upon the summit of an eminence covered with ruins, which commands the village of Mentoules in Pragela. "This invasion," says Gilles,

¹ This treaty is mentioned in a decree of his majesty's sovereign council at Pignerol, of date 24th April, 1654. (Civil Archives of Pignerol, class xxv., mazzo i., No. 7.)

² Letters-patent granted at Turin, by Charles Emmanuel, 21st November, 1594.

³ There was a criminal process for the carrying away of stones and building materials from the provostship of Oulx, against Anthony Reul, innkeeper in the plain of Oulx, dated 6th June, 1595, and occupying seventeen quarto leaves. Recognitions concerning the burning of the monastery, taken at the request of the provost, Jerome De Birague, before the local lieutenant of the see of Briangon, under date 6th September, 1596, in one folio MS. of eighteen leaves, ill written;—a Report, [Procès Verbal] on the same subject, drawn up by the officer of justice, on the 30th of January, 1597, &c. All in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol. There are in these archives also other reports and documents relative to similar untoward occurrences within the provostship of Oulx, in 1502, 1574, 1591, 1592, 1593, &c.

"having caused the inhabitants of the valley to be called out for its defence, all of whom were of the Reformed religion,¹ they made such an effort from both sides that, notwithstanding great resistance, they put the ducal troops to flight, and made the governor of Revel prisoner."²

The Duke of Savoy at this time added to the fortifications which guarded these valleys. The little town of La Chapelle was surrounded with walls, and received a garrison. A new fortress was raised at the entry of the valley of St. Martin, and took the name of Palais Louis. The soldiers who were placed there having committed numerous excesses,³ which evinced their hostility to Protestantism, the Capuchin monks, in their vicinity, resumed courage, and became more enterprising than ever in their opposition to evangelical worship.

At this period the Protestants of Pinache assembled in a large place of worship, which had formerly been a Catholic church, but the Catholics of the country had given it up to them by an agreement, of which the origin was as follows. The Papists were more numerous at Diblon than at Pinache, although, in all, less numerous than the Protestants. The latter offered to build a church, at their own expense, at Diblon, for the use of the Catholics, and the latter consented to give up the church at Pinache to the Reformed. By this arrangement the interests of both parties were provided for. The people often come to a better agreement among themselves than would ever be brought about by those who direct their affairs. However, the letters-patent of the 21st of November, 1594, having declared that the edifices formerly devoted to Catholic worship should be restored to the Catholics, they became an instrument of much mischief in the hands of the monks, who prevailed with the governor of Pignerol to prohibit the Vaudois of Pinache from entering their place of worship any more. In vain did the Vaudois point out the title which they had to that edifice; the governor would listen to nothing on the subject.

Two opinions then arose among the Vaudois as to the course which they should pursue. Some said, "They cannot dispute our right to the place of worship at Diblon, which was constructed at our expense; let us expel from it the Catholics, to whom we transferred it, and let us celebrate our worship there." Others replied—"Our neighbours of Diblon have had nothing to do with the injury which we have suffered; we have no right to take from them by violence what we gave over to them of our own freewill; but we have a right to meet in the church which they, in like manner, made over to us: let us remain where we are, and carry on our worship." This opinion prevailed.

¹ . . . "qui etaient tous de la religion."

² Gilles, ch. xlv. p. 313.

³ See Gilles, p. 314.

Governor Ponte regarded this as an insult to his authority, and having consulted with the military commanders at La Chapelle and Palais Louis, he formed the project of massacring the inhabitants of Pinache when they were assembled in their church, and of carrying away the pastor from the midst of his flock. One Sabbath morning, therefore, troops marched out from both these fortresses, as well as from Pignerol. The pastor, Felix Ughet, preached on that morning at Le Villar, a village situated half a league from Pinache. The soldiers were preparing to surround the church, when a shepherd boy, who saw their movements, ran to warn the Protestant worshippers, who came out in haste, and secured the escape of the pastor. The troops of the enemy being almost all on horseback, could not follow the Vaudois, who dispersed themselves amongst the vineyards in their flight; but Ponte's cavalry ravaged the plain, returned to Pinache, plundered the pastor's house, and carried away much booty. The father and brother of the minister Ughet were afterwards imprisoned, as we have already seen in the chapter devoted to the history of the martyrs.

But all these acts of violence had only the effect of causing the Vaudois still more to detest the Jesuits and Capuchins, who were the instigators of them. The monks, therefore, thought proper to seek for some victories in the field of controversy. They challenged the Vaudois pastors to polemical discussions. The weapons of controversy seem to have been equally well managed on both sides; but reasoning does not produce faith, religious life is not the result of a syllogism: the dialectics of Rome broke down before the authority of the Bible.

Then, addressing themselves to popular fears, these religious spread the report of an approaching destruction of the Reformed, which no one could possibly escape but by taking refuge in the bosom of the Romish Church, whose arms were always paternally open to embrace the inhabitants of the valleys. "Rumours of this kind," says Gilles,¹ "perseveringly circulated, and transmitted from one to another, acquired the more consistency, as direct attacks upon the Protestants became more numerous, and remained unpunished in Piedmont as well as in France." The pastor of Mentoulles² wrote to Lesdiguières on this subject, and even went to him in person. The governor of Dauphiny replied in these terms: "Gentlemen, I was very glad to hear from you, by the minister M. Guérin. I would have wished to have heard better news, because my duty requires me to care for your comfort and perfect liberty, which also, above all things, I have at heart. But you know that those who walk in the right path always suffer persecution. Doubt not, any longer, I pray you, but that I will participate with you in what befalls you, and will exert myself to the utmost of my power to ward off evil from you, by my interposition with your sovereign. Be assured, whatever you may be told, that he will treat you as good subjects, and will maintain you in your liberty of conscience, if you are obedient to him, as I know that you wish to be; and if you keep this course, I will take upon me to protect you, and will support you as much as reason and the common cause require me, as M. Guérin will inform you on my behalf. I now beg the Creator, gentlemen, that he may continue and increase his favours to you, and commend myself to your favourable regard.—LESDIGUIÈRES."¹ These protestations re-assured the Vaudois, who were full of confidence in his honour, both as a gentleman and a Christian.

¹ Chap. xlv. p. 322.

² Bernard Guérin, brother of Francis Guérin, the former pastor of St. Germain, the apostle of Pramol, and the missionary and reorganizer of the churches of Saluces.

However, a few of the Reformed, influenced by motives peculiar to themselves, yielded to the arts of the monks, who sought their conversion. Of this number was Captain Jahier of Pramol, a man of great courage, but very covetous of wealth. He was accused of extortion; the monks gave information against him to the Duke of Savoy, who had him summoned before him. The proofs, carefully sought out, left no room for denying the charge. Then the Jesuits, who were present at the examination, flung themselves at the feet of the sovereign, entreating him to pardon the culprit if he would change his religion. Totally stunned by the blow, Jahier promised all that was asked of him. Afterwards, having recovered his composure, he wished to retract that resolution; but he was told that he was bound by his promise, which his sovereign had received from his own mouth. To render the fulfilment of it more pleasant to him, a promise was made to him in return, of exemption from taxes for some years, and of the office of captain-general of the militia of Pérouse for life. But it was required that he should immediately make his abjuration, and should bind himself to make proselytes afterwards.

The man of war and of wealth was overcome; and returning to Pramol, he sought to induce his wife to follow his example. She refused. A few days after, the monks having paid a visit to the village, to see what effect Jahier's solicitations had produced, they set up an altar, and celebrated mass there. None of the inhabitants were present at it, except one of the old Catholics of the place. Jahier attempted, by violent means, to compel the attendance of his son Elysée, aged fifteen years; but the boy escaped during the service; and his father beat him so cruelly afterwards, that he died in the course of a few days. Thus the apostate began to suffer in that which was dearest to him—and this, too, as an immediate consequence of his abjuration. And now his relatives, his friends, and his countrymen shrunk from him with contempt. The monks bore him a grudge for having done so little. The domestic roof, where everything reminded him of the murder of his son, became insupportable to him. A strange disquietude seized him. The agitation of his mind passed to his limbs, formerly full of vigour. He was affected with a perpetual trembling, which was attributed to a premature old age, but to which nothing equal was to be seen in any other old man. He changed his residence, and went to live at Diblon, where the sun has more power. But his health did not return. His soul also was sick, and trembled more than his body. "O how happy you are," said he to his wife, "to have preserved your peace of conscience!" When his last hour drew near, the priests sought to administer extreme unction to him, but he repelled them with disgust; wherefore, when he was dead, they refused to bury him, and his relatives, coming down from Pramol, took away his forsaken body, and discharged the last duties to it in the cemetery of Pinache. Gilles, who was then pastor at Pramol, has given a striking account of all these particulars.¹ Far from promoting the work of proselytism, this despised and despicable apostasy inspired the Vandois with a still more insurmountable aversion to abjuration than before.

¹ This letter is dated from Piedmore, 13th August, 1598.

Meanwhile, Charles Emmanuel had sought to conclude peace with Henry IV. For this purpose he even repaired in person to France, in 1599. But the treaty was not signed till the 17th of January, 1601, at Lyons. By this treaty, the Duke of Savoy ceded Gex, Bugey, and Val Romei to the King of France, retaining the marquisate of Saluces, the original cause of the war. It was said concerning this subject, that the king had made a duke's peace, and the duke had made that of a king.

¹ End of chap. xlv.

CHAPTER XIII.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.THIRD PERIOD.—THE VALLEY OF PÉROUSE UNDER THE DOMINION OF CHARLES EMMANUEL.

(A.D. 1601 TO A.D. 1628.)

The privilege of public worship denied to the inhabitants of Pragela—United declaration of the Vaudois—Efforts of the Romish clergy to make proselytes—The Duke of Savoy himself endeavours to induce some of the principal inhabitants of Pinache to join the Church of Rome—Decree of the Parliament of Grenoble—Inoperative edict of the Duke of Savoy—The Vaudois of Pérouse are induced, by crafty counsel, to separate themselves from the common union of the Vaudois, and to refuse payment of their share of a sum which the valleys were to pay for confirmation of privileges—They soon find that they have fallen into a dangerous snare—Orders given for the demolition of six of their places of worship—The Vaudois attacked by French troops at St. Germain—They assemble in such formidable numbers that the troops retire—An amnesty—Political relations of France and Savoy.

By the edict of 25th February, 1602, Charles Emmanuel, in granting religious liberty to the Vaudois valleys, had restricted the exercise of Protestant worship to the churches included within the limits of these valleys alone. The churches of Saluces and Pragela found themselves excluded from the privilege. All these members of one spiritual body, then joined in a manifestation of brotherly sympathy and resolution to make common cause with each other, the unanimity of which was admirable.

From the valley of the Sture, on the confines of Nice, to those of Mathias and Méane, on the confines of Suza, they signed, as a protest against the intrigues and violence from which they suffered at this period, the following declaration, which was, at the same time, a petition to their sovereign:—

“From time immemorial our progenitors and our families having been brought up in the doctrine professed at the present day by the Reformed Church, in which we are resolved to live and to die, that it may be known to all men that it is not for any crime or rebellion that we are at the present day spoiled of our lands and houses, we solemnly declare that this doctrine, which we are urged to renounce, is held by us as the only true doctrine ordained and approved of God—the only doctrine which can make us pleasing in his sight, and guide us to the path of salvation. If any one pretends that we are in error, let him prove it, and we will renounce it. But if it is attempted, by mere force and constraint, to make us follow human superstitions, we prefer rather to submit to the loss of our properties, and even of our lives, than to that of the truth and of the salvation of our souls.”¹

This courageous declaration, the terms of which we have abridged, was drawn up in Pragela. It had the effect only of exciting still more the ardour of proselytism and feverish rivalry of the jealous missionary zealots, who were no longer contented to employ persuasion as their only means of bringing back the wandering sheep to their fold. To strengthen the hands of these missionaries, the Archbishop of Turin repaired in person to the valley of Pérouse. He arrived there on the 25th of May, 1602, and took up his abode in the house of a Protestant innkeeper, whom he hoped to make his first proselyte. The country was suffering very much from dearth; the prelate caused wheat, money, and bread to be distributed to the indigent Catholics, promising the same relief to Protestants who should become Catholics. He then took upon him to forbid all persons from going to the plain of Piedmont to earn wages as reapers, without a special permission signed by his hand; and when this permission was asked, he refused to grant it without a formal engagement taken by the party obtaining it to live in the Romish religion.

In spite of all these unworthy arts, there were few apostasies, and of the persons who were entrapped into insincere abjurations, the greater part returned to the religion of their fathers after the archbishop's departure. But he returned in a short time, and ordered the Vaudois of Talucco, in the valley of St. Pierre, near Grand Diblon, to abjure their religion or to leave the country. They did neither the one of these things nor the other; and, after some individual cases of vexation, they were left in peace.

These means having proved unsuccessful, the principal inhabitants of Pinache were summoned to appear at Turin, before the Duke of Savoy. One of them alone refused to go.² The others, having arrived at Turin, presented themselves before the governor of the province, who said to them, “His highness being informed of the esteem in which you are held, has signified to me his desire to see you, that he may obtain your consent to return to the Holy Church, and so to set a good example to others. I have taken upon me to promise to his highness that you will do so; and you may be certain that in this way you will obtain whatever you desire, both now and for the future." "My lord," replied the villagers, "we desire nothing more than what we have. Had you promised to his highness anything depending on our strength or our fortune, we would not have failed to make it good, but as to the proposal of a change of our religion, it is a thing which concerns more than this world, and we pray you therefore not to insist upon that point." The governor replied by abusive language, and sent them away, saying that they would yet be called to appear before their sovereign. After some days, not having heard anything more on the subject, they left the capital, and returned to their hamlet. Scarcely had they arrived there, when Governor Ponte ordered them to appear again, within three days, at Turin, under pain of the confiscation of all their goods. They returned to Turin accordingly, towards the end of July, and were presented to the duke, who very affectionately exhorted them to embrace Popery, assuring them of his munificence if they would consent to do so. The Vaudois respectfully replied that they would be happy to devote themselves to his service, and even to die for him, but that their religion was dearer to them than life. A Capuchin, who was present at this audience, broke out in exclamations against the ignorance of these clowns, who dared to resist the desire of their sovereign; but the duke ordered him to be silent, saying, "A conversion ought to be voluntary; if these people were willing to enter our church, I would be very glad of it, but I have no wish to compel them."

¹ Perrin, p. 185-189. Léger, part i. p. 3.

² His name was Anthony Martinat. The others were John Micol, Michael Gilles, and John Bouchard.

Shortly after this, Ponte, who was at once governor of the province and commandant of the citadel of Turin, was arrested and deprived of all his dignities. "The great know why," says Gilles,¹ "but the Reformed knew only that it was not for having shown them too much favour, for he had done the very contrary."

At the same period, the parliament of Grenoble, whose jurisdiction extended over the valleys of Oulx and Pragela, ordained the re-establishment of the Catholic worship in all the parishes of these valleys, the restitution of ecclesiastical property, and the reparation of the abandoned chapels, that these edifices might be again employed for the celebration of mass.²

In the part of the Val Cluson which belonged to the Duke of Savoy, measures of another kind were adopted, with the same object. It was represented to the duke that the Vaudois settled in that valley offended the religious feelings of the Catholics, by not observing the festivals of their church. The result of this was an edict, requiring the Protestants to cease from inhabiting the right bank of the Cluson, and to retire to the left bank; but the Catholics of the country themselves petitioned against this measure, declaring that their Calvinist neighbours, far from offending their religious feelings, set them an example of every virtue, and hindered none of their duties. The châtelain of La Pérouse then recommended the Vaudois to keep their doors shut for a few days, as if they had removed, to testify their respect for the orders of their sovereign; and this edict had no further consequences.

¹ End of chap. xl.

² Decree of 14th August, 1603.

A short time after this, the inhabitants of Pinache were again prohibited from holding their religious meetings in the old Catholic church, which served them for a place of worship. The subject gave occasion to long-continued disputes; but at last a ducal commissioner decided that a new place of worship should be built for the Reformed, but that the Catholics of Diblon should contribute to its erection, in return for the outlay which the Vaudois of Pinache had incurred in the building of the Romish chapel of Diblon. The priest of Diblon endeavoured to prevent this arrangement from being carried out, by advancing new pretensions; but they were set aside in 1610.

In 1617, the parliament of Grenoble prohibited the admission of the Vaudois of Piedmont into Dauphiny.¹ The object of this was to break up the union which subsisted among all the evangelical inhabitants of the Vaudois Alps; but this attempt had no more success than previous ones.

"In 1623," says Gilles,² "the valley of Pérouse was subjected to continual annoyances, occasioned for the most part by the crafty counsels of some wily Papists, instigated by the monks, and too readily listened to." He refers to the payment of the 6000 ducats, which all the Vaudois valleys collectively had engaged to pay to the Duke of Savoy, to obtain the confirmation of their privileges, and a guarantee for their repose. The Vaudois of Pérouse had not been concerned in the events by which peace had been disturbed. "Why," it was said to them, "should you be made to bear any part of the price by which it was acquired? Disavow that unjust dependence, and all the inhabitants of the valley, without distinction of religion, will state their wants together to the Duke of Savoy. If anything must then be paid to obtain satisfaction, the Catholics will contribute as well as the Protestants." This advice was adopted by the Vaudois in a mixed meeting, at which none of their pastors were present. The châtelain of Pérouse drew up a petition accordingly; it contained eight articles, of which the fourth, the only article favourable to the Protestants, mentioned the maintenance of the privileges which they already enjoyed. The other seven articles related to the civil privileges which might have been common to all the inhabitants of the country, but in which the Catholics enjoyed peculiar preference.

¹ By decree of 9th November, 1617.

² Chap. lv.

Whilst they were making every effort to obtain a favourable answer to this petition, the Vaudois of Pinache commenced to build the steeple of their new church, on the situation previously fixed for it by the ducal commissioner. They were not bound to observe all the Catholic festivals, and one festival-day they carried on their work; upon which the monks of La Pérouse sent armed men and officers of justice to apprehend the Protestant workmen who were building the steeple. The people prevented their apprehension; but this attempt showed the evil disposition which existed, and the mischievous designs which were entertained, of which it was not long till new proofs were given.

The monks of Le Périer, having entered into public controversy with the minister Chanforan, and perhaps not being very well satisfied with the result, sought to have him apprehended and conducted to Pignerol. But this imprisonment, for which no reason was alleged, and which seems to have been intended merely to stop the mouth of the minister, was again opposed by the people, on the ground of the Vaudois privileges, according to which no inhabitant of the valleys could be withdrawn from his natural judges. A knowledge of the laws, upon which their political existence depended, was at that time as precious for the Vaudois, and as frequently rendered available, as the defensive armour, which, however, these laws ought to have saved them from the necessity of ever using.

These different circumstances, however, afforded indications of the desire of the hostile party to maltreat the Reformed. It was ere long more clearly manifested. The petition drawn up by the châtelain of Pérouse was answered on the 6th of October, 1623. By this reply, the duke granted to the Catholics all which they asked, and ordained the Protestants to demolish six of their places of worship, on the pretext that these edifices were situated beyond the limits assigned to the Reformed worship by the edict of 1602. The expenses of the seal, copying, &c., amounted to 3000 ducats, and the Protestants alone were called upon to pay them. Then, understanding how pernicious an advice they had followed, they addressed a new petition to their sovereign. This petition was intercepted, lost, or seized on the way. It never reached the duke. The order whose revocation it was designed to procure still remained in force. The governor of Pignerol came to Pinache to see to the demolition of the church which had been commenced there.

The Vaudois entreated him to await the reply of the duke to their recent representations; he waited, but the petition itself had not yet been put into the hands of the duke. The monks represented this delay in applying to him, and in the execution of his orders, as a contempt on the part of the Vaudois for the authority of their sovereign. There were echoes at court, which increased the strength and frequency of these odious insinuations; and on the 15th of January, 1624, the duke gave orders to his troops to march into the valley of the Cluson, and forcibly to demolish the six places of worship which had been named, as being without the tolerated limits.

A regiment of French infantry, in the pay of Charles Emmanuel, and under the command of Colonel Savine, entered the valley of Pérouse by that of Pragela. Officers of justice set out from Turin, under the direction of the collateral Syllano, who was empowered, in case of resistance, to put the militia of the neighbourhood under the command of Count Camillo Taffino. Having arrived at Pérouse, the collateral was informed of the petition of the Vaudois, which had not reached the court. Finding it to be reasonable, he adjourned the execution of his orders, and caused it to be forwarded to Turin.

But, in the meantime, Savine's regiment had arrived at St. Germain. It was intended that this regiment should immediately march against the Vaudois, who now implored the assistance of their brethren in the neighbouring valleys. The regiment itself was diminished by the defection of a great number of officers and soldiers, who demanded their dismissal, that they might not have to fight against the Protestants, whose religious opinions were the same with their own. Numbers of them even went over to the side of the Vaudois.

Count Philip of Lucerna took great precautions at this time to prevent the inhabitants of his valley from going to the assistance of their brethren of the Val Pérouse. However, a certain number of volunteers set out across the snows (it was in the end of January), and hastened to St. Germain. The pastors of the Val Cluson and of Pragela—countries then under the dominion of France—repaired also to Pinache, to try the effect of their pacific mediation, in order to bring the difference to an end. After some whole days of protracted conferences, it was agreed that the Vaudois should demolish their places of worship, on condition of being permitted to rebuild them in the same localities, but on other sites. They commenced immediately to demolish that of Pinache, in order to see if the troops would really retire upon this manifestation, or if it would be necessary to adopt more vigorous measures; for it cannot be supposed that 8000 or 10,000 men would have assembled, with arms in their hands, for no other object than the demolition of a few walls.

Scarcely was this work of demolition begun, when affrighted couriers arrived from St. Germain, announcing that the Vandois there were attacked from every side. Those of Pinache and of the Val Pérouse ran to arms. Having repulsed the assailing troops from St. Germain, they returned inflamed with fury. A troop of these valiant mountaineers would have seized, in their indignation, the collateral Syllano and his men of law, whom they loudly accused of treachery. The pastors of Pragela endeavoured to calm them, and covered the commissioners with the shield of their evangelical protection in the hour of peril, even offering them a refuge at Mentoules, in the territory of France. Thither the lawyers accordingly repaired; but the war continued in the lower part of the valley; and the enemy, a second time repulsed, set fire to the barns and isolated houses around St. Germain. The inhabitants of that village, fearing, after this attack, that they would be still more violently assailed, sent messengers during the night into the valleys of Angrogna and Lucerna to ask assistance.

The Count of Lucerna opposed again the levy of armed men which the Vandois wished to make; but he set out himself, on horseback, and rode quickly to St. Germain, where he arrived in the middle of the night, to see Colonel Savine, and prevent the effusion of blood. His negotiations were at first successful, and Vandois deputies¹ from the valley of Lucerna proceeded at his instance to the camp of the French commander. The negotiations, however, were prolonged, without coming to any issue. New acts of violence took place upon the part of the soldiers. The people of St. Germain, moreover, were all the while deprived of their habitations, which were either destroyed by fire or occupied by the troops. "There has been long enough delay!" exclaimed the mountaineers; "come and we ourselves will drive this army out of our country!" And transporting their families to those points in the mountains where they would be safest from any attack, they took arms in great numbers, to fall upon the camp of the enemy.

This was upon the 17th of February, 1624. Count Philip of Lucerna, who appeared at that time to take a lively interest in the Vandois, immediately mounted his horse, and proceeded with all haste to represent to Colonel Savine and Lieutenant Taffino that their troops would be utterly destroyed, if they did not relinquish their offensive pretensions. "Consider," said he, "that you have been held in check hitherto by a small portion of this people; and now that they are rising in a mass to defend their territory, which you have unjustly attacked, are you not afraid that his highness will make you responsible for the blood which will be shed, for the miseries which will ensue, and, above all, for having cruelly exceeded the orders which he gave you?" The troops themselves were very impatient of the uncomfortable situation into which they had been brought, amidst the severity of winter. An enormous quantity of snow had recently fallen, provisions were exhausted, firewood could not be had. The murmurs of the soldiers concurred with the representations of the Count of Lucerna to cause a breaking-up of the camp to be resolved upon; and the troops retired, leaving behind them a country ravaged by fire, and in great distress from the frost and from the effects of their depredations.

¹ These were Chanforan, syndic of Angrogna; Francis Goante, of La Tour; and Moses Eynard, of Lucerna.

The monks and clergy, the causes of all these alarms, trembled after the departure of the troops, lest the Vaudois people should take vengeance on them for all the evils which they had suffered. But their fear was all that they had to endure; and deputies having been sent to Turin, the Duke of Savoy published a complete amnesty for all which had taken place during these events. He ordered all the furniture and property of every kind which had been taken from the Vaudois to be restored to them, and upon both sides a liberation of prisoners.

Charles Emmanuel, who had been at war with France from 1613 to 1617, signed a treaty with Louis XIII., on the 7th of January, 1623, for the expulsion of the Spaniards from the Valtelline; and he resumed hostilities against France in 1628, entering then into an alliance with the house of Austria, in the hope of gaining Montferrat, amidst the rival pretensions which had just arisen with regard to that province, upon the recent succession of the Grand Duke of Mantua. These frequent breaches of faith neither advanced his glory nor his power. He died in 1630, after having been despoiled of most of his dominions by France, towards which he had acted so treacherously. We shall see, in next chapter, what were the consequences of these events to the Vaudois valleys of the Cluson and the Upper Doire.

CHAPTER XIV.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND OF
THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.FOURTH PERIOD.—FROM THE CONQUEST OF PIEDMONT BY LOUIS XIII. TO THE PIEDMONTESE EASTER.

(A.D. 1629 TO A.D. 1655.)

The last religious war in France—Fall of Rochelle—Invasion of Piedmont by Louis XIII.—His edict in 1629 for the establishment of Romish worship in the valleys of Exilles, Bardonnèche, Sezane, and Pragela—Great triumphs of the French arms—Charles Emmanuel dies of grief, and Victor Amadeus becomes Duke of Savoy—Peace—Prosperity of the Vaudois Church in Pragela after these events—New restrictions imposed—The Vaudois obtain the extension of their privileges in terms of the Edict of Nantes—They still increase in numbers and prosperity—Accession of Louis XIV.—The Piedmontese Vaudois take refuge in the French valleys after the Piedmontese Easter—The Vaudois in the French dominions are subjected to new hardships.

IN 1629 and 1630, Louis XIII. invaded Piedmont by the passes of Suza and the valley of Pragela. His presence in the midst of the Vaudois had a great influence on their destinies, and the nature of that influence depended in part on events which had previously taken place.

The last of the religious wars of which France was the theatre was then raging—that war in which the Protestant party was vanquished, never again to take up any weapons but those of controversy. In 1627, the Dukes of Rohan and Soubise, leaders of the Huguenots, had demanded assistance from England, and a fleet of 150 vessels, sent from that country, appeared off Rochelle. Cardinal Richelieu caused a celebrated dike to be constructed, to prevent them from throwing any assistance into the city. The siege of Rochelle lasted from the 10th of August, 1627, to the 28th of October, 1628. It did not surrender until it was reduced to the last extremity,—not until twelve thousand persons had died in it of famine. The fortifications were thrown down, the local magistracy abolished, and Catholicism re-established upon the ruins. Louis XIII., who had made his entry into it upon the 1st of November, received a sort of triumph on his return to Paris, which took place upon the 23d of December. Meanwhile, a number of places of secondary importance had been taken from the Protestants in the Vivarais and in Languedoc; but others still held out.¹

¹ Privas, in Ardèche, was invested, on the 14th of May, 1629, and taken on the
VOL. II.

In the beginning of the year, Charles De Gonzague, Duke of Nevers, had inherited the duchy of Mantua, his title to which, however, was disputed by Spain and Savoy. The King of France supported him, and soon marched in person against Piedmont. The Marquis D'Uxel led the advanced guard which preceded him. In the spring of 1628, he began to make efforts to force a passage of the Alps, in order to penetrate into the valleys of Italy. All the troops of Piedmont were soon in motion. Colonel Purpurat, the commander of the Vaudois militia, summoned a meeting of the Vaudois pastors and syndics at Rocheplate,¹ to induce them to use their influence with the people, in order to bring out as great a number of them in arms as possible. The Vaudois promised to comply with his wishes, on condition that they themselves should be left to guard the passes of their own mountains, which was granted to them.² The guards established by them were inspected by superior officers of the ducal army. Charles Emmanuel himself came to inspect the intrenchments thrown up in the valley of Pérouse.³ The Count of Verrue, one of his most distinguished generals, again urged upon the pastors of that valley the considerations which had been already laid before them by Colonel Purpurat at Rocheplate, to which he added a promise of effectual protection, upon the part of the sovereign, for religious liberty.

But the army of the Duke of Savoy was in great part composed of Italians and Spaniards, in whom no confidence could be placed. That of the King of France had just been engaged in fighting against the Protestants. On both sides the Vaudois saw dangers. The duke demanded of the valleys large sacrifices of men and money. An extreme dearth of provisions increased still more the sufferings of the population. The monks of Pignerol and the Jesuit missionaries took advantage of it to draw those into apostasy who had been reduced to beggary.

On the 16th of January, 1626, Louis XIII. set out from Paris, to cross the Alps at the head of his army. When he was at Briançon (in the end of February), the governor of Pignerol ordered

27th. The town was given up to pillage; 100 of the principal inhabitants were hanged, and 100 condemned to the galleys. Alais was besieged on the 6th of June, and capitulated on the 16th. The Duke De Rohan then held a meeting of the Protestant chiefs at Anduzo, and demanded peace, which was concluded on the 27th of June, at Alais. Thereafter all the strongholds of the Protestants were dismantled. Montauban made some resistance; but Richelieu entered it on the 20th of August. Three months after (on the 21st of November), he was appointed prime minister. (From L'Art de vérifier les dates.)

¹ On 26th June, 1628.

² Gilles gives a minute account of the result of this deliberation, chap. lvi., pp. 469-471.

³ He came on the 9th of July and 14th of August, 1628.

all the inhabitants of the valleys capable of carrying arms to hold themselves in readiness to march. Count Philip of Lucerna placed himself at their head, and conducted them to the Val Pérouse. Charles Emmanuel had advanced to the valley of the Doire. On the 4th of March Louis XIII. crossed Mount Genève, and on the 6th of the same month he forced in person the three barricades of the pass of Suza, defended by the Duke of Savoy, who was compelled to yield to superiority of numbers and valour. On the 11th of March he concluded a treaty of peace. Charles Emmanuel, who was the ally of the Spaniards, engaged to fight against them, and to support France, in order to compel them to raise the siege of Casal in favour of the Duke of Nevers.

After the victory which he had won, Louis XIII. received congratulations and addresses of various kinds, amongst which that of the provost of Oulx¹ deserves particular notice. "Sire!" said he, in substance, "Providence has blessed your arms, because you have consecrated them to the service of the faith. The numerous triumphs which your majesty has obtained over heresy in France fill all Catholic hearts with joy. Everywhere they pray to Heaven for the preservation and glory of your majesty. Heaven, which has conducted you into these regions of ours, seeks to complete its work in augmenting your glory and our consolations, by the restoration of the Catholic religion, which gathers strength around the footsteps of your majesty, and which has great need of such assistance in these afflicted valleys, where it cannot without bitter regret be told that it has been completely abolished." To this document was appended a petition, signed by some Catholics of the place, who asked the king for the restoration of their worship in all the communes of the Upper Doire, where at that time there did not exist a single parish priest.²

Louis XIII. ordained, by an edict of the 1st of April, 1629,³ that the exercise of the Romish religion should be everywhere re-established in the valleys of Exilles, Bardonnèche, Sézane, and Pragela; that the Catholic clergy should immediately be put into possession again of all lands that had formerly belonged to them, into whatsoever hands they might have passed, and whatever prescription might be pleaded in favour of the actual possessors. M. De Verthamont, intendant of justice in the army of Italy, was charged with the execution of these orders.¹ On the day after they were issued he proceeded to the localities, to examine the bounds of the old parishes. M. Henry D'Escoubleau, Archbishop of Bordeaux, accompanied him, provided with all necessary powers for the regulation of everything which belonged to the spiritual jurisdiction. Two or three churches, which were not yet entirely ruined, were put into a condition to be used for the rites of Rome. There still remained some ruins of an ancient priory in the village of Mentoules; the prior was solemnly re-installed there;² and in order to secure the continued effect of these measures, Louis XIII., before his departure, appointed a Catholic gentleman of the country as governor of the valley and the king's lieutenant, to watch over the interests of the Church of Rome throughout the whole of Pragela.

¹ [An ecclesiastical dignitary; the chief of a collegiate body.]

² This petition was presented by Birague, vicar-general of the provostship of Oulx.

³ Sommaire des archives de la prévôté d'Oulx. (Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

But this church had still very few adherents in these high valleys; the royal power, in opening for it an official access into the villages, had opened for it no access into hearts. Its priests had only parishes without parishioners, and their efforts would probably have remained without success, but for an unforeseen circumstance, which gave them a new impulse, and opened for them a wider field. The Duke of Savoy, who had not fulfilled the treaty of Suza,³ was again menaced by France. In the beginning of 1630, Cardinal Richelieu caused a considerable army to march against him. It entered Piedmont by the valley of the Doire, appearing to direct its course towards Montferrat; but very soon changed its route, turned to the south, and ascended towards Pignerol. That city was attacked on the 20th of March, 1630, and surrendered two days after. The citadel held out till the 29th. The operations were directed by the Marquis De Créqui. On the 21st he made himself master of the valley and castle of La Pérouse. From thence he summoned the valleys of St. Martin and Lucerna to surrender at discretion. They thought to resist, and the Vaudois asked the Duke of Savoy for aid, which he could not send them. The French army approached them, and encamped at Briqueras. Charles Emmanuel, on the contrary, had retired beyond the Po.

¹ By a decree, also dated 1st April, 1629. Under date 3d April, we find Procédure faite par M. de Verthamont, intendant du Dauphiné, commissaire délégué par le Roy, pour le rétablissement de la religion et la restitution des biens de l'Eglise, en la vallée de Pragela. (A large manuscript volume. Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

² Sommaire de l'état de la religion dans la vallée de Pragela, 4to, p. 3.—The name of this prior was Orcillet. (See an autograph letter of Verthamont, dated 29th April, 1629, to M. Orcillet, prior of Mentoules, giving directions concerning his re-installation. Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

³ Of 11th March, 1629.

Longer resistance became impossible. The valleys surrendered, on condition that they should never be required to bear arms against the Duke of Savoy, and that the free exercise of their religion should be guaranteed to them. The Marshal De Schoenberg accepted these conditions. Deputies from each Vaudois commune then repaired to Pignerol,¹ to take the oath of fidelity to the King of France.

New detachments of French troops arrived daily. The country was exhausted. It was desolated, at the same time, by pestilence, famine, and war. These evils, instead of being mitigated, went on increasing in intensity. The presence of the troops aggravated the scarcity and high price of provisions. Louis XIII., who had come to Lyons in the month of May, passed from thence into Savoy, which was subjugated in a short time. In the month of July the Duke De Montmorency seized the marquisate of Saluces. Almost the whole of Piedmont then came under the dominion of France, and the siege of Casal, the first source of so many troubles, was raised by the Spaniards on the 26th of October, because of the victories which had been won by the French arms.²

Charles Emmanuel died of grief,³ and his son, Victor Amadeus, entered into a treaty of peace at Ratisbon, on the 13th of October. By this treaty, he recovered possession of his dominions, and obtained some places of little importance in Montferrat. The valley of the Cluson, with that of the Upper Doire and the city of Pignerol, remained in the hands of France.⁴ The Vaudois in these districts were then able to take advantage, for the celebration of their worship, of the edicts which governed the Reformed Church of France. They were entitled to do so, in virtue of a treaty of the 12th of April, 1630;⁵ but the city of Pignerol petitioned that Protestant worship should be interdicted throughout its whole territory,⁶ and this prohibition was granted.

¹ On 5th April, 1630.

² In virtue of the treaty of Ratisbon, which had been signed on the 13th, and by which France and the German empire maintained the Duke of Nevers in possession of the duchy of Mantua.

³ On 26th July, 1630.

⁴ The principal points of this treaty were fixed on the 31st of March, 1630; it was modified by that of Queyrasque, on the 6th of April, and confirmed at the peace of Munster, in 1648. The valleys of Lucerna, Angrogna, and St. Martin remained under the government of France till the 8th of September, 1631. (Compare L'Art de vérifier les dates, edition of 1770, p. 841, col. 2, with Gilles, ch. lix., p. 517.)

⁵ This treaty is quoted in a decree of the Royal Council of Pignerol, of 24th April, 1654. (Civil Archives of Pignerol, category xxv., fasciculus i., No. 7.)

⁶ This petition is dated 5th June, 1630. It includes also a prayer that the abbey of Pignerol should be erected into a bishopric. Louis XIII. promised to employ his influence for this purpose with the pope. (Same source, categ. xxv., fascic. i., No. 5.)

However, almost all of the priests who had been settled in the valley of Pragela in 1629, and of the Capuchin missionaries who had gone thither to labour for the conversion of the heretics, died or fled during the plague of 1630. The prior of Mentoules alone remained. New conversions were attempted without success. The number of the Vandois, instead of diminishing, increased every day. Louis XIII. granted them a confirmation of their ancient privileges.¹ By their agricultural labours, their manufacturing industry, and the purchases which they made, they extended continually the bounds of their habitation in the country. They wished to open new places of worship; but the intendant Destempes opposed it,² and decided that there should be no innovation in that particular.

This very circumstance drew public attention to the fact of their having extended so much. Their enemies loudly complained of these encroachments; the clergy stirred up the magistrates to act; and his majesty's procurator-general informed the sovereign council, established at Pignerol, that numbers of the Protestants of the Val Pérouse had settled beyond the limits within which alone they had permission to celebrate their worship. In consequence, the council, by its decree of 17th July, 1645,³ renewed the arbitrary prohibition against the Vaudois opening schools or places of worship, preaching, or even declaring their doctrines without these ancient limits. It prohibited also all foreign Protestants from settling in the country, under pain of confiscation of all their goods, and of a fine of 1000 livres, to be exacted from the commune which might permit any such person to settle, without giving notice at the office of the registrar of the court of justice at Pignerol. Finally, Protestants were interdicted from exercising the functions of any public office; from buying or renting any land without their limits; from working on Catholic festival-days; from dissuading those of their own number who might have manifested an intention of becoming Catholics; from selling or buying any Protestant religious book; and from holding municipal assemblies without the presence of the judge of the place, under a penalty of a fine of 200 livres for every one who should have been present thereat.

The same edict contained also a prohibition addressed to the Catholics. It forbade them⁴ to contribute in any way for the

¹ On 6th June, 1630. Léger, part ii., pp. 161, 162.

² By decree of 10th July, 1645, quoted in the document contained in the Civil Archives of Pignerol, categ. xxv., mazzo i., No. 7.

³ Same source, categ. xxv., mazzo ii., No. 1.

⁴ By article 10.

maintenance of Protestant places of worship or Protestant pastors, under penalty of a fine of fifty livres for each contravention. It may be easily conceived that this last clause was one of those which were most exactly observed; but it proves, nevertheless, that the habits of the country had been imbued with that spirit of fraternity of which we see the manifestations continually appearing around the Vaudois, and the influence of which extended to the adherents of another religion.

The Vaudois, finding themselves injured by these numerous restrictions, pleaded the rights which they had enjoyed under the dukes of Savoy, all whose edicts were maintained in force by the decree of 17th July;¹ and upon their petition, the sovereign council declared that it had "no design to innovate, nor to alter anything as to the rights, state, and condition in which the petitioners were under the government of the dukes of Savoy."² But the Edict of Nantes had granted to the Protestants the free exercise of their worship, and admission into all offices of law and finance. The Vaudois of Pragela then formed part of the people of France; they demanded that the benefits of that edict should be extended to them, which was granted them by decisions of the council of 10th March and 19th August, 1648.³

Under this milder legislation the number and prosperity of the Vaudois of Pragela rapidly increased. The attempts of Louis XIII. to re-establish Catholicism in their country had produced only a momentary effect. The churches which he had founded in 1622 remained empty and closed; the priests' houses, in which resided a solitary priest without a flock, were ere long themselves deserted, the plague of 1630 having slain or banished their useless inhabitants. Successors were not appointed to these ecclesiastics.⁴ In various places the municipal body employed the vacant edifices for other purposes. At Les Traverses the Catholic chapel fell into ruins, and the Vaudois took away the materials of it to construct a place of worship. This was made a crime. They were accused of trespass, robbery, rebellion, and sacrilege. Lesdiguères interposed, in his capacity of governor of Dauphiny, and decided that they

¹ Document above mentioned. Civil Archives of Pignerol, categ. xxv., fasciculus ii., No. 1, article xi.

² These are the terms of the decree. Same source, fasciculus ii., No. 2. The decision of the council is of 23d October, 1645.

³ Quoted in the decree of 24th April, 1645. (Civil Archives of Pignerol, categ. xxv., mazzo i., No. 7.)

⁴ "From 1629 to 1646, the prior of Mentoules was the only priest in the valley." (Memoire touchant l'établissement, les progrès et la cessation de la religion protestante en Pragela. MS. of the Royal Library at Turin.)

should pay towards the building of a new place of worship the price of the materials which they had taken from the old one.¹

The Catholics, to whom Lesdiguières went over in his old age, cannot have regarded with much gratitude his interference in this case; for, a few years after, the city of Pignerol, wishing again to drive away the Vaudois from its territory, to which their increasing prosperity still brought them nearer, addressed a petition to Louis XIV., in which the subscribers, after having declared against the religious liberty claimed by the Protestants of Pêrouse and Pragela, expressed themselves as follows: "The treaty by which it was secured to them was made in January, 1593, by Lesdiguières, with arms in his hand. It is true that it was afterwards confirmed in general terms. But considering that this treaty does not deserve much consideration, because that general then professed the reformed religion, and that the king, Henry IV., was obliged to bring back his subjects by all possible means; . . . also that this treaty has been tacitly revoked by the Edict of Nantes, which authorizes Protestant worship only in the places where it was celebrated before that period, and that the Vaudois of Pêrouse cannot prove that they enjoyed the free exercise of their religion under the dukes of Savoy, . . . we pray that his majesty may formally prohibit this worship in the whole territory of Pignerol."²

This petition was granted. Louis XIV., who was then scarcely seventeen years of age, and had not yet been crowned with the solemnities long usual for the kings of France,³ began to gratify the Church of Rome in regard to its exclusive claims, according to that instinct of despotism which was common to that church and himself. The proselytizing ambition of the monks and Jesuits awakened anew beneath the rays of this sun of tyranny, unequalled

¹ Letter of Lesdiguières to the châtelains and consuls of Pragela. Dated from Grenoble, 13th March, 1650. (Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.) This letter was from the Duke De Lesdiguières, and not from the constable, for the latter died in 1620. The duke is mentioned as governor of Dauphiny in a letter of Louis XIV. to Cromwell, of 26th May, 1655. (Léger, p. 227.)

² This document is of date April, 1654. Louis XIV. granted what was petitioned for on the 24th of the same month; his reply was recorded by the council royal of Pignerol on 4th August, and on the same day the order was published prohibiting the Vaudois from the public exercise of their religion in the territory of Pignerol. (These documents are in the archives of that city, categ. xxv., fascic. i., No. 7, and fascic. ii., No. 3.)

³ His coronation took place at Reims, 7th June, 1654. The medal struck upon occasion of this event gives the date as the 3d; but an unforeseen circumstance compelled the postponement of the ceremony for four days. Louis XIV. was born on the 5th of September, 1638; he succeeded to the crown on 14th May, 1643; was declared major by the Parliament of Paris, 7th September, 1651; and on 9th June, 1660, married the infanta Maria Theresa. (L'Art de vérifier les dates.)

in the world, as the device of the great king proclaimed.¹ These attempts at conversion were at first more vexatious than formidable to the Vaudois, and the clergy found them more productive of trouble than of fruit.² But more active measures were in preparation. The Propaganda was formed, and circumstances ominous of the Piedmontese Easter began to appear.

After that terrible explosion of a rampant and pitiless fanaticism—that festival of blood and storm of death—the fugitive victims of the massacres of 1655 hastened to seek refuge among their brethren of the valleys of the Cluson and of Pragela. The latter, also, took up arms to defend them.³ “For two or three days,” says Léger,⁴ “I could not find out what had become of my wife and children—whether they were dead or alive, or whether they were prisoners or not. At last I found them in the valley of Pérouse, within the king’s dominions, and, as may readily be imagined, in a deplorable condition. As moderator of the Vaudois churches, I set myself to gather together their remains.” He convoked a synod between the valleys of the Doire and Pragela, at the hamlet of La Chapelle, where the pastors and elders of all that ravaged country assembled. “There,” says he, “after having consoled and encouraged them as much as a mind agitated and excited to the last degree was capable of doing, I entreated them, with all the arguments which I thought likely to produce any effect upon them, no longer to think of dispersing themselves in foreign countries, as they were urged to do by Francis Guérin, minister of Le Roure, in the Val Cluson, who boldly prophesied to them that in no way whatever could they ever return to their own country, the time being come when its *candlestick*⁵ must be removed. I called them to consider that our conduct towards the Duke of Savoy could be clearly justified, and that the barbarities exercised against us would make heaven and earth our defenders. Whereupon almost all those that had escaped remained in the valley of Pragela or of the Cluson, or in that of Queyras, and in the part of the Val Pérouse which belonged to France.”

There it was that, in two days, this zealous defender of the valleys composed his first manifesto, to make known to the world the

¹ A sun: motto, Nec pluribus impar.

² See Breve relazione degli eretici, convertiti dai Padri Missionarii Torino, 1648.

³ Manuscript in the Archives of the Court at Turin, entitled, Fatti, attioni e cose occorsi nelle valle di Luserna, nel 1655: ouero storia della ribellione degl' eretici. Near the end.

⁴ In his autobiography, placed at the end of his work, p. 365.

⁵ The seal of the Vaudois churches bears a candlestick surrounded with stars.

inconceivable cruelties which had been perpetrated against the Vaudois. The world listened to his voice, and Louis XIV. himself did not venture to refuse to join with almost all the potentates of Europe in urging the Duke of Savoy to obliterate the traces of these atrocious desolations.¹ The governor of Dauphiny was instructed to receive the proscribed fugitives with humanity, and to provide for their most pressing wants. But it was from their brethren of Pragela especially that they received shelter, aid, and protection.

The latter, however, were themselves subjected to trials. The council of Pignerol, not contented with having obtained the prohibition of their worship throughout all its territory, endeavoured to put impediments in the way of their commerce, and succeeded in getting them prohibited from remaining for more than three days in the city.² It may readily be imagined what vexatious questions must have arisen from this regulation.³ Soon afterwards the notaries of Pignerol, and of all the French possessions beyond the Alps, were forbidden to admit any sale, purchase, or inheritance, from a Catholic in favour of a Protestant.⁴

These were not the only vexations of which the Vaudois had to complain.⁵ The syndics of Pignerol enjoined the religionaries settled in that city to withdraw from it within the space of eight days, and the Catholics, with whom they had relations, to break off all connection with them.⁶ Moreover, a Jesuit mission was established at Fenestrelle, and Louis XIV. forbade,⁷ under severe penalties, the dissuading of any one whatever from an intended conversion.⁸ The task of the pastors and zealous Christians of Pragela became more and more difficult. But they proved equal

¹ See the letters of Louis XIV. to Cromwell; Léger, p. 226; Hahn, p. 756; Jones, ii. 345. The same authors have published the greater part of the letters addressed with this view to Charles Emmanuel II.

² The council's petition is of the 15th November, 1657; the king's edict granting it is of the 22d. These documents are in the Civil Archives of Pignerol, category xxv., fasciculus i., No. 8.

³ There are also in the Civil Archives of Pignerol inhibitions, of date 8th April, 1658, made by an officer to the merchants and innkeepers of Pignerol, forbidding them to receive, lodge, or contract society with any of the Protestant Reformed religion.

⁴ Same source, category xxv., mazzo i., No. 9.

⁵ On this subject there is in the Archives of the Court at Turin a testimoniale of 23d May, 1658, and a petition of 14th June, 1658, in which the Vaudois complain of the molestations to which they are subjected. (Nos. of Series 306 and 307.)

⁶ Papers of 3d, 4th, and 11th January, 1659. (Archives of Pignerol, categ. xxv., fasciculus i., No. 10.)—"Considering," it is there said, "that certain bad citizens support them in this city," &c. . . .

⁷ On 18th September, 1659.

⁸ Réflexions sur l'escrit intitulé: Observations sur un manuscrit, &c. . . . composé par les ministres du Briançonnais et Pignerol. (A 4to MS. of 31 pages, in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

to it, and the efforts of their adversaries served only to increase the fervour and the union of these persecuted churches. More and still more violent measures proved requisite for their destruction, and it was not till after a long series of severities, and much employment of brute force, that the Church of Rome could congratulate itself on having annihilated them. It never otherwise prevailed over them. Of these events, combining much that is noble with their mournfulness, an outline must now be given.

CHAPTER XV.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.

FIFTH PERIOD.—FROM THE INTRODUCTION OF THE JESUITS TO THE DEMOLITION OF THE PROTESTANT PLACES OF WORSHIP IN PRAGELA.

(A.D. 1656 TO A.D. 1685.)

Jesuit missionaries in Pragela—Controversies—Odious means employed to secure the success of the Jesuit missions—Apostasy and subsequent melancholy history of Captain Guyot—Bribes and every kind of influence used to procure abjurations—Dragonnades—New restrictions imposed upon the Vaudois—Increasing hardships—Strange quotations from documents of the time, illustrative of the character of its events and parties—Settlement of six priests in the parishes of Pragela in 1678—The utmost fervour of proselytism—The exercise of the Protestant religion prohibited in Pragela five months before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes—Demolition of places of worship—Extensive emigration.

It was in 1657 that the Jesuit missionaries established themselves for the first time in the valley of Pragela.¹ They were sent by the Prince of Conti,² upon the solicitations of the Propaganda.³ They came from the house of their order established at Grenoble, and fixed their head-quarters at Fenestrelle,¹ where a Vaudois pastor resided, named Benjamin De Joux, who entered into controversy with them.² The result does not seem to have been favourable to them, for in the space of eight months they obtained no more than two converts.³ It is true that the first of these monks who appeared there went to work with more frankness than address—a mode of procedure so alien to the spirit of their order, that their superiors could not be expected to maintain them long at that post. And, indeed, we read that “the Jesuit Billet, to defend the authority of the Church, thought fit to assert the imperfection of the Scriptures, upon which account he was found to be impolitic, and was recalled.”⁴

¹ Sommaire de l'état de la religion en Pragela, p. 4.—Mémoire sur l'établissement, les progrès et la cessation de la religion réformée en Pragela, say 1656.

² Arnaud de Bourbon, Prince of Condé, second son of Henry II., took his name of Conti from a small town of the Somme; he was the chief of the Fronde. He afterwards married the niece of Mazarin; he was grand-master of the king's household in 1657, was appointed governor of Languedoc in 1662, and died four years after.

³ For particulars concerning the congregation de propaganda fide et extirpandis hæreticis, see Chapter VI. of Part Second of this Work.

These Jesuits, however, had been preceded in that country by other controversialists,⁵ to whom a pastor of Pragela had already replied.⁶ The dedication of his work contains some affecting sentences, which it may not be uninteresting to quote:—“To the members of the Reformed Churches of the valley of Pragela, and to all those who love the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, grace and peace be multiplied to you!” Then, setting forth the motives of his work, and the method which he has pursued, he says—“I have not thought proper to fling back at the Romish Church the sharp darts which my adversary directs against ours, . . . knowing that it is necessary to make the approaches with delicacy, and not to give any shock to the blind, and to instruct with meekness those who

¹ The first who made their appearance “were the Sieurs Golier and Billet; afterwards the Jesuit Calemart was sent thither, with a novice; and subsequently he had for his companion the Jesuit Sieur Paiseaud; with whom finally the Jesuit Carbonnet was conjoined, to succeed Sieur Calemart, who was sent to Die.” (Le succès de la mission de Pragela. . . Geneva, published by Gamont, 1660, an 8vo of 248 pages.—Advertisement au lecteur.)

² These controversies took place at Fenestrelle, on the 2d of October, 1659, and were published in the work already quoted. . . . Véritable récit de la conférence tenue à Fenestrelles, &c. . . . The Jesuit Calemart published at Grenoble (Verdier, publisher), in 1660, two little works on the same subject:—1. Réfutation de la réponse de M. de Joux. . . . 2. Deux marques de l'erreur du calvinisme, &c. . . .

³ “The first, named Jourdan, was appointed Captain Châtelain of the whole valley. The second,” says a work of that period, “is Captain Guyot, who has carried arms in favour of the religionaries in the valley of Lucerna, and there rendered himself so redoubtable, that a price was set upon his head. He now testifies no less zeal for the faith than he once showed for error.” (Sommaire de l'état de la religion en Pragela, pp. 4 and 5.)—This Claud Guyot, vulgarly called Croyat, finished his course by suicide.

⁴ Le succès de la mission en Pragela, . . . p. 5 of the preface.

⁵ Amongst others, by a former Protestant minister, named John Baleet, who had plunged into Arminianism, and thence into Catholicism. He entered into orders, became a priest, and wrote a polemical work, entitled Diurnal de la vraie Eglise.

⁶ Le Manuel du vray chrestien, opposé au Diurnal du Sieur Baleet. . . par Daniel Pastor. . . Geneva, 1652. One vol. 8vo, of xvi., 915, and xii. pages.

are of a contrary opinion. But I have thought it good, O dearest souls, to address this reply to you . . . because I was born and brought up amongst you; because I have had the honour to exercise amongst you the ministry of the holy gospel, now almost for thirty years; because my age and strength are declining, and the time of my departure draws nigh. I have therefore thought this my work to be due to you, it being reasonable that I should leave you, after my death, a specimen of that doctrine which I have proclaimed to you during my life." . . . "In this faith I have lived, and in this faith I desire to die. . . . May God preserve you in it for his glory, and for the salvation of your immortal souls."¹ His prayer was heard, for very few of his contemporaries yielded to the efforts of popish proselytism.

The valley of Pragela was then, from the one end to the other, inhabited by zealous Protestants. "These heretics," said their adversaries, "have ten or twelve great places of worship for Sabbath, and more than sixty small ones, where they meet every day of the week, whilst the Catholics have scarcely a single church,² and a few chapels, at great distances from one another."³ The Jesuits were also regarded with great dislike there. "The hostility to them is so excessive," says a contemporary, "that nobody ventures to lodge them; and if the prior of Mentoules and Captain Guyot had not given them shelter, they would not have found it in all the valley."⁴ "However," he adds, "they ought to persevere; for experience has shown that missions which are not kept up for any time, serve only to provoke irritation, without dissipating error."⁵

Considering that in the eyes of sincere Catholics this work was analogous to that which evangelical missionaries carry on amongst savages, we cannot refuse to recognize, in not a few of those who were concerned in it, the solicitude and the language of genuine charity. We may, no doubt, pronounce it ill-enlightened, but we must not call in question its reality. "Surely," says, for example, the author of the pamphlet just quoted, "it would be a just subject of reproach to us if those who have undertaken to assist the Persians and the Chinese⁶ were to abandon this poor valley. The people of Pragela are our brethren, Frenchmen like ourselves, and subjects of the same sovereign; and although erring in many points

¹ This interesting epistle is dated from La Souchière (in Pragela), 1st June, 1651.

² That of Mentoules.

³ Procès-verbaux des conversions opérées en Pragela, de 1676 à 1685. A number of MS. volumes, deposited in the Archives of the Bishopric of Fignerol. The passage quoted is under date 13th July, 1676.

⁴ Sommaire de l'état de la religion dans la vallée de Pragela, p. 6. ⁵ Id. p. 7.

⁶ Catholic missionaries had recently been sent to these distant nations.

of religion, yet they have been washed in the waters of baptism. They profess to serve the same God and the same Saviour. Francis De Sales converted the people of Thonon; why should not we hope for a similar favour for those of Pragela, if we resolve to help them, as we ought? Their conversion would even facilitate that of the valleys of Lucerna and Angrogna."¹ In conclusion, he entreats all Christians to unite their alms and prayers in order to the attainment of this pious object.

But if such were the desires, the language, and the sentiments of the compassionate souls, of whom Popery may reasonably be proud, it must, on the other hand, be borne in mind that they were imposed upon by their spiritual directors, and that both the leaders and the active agents in these works of intolerance employed the most shameful means in order to secure their success. The following extract will show in what manner they themselves state these means, in a confidential report addressed to the authorities:—

"It is urgently necessary to obtain a *pariat*² for the apprehension of three ministers of Pragela,³ whom the Parliament of Grenoble has condemned to imprisonment.⁴ They have taken refuge in the valley of Lucerna, with two other criminals.⁵ It will be requisite that the Marquis De Pianesse⁶ command the governors of Lucerna and St. Martin to seize them, . . . in the same way as Monseigneur De Mestié, some years since, seized . . . certain robbers, who were punished according to their crimes.⁷ It will be requisite that the people of Lucerna be forbidden to lodge the merchants of Pragela who traffic in these regions. There are three heretics who traffic at Turin;⁸ it will be requisite to seize their wares, and as they cannot subsist without them, it may be taken for granted that they will then be ready to change their religion."⁹

¹ Sommaire de l'état de la religion dans la vallée de Pragela, en Dauphiné, et des dispositions de la Providence pour la conversion de ses habitants. Concluding passage.

² A lettre de cachet, or order of incarceration for life.

³ James Papon, Benjamin de Joux, and Michael Bourset.

⁴ For having preached in their annexed churches, contrary to the edicts of 20th June, 1636, and 21st April, 1637, which prohibited the pastors from preaching anywhere but at the place of their residence. It was in consequence of these edicts that there was established, in every village of Pragela, a prayer-meeting, which assembled every day, and was conducted by the elders of the place.

⁵ These criminals were guilty of having presided in religious meetings. The one was John Jourdan, consul of Fenestrelle; the other John Passet, a rich merchant of Montonles.

⁶ Vice-President of the Council of the Propaganda.

⁷ To cause ministers and respectable men to be seized like robbers, for no other offence than that of having prayed to God! What a delicate method of conversion, and how accordant with Christian charity!

⁸ The report gives their names and address. "They are lodged," it says, "at the Red Horse."

⁹ These are the exact words. What a system of conversion! and what value

It will be requisite that the governor of Suza, Méane, and J alas, prohibit the heretics of Pragela from remaining in the places within his jurisdictions, because they preach their errors in secret. It will be requisite to expel from the valley of Lucerna a person named Martin, a native of Balboutet, in Pragela. This young minister has succeeded the pastor Léger, whose house was razed to the ground; but he is not less seditious¹ than Léger, and does still more harm than he. It will be necessary to apprise the King of France that the governor's secretary, and a captain of the citadel of Pignerol, conduct religious exercises in their chambers, in which they assemble the Huguenot soldiers, which may be the means of perverting Catholics."²

There is also a proposal made in this paper, of prohibiting the Vaudois of Pragela from trading and sojourning in Piedmont, although that privilege had been formally guaranteed to them.³ The memoir terminates by denunciations of various persons, and even of Catholics, who are pointed out as proper objects of suspicion, because of their being too favourable to the Protestants. Such is party spirit; always extravagant, and frequently hurrying the members of every party into grievous excesses.

It may be supposed that a blessing did not attend conversions obtained by such means. The first, which we have already mentioned, that of Captain Guyot, was a melancholy illustration. This unfortunate man, a short time after his abjuration, was seized with insanity. He committed a murder without any motive, after which he set fire to his own house, and burned himself to death in it.⁴

But promises, rewards, and unworthy arts of every description, the success of which always depends upon the baseness of both the parties concerned, were in the greatest favour in the system of the could conversions have which were thus obtained? How must those sincere and charitable persons who, in their simplicity, interested themselves in this work of proselytism, have felt ashamed to see their religion dishonour itself by the employment of such disgraceful means!

¹ Vague accusations here supply the place of positive facts: in the minds of prejudiced persons such accusations are sometimes all the more effectual for not being limited by any fact.

² The persons to whom this relates are named in the original. Their religious exercises were limited to the reading of the Bible and prayer. (This paper is entitled: Mémoire en faveur de la mission en Pragela, and is to be found in the Archives of the Court at Turin. No. of series, 425.)

³ By the edict of 6th June, 1630. (Leger, II. 161.)—Many other rights, purchased by them, or secured by law, were, in like manner, denied to them. A petition of the Vaudois of Moulières, Sauze, and Rolières, in 1669, sets forth that there are two burying grounds in the commune, and asks for permission to make use of one of them. It was refused. (Civil Archives of Pignerol.)

⁴ Le succès de la mission de Pragela . . . par Benjamin de Joux, ministre à Fenestrelles—in the preface.

propagandists. These means were employed in a degree proportionate, it may be said, to that of sin in human nature. From the châtelain of the valley to the herdsman of the mountains, every one had to contend with the demon of covetousness, and many fell in the contest. Under the pressure of dragonnades, and in the absence of their pastors, who were imprisoned or fugitive, little was requisite to induce these poor people to accept, out of weakness or terror, the rewards of apostasy. "A great number of conversions have been effected in the valleys of Pragela," says Pélisson,¹ "through the efforts of the Bishop of Grenoble, of the Propaganda, and of the Jesuits; so that without the distribution of more than about 2000 crowns, sent at different times, well certified lists have been received of from 700 to 800 persons who have returned to the church." "I have written," he adds, "that no opportunity should be allowed to escape of the conversion of the families of the people.

. . . I have even signified that they may go as far as 100 francs."² What a shameful traffic in things the least capable of being appreciated at a price in money! Or rather, convictions, conscience, Divine grace, and all that is incapable of such valuation was venal with Rome; and yet everything of the kind is really wanting in all such transactions. It remains to be added, in order to exonerate the Vaudois from a part, at least, of these venal apostasies, that a great number of vagabonds, strangers to their valleys, passed themselves off for Protestants, in order to obtain the price of a sham abjuration for lucre's sake. The price for such baseness was too high.

These means, however, very soon proved insufficient, and then it was that a new influence was brought to bear in support of the Catholic religion—the oppression exercised by the dragoons, who were quartered in the houses of the poor people professing the evangelical faith, in order to compel the payment of contributions. "The Protestants," wrote the superior of the Jesuits established at Fenestrelle, "were completely humbled at the sight of so many troops. They then laid aside that spirit of pride and independence³ in which they had hitherto lived; and instead of despising the missionaries, as they had been accustomed to do, they began to implore their protection against the insolence of the soldiers. This humiliation of the heretics has not a little served to promote the conversion of numbers, of whom we will make mention in this list." "As, after Briançon, the town of Sézane had suffered more than any from the passage of the troops, one of the missionary fathers proposed to go thither to perform some duties of the mission. The inhabitants had previously expressed to the abbot of Oulx their wish that he would send them no preacher during Lent, and that they might not be confessed any more; but now they blessed God for having brought to them a confessor who did not close the gates of heaven against them."¹

¹ A Report, dated Versailles, 12th June, 1677. Pélisson Fontanier had been himself a Protestant, and after having embraced Catholicism, he displayed much activity in endeavouring to bring about the conversion of his former brethren to the Church of Rome.

² Quoted in La politique du clergé de France, avec les derniers efforts de l'innocence affligée. . . . Amsterdam, 16-2. (One vol. 32mo.) Pp. 152, 153.

³ Libertinage; spirit of liberty, independence.

Since it was first founded, indeed, the missionary establishment had been very much strengthened. The office of châtelain of the valley of the Cluson having become vacant, the Prince of Conti caused it to be purchased,² and placed in it a fervent supporter of the missionaries. "Without this help," says a writer of the time, "they could have done nothing; and the manner in which this office is now filled is the foundation of almost all the good which can be hoped for in that region."³ To promote this work, by augmenting the number of the propagandists, Alexander VII. accorded⁴ plenary indulgences to both male and female members⁵ who might enter into that congregation.⁶

At the same time, the prohibition was renewed, which had been already addressed to the Vaudois pastors, of celebrating any religious service except at the place of their residence.⁷ But this was not enough: the members of the Vaudois Church had formed daily meetings in the smallest hamlets; and wherever there was an elder, a new place of worship was opened. These meetings were conducted by laymen, who, indeed, themselves became pastors. Instead of ten or twelve places of worship, there were now sixty. Every morning and evening, the distant bells of these rustic villages, concealed amongst the mountains, might be heard calling the faithful to prayer and thanksgiving. The use of bells was now pro-

¹ Procès-verbaux des conversions opérées en Pragela (in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol); eighth list, dated 3d August, 1680. Signed Etienne Nith, lui-même.

² At the price of 8300 livres. This was an office which, like many others, civil and judicial, could be bought or sold for money. The name of the new châtelain was M. Bertrand.

³ Etat de la religion en Pragela, p. 6.

⁴ By his brief of 27th July, 1661.

⁵ Confrères et Confrèrèsses.

⁶ Journal des conversions qui ont été faites, et des grâces dont Dieu a favorisé la compagnie de la propagande établie à Grenoble, durant le cours de l'année 1661. (A 4to MS. of 60 pages, relating especially to the valley of Pragela. In the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

⁷ Decree of the Parliament of Dauphiny, of 23th January, 1662. The same prohibition had already been renewed on 19th July and 30th September, 1661. The edict now issued adds a threatening of the penalty of 1000 livres of fine.

hibited.¹ The shepherds' horns, the trumpets which they were accustomed to sound for their flocks, were therefore employed, instead of the bells, to proclaim the hour of these holy assemblies. Severe penalties were forthwith denounced against those who conducted them. What were the Christians now to do? Assembled in silence, they read the Bible, time about, in a low voice, they prayed one after another, and none of them, in particular, was charged with the duty of conducting these pious and unpretending exercises. The Spirit of God alone directed these meetings.

"This race is incorrigible!" said the missionaries: "there is no moving them. We must direct our efforts to the rising generation." And they began by prohibiting Protestants from taking pupils for board and education,² and it was next proposed to prohibit them from bringing up their own children. "We have just gained a victory in the valley of Pérouse," exclaims one of the Jesuits; "for in the beginning of the month of October last (1677), we obtained the adoption of the rule that all children, born of Huguenot mothers and Catholic fathers, should be baptized in the church and brought up Catholics."³

The most trifling pretexts were also seized with eagerness, to cause the Vandois to enter, freely or by force, within the pale of Catholicism. The documents which I have quoted, exhibit many a painful and affecting scene, and contain many a strange expression, the evidence of truth. In one place, we read of a priest who drives away from the bedside of an old man, the members of his own family, and does not leave him till he has expired.⁴ In another, we read of a mother who rushes after those that are carrying away her child from her, in order to rescue it from their hands, "heresy makes women so obstinate and furious!"⁵ In another place still, we are told of a man who wished to conceal from his wife the abjuration which he had just made, because she was far advanced in pregnancy, and he was afraid that this news might trouble her so much as to do her injury—"so much fruit do these conversions produce in families," the missionaries observe!⁶

¹ By decree of 23th January, 1662.

Same decree.

³ Procès-verbaux des conversions de Pragela, at the date mentioned in the text. The following are a few lines immediately following this passage:—"The wife of a new convert of Diblon was delivered of a daughter, and was urgent that the child should be baptized at the preaching, according to custom. The Huguenot party had obtained the consent of some magistrates to the observance of this usage. But the Marquis D'Harleville, to whom the priest of the parish represented the disagreeable consequences of this custom, ordained that, according to the intentions of his Majesty, the girl should be baptized in the church, which was done."

⁴ Same papers. Paper dated 6th September, 1677.

⁵ Paper dated 12th May, 1677.

⁶ Paper dated 1st May, 1679.

And certainly there did result from them great troubles in families. We read as follows, regarding the conversion of a man of very great importance, for he has large possessions:—"He felt strange inward pain; he even wept for an hour; and he was heard to say, in the midst of his sobs, that he would go and dispute the question with his relatives. . . . But, notwithstanding all this, he has abjured, and presented his children to the church."¹ Had the children been abandoned, the Vaudois would have cared for them. In such a case, however, advantage was taken of their generous solicitude, to institute a prosecution against them. "Stephen Pascal," say our reports, "is an old Catholic,² married to a Huguenot woman. Being obliged to go to the valley of Barcelona, he remained there for three years. On his return, he was much surprised to learn that the Huguenots had taken charge of his children; and he hastened first to Briançon, in order that he might obtain the assistance of the strong arm of the law to put an end to this disorder."³

This simplicity of expression, which indicates the good faith of the converters, even in acts which seem most repugnant to the spirit of Christianity, is strikingly significant of the character of their work. I must give one other example. There were complaints of drought, and, on the very day when the mission was ended, it rained. "From which the fathers took occasion to point out the agreeable arrangements⁴ of Providence with regard to themselves."

Severe measures were adopted, in particular, against any who relapsed. Madeleine Justet, say the Jesuits, had promised to attend mass, but she returned to the preachings. This was a case of relapse. "She could neither be moved by prayers nor by threats, until the Marquis D'Harleville caused her to be apprehended by one of his guards and carried to his house, to condemn her to the punishment decreed against relapsed persons."⁵

With the object of subduing timorous minds by the example of such severities, the secular arm was often called to execute them. John Allais having left his country to return to the Protestant Church, a decree was issued for his arrest. "This execution of the

¹ Paper of 21st November, 1677.

² i.e., not a new convert.

³ Paper of 26th March, 1677. The whole of what is within inverted commas is exactly quoted, as well as the part in italics.

⁴ Preliminary observations, inserted before the papers of the month of June, 1679.

⁵ Paper of 14th September, 1676. This penalty was, according to the case, to have the head shaved, to endure a shameful whipping, which was sometimes mortal; to be marked with a red-hot iron, or to be sent to the galleys, &c.—Madeleine escaped from her persecutors, and retired to the valley of Lucerna.

law," say the missionaries, "has succeeded extremely well. The people of this country are greatly afraid of the law. Their resistance¹ will very soon cease, if the law is often executed in the same manner. Nothing can exceed the insolence and fiery passion of the heretics of Pragela; but nothing can exceed their pliancy when they dread the costs of law or corporal punishments."² Afterwards, it is said concerning a new convert, "This man has given himself to the church, in consequence of a number of arrests, which frightened him very much."³

There were, however, we may believe, a few of these abjurations which resulted from sincere convictions. "It has not been till after many combats," we are told concerning Joseph Guériu, "that this young man has yielded."⁴ Sometimes, indeed, the exaggeration of Protestant doctrines interfered with their truth. "What think you of the worship of the saints?" was a question asked by the pastor of Villaret of one of his flock, at a district examination. "I think," was the reply, "that the saints are no better than those who adore them." The minister was satisfied, say our annalists; but unquestionably this opinion was too extreme; for the worthy and pious confessors of Christ, whose holiness was the glory of the primitive church, were certainly much better than the ignorant and superstitious men who afterwards made them the objects of worship. This reflection occurred to the catechumen; and its influence, according to the report of his abjuration, afterwards decided him to enter the Church of Rome.⁵ So true it is that justice is requisite, even to the triumph of truth.⁶

At other times, and more frequently, the converters found opportunity of working upon the ignorance of the persons converted. It is impossible to read without a smile, that a neophyte, named David Bertoch, exhibited, according to the expressions of the report, "an extraordinary rage, when he was told that he would not be rebaptized, and that it was not necessary for him to be an idolator."⁷

The Jesuits attached an especial importance to the abjuration of any one belonging to the family of a pastor;⁸ and the decision of the persons converted was often influenced by very secondary

¹ In the original MS., violence.

² I leave the Jesuits responsible for this opinion, expressed by them.

³ Paper of 27th October, 1676.

⁴ Papers of 28th October to 1st November, 1676.

⁵ Paper of 26th April, 1679.

⁶ [It is surely fair to notice also the authority upon which the story rests.—TR.]

⁷ Paper of 21st August, 1676.

⁸ See the paper of 23d December, 1677, part of which relates to a woman whose grandfather was minister at Anyrogna; that of 13th November, 1679, &c.

motives. One became a Catholic because he had debts;¹ another, because he had a disagreement with his pastor;² a third, because he was afraid of being hard pressed by his creditors;³ and the missionaries do not hesitate to avow, in plain terms, that they would have had incomparably more success if they had had more money at their disposal.⁴ At other times they attribute their success to extraordinary influences, the co-operation of which we could not have expected that any religious would have accepted. "Daniel Luyx," their reports inform us,⁵ "was a native of Geneva, and had to make a journey in Piedmont. Being on the bank of a river, the devil came and placed himself before him. Believing that it was a robber, M. Luyx fired a pistol at him, but the devil flung him into the river, wounding him with a poignard, which he had taken to defend himself." The precaution was not unnecessary, for the traveller's companions hastened to draw him out of the water, and conveyed him to a hostelry. There the devil still came to torment the sufferer. He appeared to him, induced him to rise, conducted him to the window, showed him a vast gallery, and, under pretext of taking him into it, flung him into the street, from the height of the third story. "His royal highness passing by," says the author of this narrative, "and seeing the crowd which came together, learned, by chance, this strange adventure." Finally, as may be foreseen from the commencement of the history, M. Luyx received the attentions of a priest, and became a convert.

The puerility of such tales seems to render them unworthy of notice in history; but they show the state of men's minds at that period better than it could be shown by any general statements of the historian. Being obliged to keep within narrow bounds, I have thought it proper to quote, as far as possible, exact passages from the unpublished documents of which I have made use, leaving it to the reader to form his own estimate of them. This method I propose still to follow in the account of the installation of the six priests who were settled, at this time, in the valley of Pragela.

Although the summer of 1678 was now come, the temperature and winds of winter continued for a number of weeks. "It seemed," says the clerical narrative to which I am indebted for these details,⁶ "as if the demons of the air were irritated at our pious

¹ Paper of 22d July, 1677.

² Paper of 24th July, 1677.

³ Persécuté par ses créanciers. The words of the Report. Paper of 28th October, 1676.

⁴ Remarks on the sixth list, placed at the date, 21st June, 1678.

⁵ At date, 19th July, 1679.

⁶ This narrative has been placed amongst the manuscripts already quoted, after the sixth list, extending from the beginning of January to the end of June, 1678.

enterprise, and wished to prevent the execution of this design. But the vice-bailli, who had formerly commanded the king's armies upon occasions more dangerous, encouraged all the company to disregard this bad weather, assuring them that it would not continue. And, in fact, after mass had been said at Bourset, fine weather returned; as if the holy sacrament had driven away the fogs and demons of the mountains.¹ Priest Laz was settled at Château du Bois. This must have been in former times a place of some note; but now it is nothing more than a desert and a wild forest. M. Jean Faure was settled at Le Villaret. The officers of customs and excise,² who are Catholics, honoured this solemnity with their presence. M. Simon Borel was settled at Fenestrelle. There the concourse of old Catholics and new converts was greater than in the other places, but the heretics almost all hid themselves. The vice-bailli afterwards assembled them in front of their place of worship, at the time when their bells called them to prayer, to read to them the king's orders. M. Francis Isnel was settled at Le Villar, which is a very beautiful parish in the valley of Pérouse, from which the priest was driven by the Huguenots, in the time of the old wars. The other places of which we have spoken, never had priests till now.³ The prior of Mentoules was at the head of all the ecclesiastics, and all the establishments in Pragela, all of which are under the jurisdiction of his priory. In each place mass was performed, and a solemn procession made, at which the heretics attended with respect and propriety. In all these new parishes, the vice-bailli caused the *lettre de cachet*⁴ to be publicly read; in virtue of which he placed the priests of these parishes under the special protection of his Majesty—also letters-patent of safeguard, which the king had sent to the châtelain, to protect him from insults for the time to come, such as he had been in time past subjected to, in consequence of the great zeal which he displayed for the Catholic religion. At Le Villar, to which the government of Pignerol and the bishop's grand vicar had come, there was, besides the other ceremonies, a bonfire. The sounding of the trumpets, the discharges of artillery from the fort of Pérouse, and the large alms which the Marquis D'Harleville caused to be distributed amongst the Catholics of the valley, increased the effect of this solemnity.

“Many persons have contributed to the settlement of these new

¹ A priest was settled at Bourset.—Abrégé de l'état de la vallée de Pragela depuis 1673 à 1717. A folio MS. vol. in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.

² [Gabelles, an excise on salt.]

³ These ceremonies took place from 20th to 23d April, 1678. (Same MS.)

⁴ Dated at Versailles, 22d October, 1677.

priests and the building of their churches; amongst others, the Abbé De Musy, who has long laboured at court for the reduction of these valleys, and who informed the king of the necessity for these new pastors. He has begged and obtained in Paris, a number of sacred vessels and a quantity of plate for these new parishes, and for others, the establishment of which he still hopes to effect. He is also causing magnificent standards and banners to be made, on which will be painted the patron saints of each parish, and which will be carried in the processions. The company of the faith,¹ established at Grenoble, have provided the other ornaments requisite for these new parishes. The ladies of that town have sent us veils, albs, candle-sticks, crucifixes, altar-cloths, pictures, &c. The company of Lyons have collected images, chaplets, books of devotion; . . . and a Catholic doctor, who does not give his name, is about to publish in Paris a controversial work, in praise of our new Catholics.² Some other persons, and particularly the abbot and canons of Oulx, have helped these valleys by considerable alms, which have been wonderfully useful to us”

These poor valleys were, however, more miserable than ever. “The poverty there is extreme,” say the same notes;³ “which would have brought over to the church a great number of heretics who are poor, or not in comfortable circumstances, if we had only had the means of relieving them more sufficiently.” But the Vaudois supported and relieved each other. “In some places,” continues the narrator, “a distribution of alms was made at the doors of their places of worship. Must it ever be, that the children of darkness shall thus go beyond the children of light; and that heretics shall be more liberal, more zealous, and more ardent to damn people than Catholics to save them?”⁴ Such is the reflection with which the paper concludes, from which the above particulars have been derived.

However, care was taken to proclaim loudly enough the fresh triumph of Catholicism, and the good deeds done by Louis XIV. in the valley of Pragela. The Gazette de France said:⁵ “Whilst our great monarch is victorious over his enemies on all sides, we see with admiration his triumph over the heresy of the Vaudois,

¹ The Propaganda.

² The title of it is: La vérité reconnue, ou quinze motifs de la conversion de messieurs de Pragellaz. . . . —The author attempts to pass himself off as a Protestant converted to the Church of Rome.

³ After 21st June, 1678.

⁴ At the end of the same narrative are the words, Certified to be conformable to the original, which we have sent to the court, signed Stephen Vith, superior of the Company of Jesus, established in the Valley of Pragellat.—(Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

⁵ Of date 28th May, 1678.

who have banished the holy church from their mountains for centuries, so that it was scarcely possible to maintain three priests there—at Mentoules, at La Rua, and at Usseaux—the first two without flocks, and the third with a very small number of people.”¹

But it was not enough to have established Catholic priests in these valleys, it was requisite to overcome the Vaudois Church itself, to trammel its organization, oppose its worship, and proscribe its ministers; and for this purpose, arbitrary measures succeeded one another with frightful rapidity. Hitherto the annual contributions furnished by the people, and destined to the support of the Protestant clergy and places of worship, had been regulated by the synod, and deposited in the hands of the consistories, under the title of consistorial funds. The payment of these impositions, at once obligatory and voluntary, took the name of the ecclesiastical tax.² The Jesuits represented to the inhabitants of Pragela, that this tax was a heavy burden upon them, of which they might easily free themselves—that their pastors were greedy and self-interested people—that the Church of Rome would give them a religion free of charge; and, finally, that the government had resolved that no tax of this nature should any longer be imposed, without the presence, nor gathered without the consent of a person in authority.³ The people were contented with this arrangement, believing it to be a security for their pecuniary interests.

But ere long, the Romish party began to act more openly. The prohibition was renewed against pastors preaching anywhere, except at their place of residence; and at the same time, laymen were prohibited from conducting religious meetings in the annexed churches.⁴ Then it was attempted to reduce the number of authorized meetings, which had long been unchanged;⁵ and after-

¹ These statements of a semi-official journal devoted to the court, cannot be suspected of having exaggerated the preponderance of the Vaudois.

A narrative of the same events was published in 1678, by a person named Chaillot. This little work I have not been able to procure. In 1684 and 1686 two new priests were settled. (Abrégé de l'état de la vallée de Pragela de 1678 à 1717. MS. communicated.) Taille ecclésiastique.

³ This was a Juge Royal, in the valley of Pragela.—June, 1678.

⁴ Arrêt de la cour du parlement du Dauphiné, portant défense à Claude Pastre, de Ville-Close de Mentoules, en Pragela, et à tous autres de la religion, de faire aucune assemblée sous prétexte de prières, &c. . . . Grenoble, 7th December, 1679. Printed.

⁵ The procurator-general of Grenoble demanded that the religious meetings, held simultaneously at La Rua and Les Traverses, should be reduced to one. The Vaudois persisted in holding two. Thence ensued a process, the issue of which admits of no doubt. There is a printed memorial by the inhabitants of these two villages, défendeurs en requête, contre M. le procureur général au parlement de Grenoble, demandeur, &c. 4to, of 20 pages. Grenoble, 1678.

wards the Vaudois were ordered to demolish the places of worship in the quarters of their parishes, and to give up their meetings there.¹ At the same time, all sorts of favours were granted to those who had become Catholics—exemption from taxes—suspension of prosecutions—assistance to the poor—hospitals opened for the sick—dowries promised to young girls—the means of worldly advancement placed more within the reach of all. It would have been well if Catholicism had never fought with worse weapons; although, indeed, their triumph could imply no excellence in its doctrines, and truth is independent of the ephemeral considerations which arise out of worldly interests.

But it was not only in the valleys of Piedmont and of Italian Dauphiny, that such fervour of proselytism was at this time displayed. In the ancient retreats of Queyras and the Briançonnais, the same work was prosecuted by the same means,² with which was also united a peculiar device, to strike terror into weak minds. “At St. Véran,” say the missionaries, “the mission was ended by one of the fathers solemnly making the amende honorable, in order to repair the injury which Jesus Christ had received from a wicked heretic of that place.” He had broken a crucifix. “This criminal had been condemned by the parliament “Towards the end of this year,” say the Procès-verbaux des conversions en Pragela, under date 19th December, 1679, “M. Simon Roude brought a decree, prohibiting the heretics from meeting at any other places than where their ministers resided; and ordaining the abolition of the fifty or sixty little places of worship which they had in all the little hamlets, where they assembled every day, morning and evening.” A new process ensued. “M. Simon Roude, prior of Mentoules, made himself all-powerful in the valley,” says a manuscript of the period. (Relation historique de la démolition des temples . . . en Pragela.—Private repositories of Professor Aillaud, at Pignerol.) The papers in this case were printed: Avertissement pour messire Simon Roude, Prestre, docteur en théologie, prieur de Mentoules, en la vallée de Pragela, syndic de la prévôté de Saint-Laurent d'Oulx, pour les affaires de la religion, en ladite vallée, demandeur en requête du 19th Septembre 1680; contre les sieurs ministres et habitants de la même vallée, faisant profession de la religion prétendue réformée, défendeurs. Without date, or place of printing; but printed at Grenoble. A folio of 40 pages. The Reply (Réponse) made in name of the demandeur, is in 4to, and extends to 14 pages. The Reply of the Vaudois, entitled, Factum, pour les habitants des vallées de Cluson ou Pragela, Cesane et Oulx, faisant profession de la religion P. R. P. défendeurs en requête de Septembre 1680, contre messire Simon Roude, &c. . . is a 4to of 41 pages. The provost of Oulx attempted to obtain the demolition of the Vaudois places of worship, upon the ground of the Edict of Nantes, which, whilst it authorized the Reformed religion in France, did not recognize it in Piedmont. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes was afterwards made the ground for the same thing. So true is it, that justice was little considered.

² In the Procès-verbaux de conversions, already mentioned, facts of this nature are noticed under the following dates: At Abrîès, 4th January and 23d August, 1678; at Aiguille, 4th July, 1675; at Ville Vieille, 24th April, 1677; and at Château Queyras, 14th July, 1678.

of Grenoble, to have his hands cut off, and to be burned alive. The sentence could not be executed upon his person, because he had fled; but it was executed upon his effigy, with much public solemnity, which has greatly humbled heresy. The executioner went to take this effigy from the house of the criminal, carried it before the people who were assembled, cut off its hands, and burned it in the public square, which was very conveniently fitted up in the form of an amphitheatre, for this execution. A number of fusileers were obliged to be present at this spectacle, attending two officers of the parliament, a trumpeter, a Catholic consul, and two Huguenot consuls, who were all on horseback."¹

But notwithstanding all these severe measures, it would seem that the evangelical religion was not only not vanquished, but that it still gained triumphs over Popery, without employing either base arts or violence. This inference may apparently be deduced from an edict of the 11th of July, 1680;² by which Catholics were severely prohibited from embracing Protestantism, and Protestants from receiving Catholics into their places of worship.

Besides all this, every pretext was continually seized for vexing the Vaudois in every possible way—if they happened to be found working on a day consecrated by the Church of Rome—if they planted a row of bushes for a hedge around their burying-grounds—if any damage whatever happened to any popish edifices in their vicinity. "The Marquis D'Harleville," it is mentioned, "having been informed that the people of Pragela had broken a little image placed on the gate of a burying-ground, caused it to be restored at their expense, much finer than it was before, and placed beside it an inscription calculated to humble heresy."³

What precise meaning are we to attach to this last expression, so frequently repeated? Does it relate to humility or to humiliations? Neither the one nor the other was wanting to the persecuted church, and yet it increased every day! Never had it more abounded in life and zeal, activity and charity, and devotedness to the cause and kingdom of God! The severities of the courts could not keep the ministers in a state of inaction. It was found necessary again to prohibit them from multiplying religious meetings at other places than that of their own residence, under pain of a fine of 3000 livres, and of being deprived of their ministry.⁴ Then the prohibition was renewed against laymen meeting by themselves, under any pretext of prayer, reading the Bible, or singing of psalms, . . . because these meetings might become tumultuous.¹ At last, it was resolved to forbid Protestants the means of temporal life, for want of power to reach their spiritual life; and on the 9th of March, 1682, and at subsequent dates, all trades and professions, from those of advocates and physicians, to those of shoemakers and milliners, were successively forbidden to them.²

¹ Same Procès-verbaux, date 29th August, 1678.

² The edict is of the month of June, but it was not published till the 11th of July. It was printed on the 14th.

³ Same Procès-verbaux, under date 3d July, 1677. ⁴ Edict of 13th July, 1682.

But the Vaudois Church of Pragela, which had preceded the Reformed Church of France in evangelical religion, was to precede it also on the Calvary of persecution and death, which Popery had so long laboured to elevate for them both. The Edict of Nantes was not revoked; but already, five months before its revocation, the exercise of the Protestant religion was, by an exceptional act of severity, prohibited in the whole of Pragela, with an injunction to raze all the Protestant places of worship there.³ These orders, so arbitrary and revolting, were carried into effect, by means of particular edicts, in the valleys of Sézane, Oulx, and Exilles.⁴ The Protestant churches of Fenil, Chaumont, and Salabertrans, in the valley of the Doire, were demolished at this time.⁵ Those of La Rua, Les Suchières, Fenestrelle, and Usseaux, in the valley of the Cluson, shared the same fate.⁶ Others were left standing, to be transformed into Catholic churches; but they were used for that purpose only for four years, after which they were also demolished, to give place to new edifices.⁷ Such was the case at Villaret, and at Les Traverses, where the house and garden of the pastor went to increase the comforts of the priest.⁸ The materials of the places of worship which were demolished, served for the construction of popish chapels; part of the consistorial properties served to endow

¹ Edict of 30th August, 1682; enregistered by the Parliament of Paris, on the 1st of December, published on the 4th, and printed at the office of Francis Muguet, printer to the king, MDCLXXXII.

² Le Semeur, journal philosophique et littéraire, tom. xv. p. 254.

³ Arrêt du conseil d'Etat du Roy, portant interdiction à perpétuité de la religion protestante dans toute la vallée de Pragela, &c. . . Du 7 Mai 1685; imprimé à Pignerol, chez Pierre Guillon. This decree was adopted in consequence of the petition of 19th September, 1680, addressed by Simon Roude, the prior of Mentoules, to M. D'Herbigny, intendant-general of Dauphiny.

⁴ All of date 14th May, 1685; signed, Par le Roi: Philippeaux.

⁵ A report concerning the demolition of these places of worship exists in the Archives of Pignerol.

⁶ In June, 1678. Relation historique de la démolition des temples . . . dans la vallée de Cluson ou Pragela. (MS. communicated by Professor Aillaud of Pignerol.) The church of Usseaux was not demolished till September. The inhabitants having attempted to make some resistance, Louis XIV. sent thither a company of dragoons. (Other MSS.)

⁷ Abrégé de l'état de la vallée de Pragela de 1678 à 1717.—(MS.)

⁸ Report to the Council of State, 25th July, 1685.

them; and the produce of the sale of another part of the same properties was devoted to the foundation of two hospitals, the one at Sestières, and the other at Fenestrelle.¹

We may judge what desolation then reigned in these ancient churches of Pragela, so long privileged in the maintenance of evangelical religion. The Vaudois were cast into inexpressible dejection and grief. The Bible, which had been transmitted from father to son for so many ages, was about to be taken from them; the pastors, whom they delighted to see in the midst of them, were already proscribed, and they were forbidden to harbour them in their houses. These worthy descendants of the Barbas withdrew in great distress from amongst their afflicted flocks. Their tearful eyes still turned, as they proceeded in the path of exile, to seek the more and more distant peaks of their native mountains, where they had preached the word of God. A great part of the inhabitants followed them, even of those who had been supposed to be converted to the Church of Rome.²

On their arrival in Switzerland, these exiles sent deputies to the elector of Brandenburg, to ask an asylum in his dominions.³ "There are already six hundred of us who have left our native country," said these deputies, towards the end of 1685, "and in course of next spring, a like number of our people will still do the same."⁴ We have already seen, in the history of the Vaudois colonies in Germany, what became of these afflicted emigrants; let us now see what was the state of the Protestants who remained in the valleys.

¹ Extracted from the registers of the Council of State. Reasons and provisions of the decrees of 29th July, 1685.

² Abrégé de l'état de la vallée de Pragela . . . de 1678 à 1717. "The ministers," it is there said, "who were obliged to leave the kingdom, drew many people with them, even of the converts." Of one hundred and fifty Protestant families who were then at Le Villaret, forty-five followed their pastor.

³ These deputies were a pastor, James Papon, and two laymen, John Pastrecourt and James Pastre. (Erman and Reclam: Contribution to the History of the French Refugees in the dominions of the King. Berlin, 1786, tom. vi.)

⁴ Despatch of M. De Mandelslohe, resident at Heidelberg, dated 15th-25th January, 1686. (Archives of Berlin.)

CHAPTER XVI.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND OF THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.

SIXTH PERIOD.—FROM THE REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES TO THE TREATY OF UTRECHT. SUFFERINGS AND TEMPORARY RESTORATION OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH IN PRAGELA.

(A.D. 1685 TO A.D. 1713.)

Le Tellier—Bossuet—The Vaudois who remain in Pragela frequent places of worship within the Piedmontese territory—Persecution in Pragela—The persecuting church enriched by the spoils of the persecuted people and the properties of the exiles—Part of Pragela devastated by the troops of the Duke of Savoy—Successive emigrations—Protestantism revives a little in Pragela in the beginning of the 18th century—The valley of St. Martin, and part of that of Pérouse, are induced to constitute themselves into a republic, under the illusory protection of Louis XIV., which subsists for four years—The Vaudois of Pragela enjoy better prospects for a time after the valley has become part of the Piedmontese dominions—Deputies from Pragela at the Vaudois synod of 1709—The government refuses to recognize their incorporation with the rest of the Vaudois Church—The Vaudois of all the valleys partake of the Lord's Supper at Usseaux—Severe measures adopted by the Piedmontese government against the Vaudois of Pragela—Political arrangements unfavourable to them between the governments of Piedmont and France.

LE TELLIER, who was appointed intendant of Piedmont in 1640, remembered the Vaudois half a century after, to recommend to Louis XIV. the persecuting measures which have just been related; and on his death-bed he sought to extend these same measures to all the Protestants of France. This old man, as he breathed his last, flung perturbation into a hundred thousand families, and sore distress into a million of hearts, and sent a multitude of his countrymen to end their days in misery and exile. Le Tellier signed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes with his dying hand, on the 22d of October, 1685, profaning the words of Simcon, by a personal application the most unsuitable that could be made. Bossuet pronounced his funeral eulogium. The Eagle of Meaux found pleasure in tearing to pieces, by insinuations and plain attacks, or, as it were, with beak and claws, the church of liberty and love founded upon the Bible. This man of fine genius had a servile heart. An adulator of the great—a despiser of men of humble rank, unless they could serve the purposes of his sacerdotal ambition—he was, although in secret, the instigator of the cruel and tyrannical measures which deprived France of half-a-million of inhabitants, and gave the Reformed Church a rich crown of martyrs. Such is the ecclesiastical spirit, without the Spirit of God; for, essentially, it may be maintained that that which is really human is alone really divine; but Bossuet and Le Tellier did not belong to an era in which this truth could be understood.¹

By the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, Protestant worship was prohibited throughout all the dominions of Louis XIV. Protestant churches were to be razed to the ground, and schools shut up. Ministers who refused to embrace Catholicism were to leave the kingdom within the space of fifteen days; those who abjured were to receive a pension one-third greater than the stipend which they had had as pastors, with a reversion of one-half of this pension to their widows. Every child, born from that time forth, was to be baptized as a Catholic. Protestants who had emigrated were to return under the paternal and most Christian government of the French monarch, within the space of four months, under the penalty of having all their property confiscated at the expiry of that period; and any who might attempt to emigrate, for the future, were to be condemned—the men to the galleys, the women to confiscation of person and property. The religionaries, it is added, at the conclusion of the Edict of Revocation, may, however, remain in the kingdom, without performing any exercise of religion, awaiting till it shall please God to enlighten them.²

But what is mere existence to a Christian, without any act of life? The Protestants showed that they were Christians, by preferring exile to the want of religious life; and at this period countless multitudes forsook their native land. But the poorest were under the necessity of remaining. Two thousand inhabitants of Pragela preceded or followed the expulsion of their brethren from the Vaudois valleys of Piedmont,¹ but in 1686 and 1687, the greater part of them returned to their native region, and were re-established there in virtue of the edict of Victor Amadeus, which opened it to them in 1692. But what became of those who remained on the banks of the Cluson?

¹ Homo sum, et nihil humani a me alienum puto, was a saying of Paganism. All beyond my pale is hell, says the Romish church. Everything is lawful against a damned person, adds the Inquisition. A Pope ventured to say that it is a praise-worthy action to kill a heretic. (Bull of Urban II., quoted in Gratianus, cap. excommunicatorum, causa 23, questio 5.)

² This edict was not published in Dauphiny till the end of November, 1685. It was printed at Grenoble, on the 12th of November, in two columns, on a large sheet intended to serve as a placard, with the following title:—Edict of the king, given at Fontainebleau, in the month of October, 1685, containing the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and of all the edicts, declarations, and decrees issued in consequence: as well as of all concessions made to those of the Protestant religion, of whatsoever nature they may be; the demolition of all the Protestant places of worship, &c. . . . This placard was affixed to the door of all the Protestant places of worship in Pragela.

Deprived not only of pastors, but of the privilege of holding any religious meeting among themselves, they did not hesitate regularly to cross the lofty mountains and deep valleys, which separated them from their brethren of Piedmont, in order to join them in their Sabbath-day services. From the upper part of Pragela they went to Macel by the Col du Pis, and from the lower part of the Val Cluson, they went to Pomaret, at the entrance of the Val Saint Martin. In order to accomplish these pious pilgrimages, seeking edification and the comfort of brotherly love, they were sometimes obliged to set out on the Saturday evening, and could not return to their own homes till Monday morning. Notwithstanding all the difficulty of travelling to so great a distance, they were glad to adhere to this method of procedure, because of the rigour with which all religious exercises were made the occasion of prosecutions in France, which Popery had now rendered so excessively hostile to liberty.

Even prayer and the religious consolation of the sick were now made matters of accusation. "Last autumn," says a document of the period, "the vicar-general of the provostship of Oulx gave information of a fact concerning John Challier of Pourrières, who was surprised in the act of making prayer, after the manner of the Protestants, for one called Peter Pastre, who was afflicted at the time with a very dangerous malady. . . . This case demands an exemplary punishment."² And whilst it was thus made a crime for the Vaudois to minister Christian consolations to the dying—whilst an exemplary punishment was demanded for those forbidden prayers, whose fervour was breathed forth in secret and in midst of danger, as a flower blossoms upon ruins—would the reader wish to know what morals prevailed in the persecuting church of the Catholics of that region, to whom it was desired to assimilate the Vaudois? “As to the old Catholics” (that is, those who had always belonged to the Church of Rome), says the report just quoted, “there are amongst them persons debauched with wine, who frequent public-houses by night . . . and make their families suffer from want of the necessities of life; there are others who commit adulteries or other crimes, which cause much scandal. It will be requisite to inform the consuls,” &c. . . . Thus a simple admonition was deemed sufficient for serious crimes committed by Papists, and punishments without parallel were awarded to the virtues of the Protestants! Such was the justice of Louis XIV. Such was always the spirit of the selfish and foolish castes by whose influence he was controlled.

¹ Without a precise statement of the numbers, we may determine them approximately. The despatch of M. De Mandelslohe, quoted at the end of last chapter, announces an emigration of 600 Vaudois from Pragela as about to take place in the spring of 1686, whilst 600 had already left it in the autumn of 1685; and the Records of the Council of State of Geneva say, under date 31st August, 1687:—"The refugees who entered this city yesterday amount to about 800 persons, mostly from Pragela." (Extracts from the Archives of the Council of State, communicated by the Rev. M. Le Fort.)

² Memoire pour la religion en la Plevanie d'Oulx. Without date, but certainly belonging to this period, for we read in it:—"The heretics continue to go to the preaching at Pomaret, or other neighbouring places, whither also they go to get married, and carry their children for baptism." (Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

But the Vaudois of Pragela did not long retain the difficult, yet precious privilege, of crossing the mountains to partake of the Lord's Supper in the congregations of their brethren. The tyrant of Versailles said to his ambassador at the court of the Duke of Savoy, “It is the presence of the Vaudois of Piedmont, on the frontiers of my dominions, which causes the desertion of my subjects, and you must represent to their sovereign that I am resolved to suffer it no longer.”² We have seen already what was the result of these arrogant demands. The Vaudois of Piedmont were expelled from their country in a body, and these valleys, the last sanctuary in which the word of God was heard amongst the Alps, became as desolate as a tomb. On these terrible and frequent strokes, thus cutting off on every side the ancient boughs of the Israel of the Alps, it seemed as if the trunk which had borne the storms of so many ages must shortly fall, never to spring up any more. Alas! this sad presage was too surely to be realized for the valley of Pragela. The Church there was gradually extinguished, dying out like a lamp that wants oil—perishing like a victim devoured by birds of prey!

Every day, the executioners, appointed on behalf of the throne and the altar, tore again at the living, bleeding spouse of Christ. Poor persecuted Church! her places of worship and her ministers were taken away—her very liberty of prayer was taken away. But this was far from satisfying her destroyers: and as they proceeded, they sought to make their spoliations more gainful to themselves.

¹ Same Report; after the passage above quoted.

² Despatch of Louis XIV. to the Marquis D'Arcy, of 7th December, 1685. (Diplomatic Archives of France. Communicated by M. Guizot.)

The Church of Rome asked the property of the fugitive Vaudois, and Louis XIV. granted the request.¹ Robbers are punished, but a king is honoured, although he thus takes the property of his people—the property of the poor—the fields which they have inherited from their forefathers, and made fruitful by the sweat of their brow; or which they have purchased with the savings of long years of rigid economy and hard labour! But this was not all: the consistorial properties still remained. The royal spoliator seized upon these in the following year,² and made further gifts to various Catholic establishments.

In 1684 and in 1686, two new priests were settled in Pragela; in 1687, five doctors of the Sorbonne were sent from Paris to aid the missionaries in effacing, as much as possible, the traces of the Reformed Church, and extinguishing the signs of life which still appeared everywhere. In 1688, new popish churches were built; and, according to a work of the time, “the Catholic religion made visible progress, till, in 1690, on war breaking out between the Duke of Savoy and the King of France, it was remarked that piety was again very much cooled.”³ The meaning of this is that the Vaudois of Piedmont had now returned to their valleys; and during the terrible winter which they passed in the Balsille, 1689–90, their brethren of Pragela frequently furnished them with provisions, which they much needed; whilst, on the other hand, the latter entertained a hope that, by the chances of the war, the Val Cluson might remain in the hands of Victor Amadeus, and would be incorporated with the other Vaudois valleys.

Victor Amadeus invaded Dauphiny in 1692. In consequence of an incursion of his troops into Pragela, all that part of this valley which extends from Fenestrelle to Pêrouse, was given to the flames, on 25th July, 1693. Thus were four parishes rendered uninhabitable. "The inhabitants," says the account above quoted, "all left it. Some went to Savoy, others to the Briançonnais, the greater part to the Vaudois valleys of Lucerna and St. Martin. These last then resumed the exercise of the Reformed religion; and, in spite of all that could be done, continued it, favoured by the troubles of war which occurred, till 1696. But in 1698, peace having been concluded, these obstinate relapsed heretics chose rather to forsake all and go to Switzerland, than to remain in possession of their lands and return to the Catholic religion. Of sixty-two families of the parish of Bourset, there remained only seven or eight."¹ These fifty-six families who emigrated from Bourset, were the same who founded the last of the Vaudois colonies established in Wurtemberg, from its foundation the poorest of them all. The reader will recollect the mean hamlet of New Engstedt, surrounded with forests, on a table land of Swabia, where these poor exiles had so much difficulty in accomplishing their settlement.

¹ By decree of 24th November, 1687. The following are its principal articles:—600 golden pistoles, from the price of the lands taken into the king's possession, are given to the Religious Ladies of St. Mary of Pignerol; 1000 to the hospital of St. James; 1200 to the venerable chapter of the churches of St. Donatus and St. Maurice; 1200 towards the settlement of certain vicars, intended for the instruction of the converts. The surplus of the price is given to the Royal College of the Reverend Jesuit Fathers of Pignerol. Then follows a list and valuation of the confiscated lands. (Archives of La Pêrouse. Communicated by Professor Aillaud.)

² In January, 1688; by an edict enregistered by the parliament in the following month. Another edict adopted in December, 1688, and published on 9th January, 1690, disposes of the lands left unoccupied by the recent emigrations, in favour of the heirs, upon condition that they should neither sell nor alienate them before the lapse of five years. The object of this measure was to retain them in the kingdom.

³ Abrégé de l'état de la vallée de Pragela de 1678 à 1717. MS. already quoted. Relation historique de l'état de la religion en Pragela. (1711.) All these manuscripts, notwithstanding their titles, are of little importance, and contain almost nothing but insignificant details and vain declamations.

In 1694, the Vaudois had been encouraged to entertain better prospects; for the Duke of Savoy, who had re-established them in their own country in 1692, had likewise held out inducements to the French Protestants to share the lot of their brethren in religion. The inhabitants of Pragela subsequently sent a deputation² to Victor Amadeus II., to beg that he would secure to them the same privileges which he had granted to their brethren of the Piedmontese valleys; for the edict of 23d May, 1694, whilst declaring that liberty of conscience is to be recognized as belonging to the Reformed, adds, in express terms:³ "As to the Vaudois of Pragela and of Pérouse, who make profession of the same religion, they shall not enjoy this privilege any longer than for the space of ten years after the present war." It was during these ten years of precarious toleration that Protestantism recovered an unwonted vigour, and shed its last rays in the valley of Pragela.

At first, the inhabitants of this valley, who had retired into the dominions of the Duke of Savoy, asked and were allowed to take the oath of fidelity to him as their sovereign.⁴ Thereafter they

¹ Abrégé de l'état de la vallée de Pragela, &c. "Those who went to Savoy," adds this manuscript, "returned, on the contrary, better Catholics than they had been before."

² Composed of one minister, William Malanot, pastor of Angrogna, and two laymen, Messrs. Peyrot and John Ferrier.

³ See the Synodal Acts of June and October, 1694, also those of 17th June, 1695.

⁴ The request was made on 2d March, 1694; the oath was administered on the 1st of July. They presented themselves to the number of 222. See Mémoriale dei religionarii delle valli di Pragelato, San Martino e Perosa; and the documents thereto annexed. (Civil Archives of Pignerol, category i., fasciculus 31, No. 27.)

resumed their weekly journeys to Macel and Le Pomaret, to attend public worship celebrated in these localities. It would even appear that family worship was religiously maintained in the sanctuary of the domestic hearth, in the greater part of the houses of Pragela; for the judicial prosecutions upon account of religion, and the new repressive measures incessantly adopted by the French government in these regions, prove, by their very number, the strength and prevalence of the hereditary attachment of the Vaudois to the doctrines of the Bible—a permanent cause for unwearied severity on the part of the Church of Rome. Such was the state of things till emigrations again commenced. Many Vaudois withdrew from Pragela to Switzerland in the end of 1697.¹

In virtue of the treaty of Turin (18th August, 1696), article vii., Louis XIV. soon demanded that Victor Amadeus should cease to give refuge and protection to Protestants, natives of France. Accordingly, the edict was issued on the 1st of July, 1698, requiring them to leave the dominions of Savoy within the space of two months. The Vaudois pastors were, at the same time, forbidden to extend their ministrations to the French territory, under pain of ten years of the galleys. We have already seen what troubles, what disorders in families, and what extensive emigrations arose from these severe measures.

In these desolated regions, the number of Catholic churches multiplied, as the population diminished. "Towards the end of 1698," says one account,² "Louis XIV. caused two churches to be built in Pragela; and provided stipend for eight priests,³ by letters-patent of the month of September of the same year."⁴ New houses were immediately built for these priests, and those which already existed were repaired.⁵

After this, the bitter and restless zeal of those who were engaged in bringing about apostasies by all kinds of means, applied itself, with redoubled craft and activity, to give the last blows to evangelical faithfulness. "Many parents," says a letter written at that time from the valleys, "are obliged to send into Switzerland their children, whom the Papists had taken from them, and whom they

¹ Letters from Berne, 23th January, 1698, and from Zurich, 30th January. (Archives of Berne, compartment E. Communicated by M. Monastier.)

Etat de la vallée de Pragela de 1678 à 1717.

² In May and June, 1698, five new priests were settled in Pragela, viz., at Fenestrelle, Le Villaret, Le Bouret, Le Château du Bois, and St. Pierre du Villar.

³ There are several documents, connected with this subject, in the Archives of Pignerol, drawer A, Nos. 17 and 18.

⁵ Those of Laval, Les Traverses, La Rua, Pourrières, Usseaux, Mentoules, Chaterant en Boursel, La Chapelle du Janbons, and Méune.

sought to take from them again. Emissaries of Catholicism travel through the country from one place to another. . . . The debt of the valleys, in consequence of arrears of interest, from 1686 to 1694, has increased to more than 300,000 francs. The full amount of taxes and public burdens is demanded from them, from the time when they were driven out.¹ Nearly twenty-five families have already been won over to Popery, by promises or by threats. All sorts of means are employed, in order to weaken the Vaudois. After having been gradually reduced in numbers, they will be exterminated."²

Emigration continued. A new edict of Louis XIV. forbade the Protestants to sell their lands, without an express permission from the secretary of state.³ The prior of Mentoules, in his mandatory of the 20th of February, 1700, said that the Protestant religion had been planted in that country by violence, and that zeal and activity must be redoubled, in order to oppose its mischievous power.⁴ The Archbishop of Turin proceeded in person to the valley of Pragela, in 1703.⁵ He found many Protestants still there, as well as in the valley of the Doire,⁶ and bore away with him the authentic deeds of a great number of conversions; as if religion was a thing to be settled by the help of a notary, or the gift of a heart could be made an affair of contract!

But at this period, war broke out again between Piedmont and France. Victor Amadeus II. addressed a proclamation to the inhabitants of the valleys, inviting them to take up arms against Louis XIV.⁷ He endeavoured at the same time to induce their brethren of Pragela to join them. His protection was afforded to the Vaudois, when he stood in need of their assistance. Menaced by a king, he fell back upon the support of the people. What could a tyrant do, if he were only left to himself? The people whom he had persecuted defended him still, and ere long it was his lot to find refuge amongst them. The Vaudois wrested the upper part of Pragela from the dominion of France, and at the same time delivered it from the oppression of the Church of Rome. They set up their altars again; under the protection of their vic-

¹ Taxes which had not been gathered from 1686 to 1692.

² Archives of Berne. Compartment E; papers of 1697-1698.

³ Edict or declaration of 5th May, 1699. This prohibition only affected sales exceeding the sum of 3000 francs.

⁴ This mandatory is in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.

⁵ Visites faites dans la Plébanie d'Oulx, par Monseigneur Vibo, archevêque de Turin. A folio MS. in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.

⁶ Amongst other places, at Fenil, Salabertrans, Chaumont, and Mollaret.

⁷ It is dated 5th October, 1703. (Moser, proof documents, No. 18.)

torious arms, Protestant worship was everywhere re-established. "The cause of the evil was this," says one of the relations already quoted¹—"the ministers of the Val Lucerna came to preach to them on the Sabbath; and by their coming and going, filled the minds of the inhabitants with mischief." But how was it that Catholicism, supported by so many means of repressing what it disliked, could not resist an influence so temporary? The Bible alone can give the answer—its words were known to the people whom the Vaudois ministers called to judge of their doctrines.

There was even ground at that time to hope that in that district, this word of life would never again cease to animate the hearts of men, for Victor Amadeus had promised to provide "that all those of the Protestant religion, who had emigrated from the valleys of Pragela, might be enabled to return thither, and be restored to their civil rights, and enjoy what property they might thenceforth acquire there, with the free exercise of their religion, as they had exercised it before their departure."² But this promise, as we shall afterwards see, was not kept; and on the other hand, the Vaudois weakened themselves by division. The valley of St. Martin, and a part of that of Pérouse, constituted themselves into a republic under the illusory protection of Louis XIV.,³ and lived under this government for four years.⁴ Although this event was of no political importance—and yet it was entirely political—it had for the time a great influence on the circumstances of the Vaudois. The Duke of Savoy, however, was so just as not to make the other parts of the Vaudois valleys responsible for it. On the contrary, he generously afforded them relief, when, impoverished by the war, they began to suffer from famine—appointing in each commune a person charged with the duty of distributing bread to the poor.⁵

The duke himself, moreover, was at this time far from being prosperous. The armies of France had invaded his dominions. The Duke de la Feuillade had made himself master of Savoy in the spring of 1704; after which he penetrated into Piedmont by Mount Cenis, and took Suza, whilst the Duke de Vendome took

¹ Pragela, from 1698-1717. MS.

² Such are the terms of § III. of the secret articles of the treaty concluded between Victor Amadeus II. and England, 4th August, 1704.

³ By a treaty made between the Duke de la Feuillade and the inhabitants of the valleys, 15th July, 1704; and ratified by Louis XIV. at Versailles, 25th July. Signed Louis, countersigned Colbert (Archives of the Court).

⁴ From 25th July, 1704, to 17th August, 1708.

⁵ By an order of Bercastel, commandant-general of his royal highness in the valley of Lucerna; dated 20th November, 1704. (Archives of Turin, No. 284.)

Vercell.¹ In 1705, the successes of these generals were still greater, and almost all the towns of Piedmont fell into their hands. Again, Prince Eugene restored the fortunes of the Duke of Savoy, and defeated the French army, on the 7th of September, 1706, under the walls of Turin. The consequences of this victory were considerable. The French, who retired to Pignerol instead of pressing on to Casal, lost successively the Milanese, the Mantuan territory, Piedmont, and finally the kingdom of Naples. The war continued till 1710, but peace was not concluded till 1713.

In 1708, Victor Amadeus having seized Fenestrelle, brought the whole of the valley of Pragela under his dominion, of which he had previously possessed only the upper part, defended by the Vaudois, and the lower part since the surrender of Pignerol (13th March, 1707). This valley was then placed under the administration which already ruled the other parts of the Vaudois territory. The same governor was appointed over it.² The inhabitants were ordered to lay down their arms, and those who had emigrated were invited to return immediately.³ At this time, says an official report, "the British court, and their high mightinesses of Holland, exerted themselves to procure for the Protestants of Pragela the same privileges which their brethren of the other Vaudois valleys enjoyed. Queen Anne herself wrote upon this subject to Victor Amadeus. The duke's reply, of which we have a copy in our archives,⁴ and which is of date 3d March, 1709, was in the most favourable terms; but he represented that it seemed to him suitable, for various reasons, to defer this public step on his part till peace was concluded."⁵ However, to prove the sincerity of his intentions in this respect, he caused the Romish ecclesiastics in Pragela to be enjoined not to trouble the Vaudois in any way upon account of their doctrines, and even to leave those who had abjured free to return to Protestantism.⁶ Four months afterwards the Archbishop of Turin

¹ Suza was taken on the 12th of June, and Vercell on the 21st of July, 1704. (Art de vérifier les dates.)

² The advocate Gasca: deputato per esercire en la qualita d'Intendente nelle valli di Luserna, San-Martino, P'erosa e Pragellato. . . . Instructions of 28th December, 1708. (Turin. Archives of the Court.)

³ Order of Victor Amadeus II., dated from the camp of Mentoules, 24th September, 1708. (Same Archives.)—Other documents, from the same place, are dated from the camp of Balbotet. These two localities are very near one another.

⁴ The original is in the British State Paper Office. Letters, Sardinia, V. 24.

⁵ Memoire concernant la situation présente des vallées Piémont . . . présenté au Synode assemblé à La Haye, le 9th Sept., 1762. (MS. communicated by M. Appia.)

⁶ All the priests of Pragela were invited, by a circular from the superior of the mission at Fenestrelle, to come to that town on the 2d of January, 1709. It was there that the intendant Gasca made known to them, by his own voice, the intentions of their sovereign.

ordered those who were under his jurisdiction not to make mention of the name or authority of Victor Amadeus when they had to do with heretics.¹

It seemed, therefore, that there was no impediment in the way of the restoration of the Vaudois churches in Pragela. The pastors of the neighbouring valleys repaired thither and performed the ministerial functions.² Schools were established for the instruction of youth, district meetings were re-opened, domestic worship was resumed with regularity, and everywhere preceded the arrangements for public worship. Numbers, also, who had emigrated, returned to their own abodes.

At the Vaudois synod which was held at Angrogna on the 11th of November, 1709, the deputies of Pragela³ presented themselves, "provided with a regular commission, signed by the consuls, the councillors, and 100 other heads of families, in name of all the Protestants of the valley."⁴ They asked to be again incorporated with the one body of the Vaudois churches, which was granted with readiness and delight. The unity of the body was to them merely a visible manifestation of the unity of the faith; and this last had never ceased. It was with much satisfaction that these different representatives of the Vaudois church found themselves able thus to exhibit a testimony of the spiritual union which had been maintained among all the members of that church, through all the political divisions, and all the vicissitudes which had agitated their country. Although separated, for almost a century, by the swords and sceptres of two dynasties, they found one another the same as they had been in former centuries; for the descent of evangelical Christians may be traced farther back than that of kings.

But this was to be the last communion of these fraternal valleys—a final and solemn act of Christian fellowship, against which human policy made haste to lodge its protest. "We declare that the acts of the synod of Angrogna may be carried into effect," said the intendant of Pignerol, "except the second article concerning the admission of persons from Pragela, declaring that article inadmissible and null, and rejecting it absolutely, because the inhabitants

¹ "On the 12th of May (1709) we were assembled at Fenestrelle, by order of the vicar of his lordship, the Archbishop of Turin, who forbade us to make use of the name and authority of his royal highness against the heretics." (Reports of the missionaries.—(Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.)

² From the month of February. (Mémoires de Perron. MS.—I will speak of it further on.)

³ Messrs Perron, Guyot, and Salleng.

⁴ Synodal Acts of 11th November, 1709. Preliminaries. (Archives of the Vaudois Table.)

of Pragela are not included in the privileges recognized as belonging to the other valleys."¹

But if an official recognition was refused them, they were nevertheless assured that they would not be disturbed upon account of their religion.² England, likewise, continued to interest herself on behalf of the Vaudois. As an ally of Victor Amadeus, she took upon herself the pay of their troops, to whom was confided the guard of the frontiers. Each soldier received a pay of ten philips. The winter of 1708–1709 having destroyed all the fruits of the earth, further assistance was also distributed to them.³

Without having organized congregations, the inhabitants of Pragela had then the privilege of meeting for worship; and, like a strong plant whose branches for a short time cease to be cut off, their church at this period made rapid progress. "We see, with the deepest regret," say the priests of Pragela, in a petition of this date, "that the inhabitants of this valley do not profit by the privilege which they have in being under the government of a sovereign, who excels equally in valour and in piety."⁴ They were at last converted, . . . and now again they have returned with mad eagerness to heresy. On the first Sabbath of Lent a minister came to preach at Usseaux, and many people assembled to hear him; on the second Sabbath the number was increased, and still more on the third. The pitiful state to which we see this valley about to be reduced, compels us to have recourse to your lordship, to put an end to this abomination."⁵

The Royal Council which had been established at Pignerol, and which at this time took the name of the Senate, applied itself to restrain the dangerous liberty, always so fatal to Popery.

¹ A translation of the words appended by the intendant Gasca at the end of the Acts of the Synod.

² " . . . Numbers of persons of the valleys of Pragela have returned to their former Protestant religion, and now profess it without being inquired after or disturbed, as they were assured that they would not. . . . (Réflexions sur l'opportunité de rendre public l'article du traité du 21 Janvier 1705, &c. . . . MS.—Turin, Archives of the Court.)

³ Relation historique de la démolition des temples, et de l'établissement des Eglises paroissiales, en Pragela. (MS. of the library of M. Aillaud, at Pignerol.)—This work pretends that relief was given, in order to bring back the Vaudois who had become Catholics to Protestantism, "which did," it is added, "cause numbers to prove unfaithful."

⁴ This flattery, addressed to Victor Amadeus, is expressed in precisely the same words which had been previously addressed by the same men to Louis XIV., then at war with the Duke of Savoy.

⁵ Supplique du chapitre d'Oulx, March, 1709. Without other date.—Requête de MM. les curés de Pragela, of 13th March, 1709. Signed, Blanc, curé de la Rua; Poncet, curé d'Usseaux; Merlin, curé des Traverses; Prin, curé de Pourrières; Bonne, curé de La Val.—Drawn up by Joseph Samuel, notary. (Turin, Archives of the Court. Nos. of series, 670, 671.)

For this purpose it endeavoured to put impediments in the way of those fraternal relations which were so promptly renewed amongst the Vaudois of the different valleys; and the ministers of the valley of Lucerna were requested not to go to Pragela, at the same time that those of the people of Pragela, and other French refugees who had taken up their abode in the valley of Lucerna, were ordered to quit it within a short time.¹ The pastors, however, being strangers to the political considerations which governed the conduct of Victor Amadeus, and with good reason regarding the evangelical Christians of Pragela as one of the most interesting parts of their flock, went to them as often as was requisite, or as the duties of their own charges permitted.²

The senate of Pignerol, without having the right to employ any repressive measure against the exercise of a liberty authorized by the sovereign, thought fit, however, to signify its dissatisfaction; which it did by a sort of mandatory on the 2d of April, 1710, recalling attention to all the prohibitions previously issued against the exercise of the Reformed religion in the valleys of Pérouse and Pragela. The Protestants, strong in their right, in their convictions, and in their sense of the necessity of protesting against the tyranny by which they had suffered, replied to this manifestation on the part of the senate by the most solemn act of their worship; and on the 7th of April, 1710, they proclaimed the closer alliance of their beloved churches, and the fellowship of all Vaudois hearts, in a way that had not been attempted before for twenty-six years, by the celebration of the Lord's Supper at Usseaux, in which the inhabitants of all the valleys participated, uniting as members of one family with those of the Cluson and the Doire.

The Catholic clergy of these latter valleys addressed to the senate of Pignerol a representation,³ as to the little regard which the Protestants paid to the prohibitions of which they had been reminded, and sent with it a report,⁴ drawn up by lawyers, intended to prove that the Vaudois of Pragela were not entitled to enjoy liberty of con-

¹ Order of the commandant of Lucerna, addressed to the syndics of that valley, under date 25th May, 1709. (Archives of Le Villar, volume marked Religionarié, fol. 161.)

² "On the 27th of February, 1709, a minister came to Pragela who perverted all the people. On the 23d of March, M. Bastie baptized three children; almost all the population assembled. On the 15th of April, another minister came for a marriage, &c. . . ." (Mémoires des missionnaires de Fénestrelle. MS.)—M. Bastie was pastor of La Tour.

³ Dated 28th May, 1710.

⁴ Mémoire touchant l'établissement, les progrès et la cessation de la religion prétendue réformée dans la vallée de Pragela; et touchant l'engagement de S. A. R. à l'égard du rétablissement de ladite religion, ensuite de son traité d'alliance avec les Anglois et les Hollandais. (Folio MS. in the Royal Library at Turin.)

science. "His royal highness," they say, "promised, by the treaty of 21st January, 1704, and by the conditions previously agreed to at Utrecht, that the Protestants who had emigrated from Pragela might return thither, and exercise their religion there as freely as before their departure; granting the same privileges to all others of the same religion who might afterwards settle there, provided that neither the one nor the other should in any way attempt to turn Catholics from their religion, or to do them any injury. But the Protestants who emigrated from Pragela, left that valley for no other reason than because their religion was interdicted there. They had, therefore, no liberty of conscience before their departure, and, according to the terms of the treaty, liberty of conscience ought now to be taken from them." Such was the substance of their argument.

In consequence of these things the Duke of Savoy, probably that he might form an opinion concerning the importance of the Protestants of Pragela, demanded a list of their names and an account of the lands which they possessed.¹ It being now indubitably ascertained that there was no persuading of them into submission, vexatious measures were resumed against them. The Dutch ambassador complained, and the Marquis de St. Thomas, the minister of foreign affairs, replied that the Vaudois were turbulent and rebellious subjects, who had been already treated with only too much gentleness.² Soon afterwards they were enjoined to abstain from work on the Catholic festival days.³ In France the Protestants of Dauphiny were forbidden to have arms in their possession;⁴ and the society de propagandâ fide et extirpandis hæreticis renewed its intrigues and operations everywhere.

"In 1710, during the war," says Dièterici,⁵ "some French marauders having committed all kinds of havoc in the valley of Pragela, the Savoyard governor prohibited any assemblage of more

¹ These documents are in the Archives of the Court, at Turin. The letter of Victor Amadeus, demanding them, is addressed al Marchese di Borgo, and dated 14th April, 1710.

² The note of the Dutch ambassador, M. van der Meer, and the reply of the Marquis of St. Thomas, dated 23d February, 1711, are in the Archives of Turin. Part of the correspondence relates to the arrest of the Protestant consul, Guyot, who had neglected to cause windows to be made for the Catholic church of Pragela.

³ Edict of Victor Amadeus II., of 22d May, 1711, commencing thus: "It having been represented to us by our procurator-general substitute in the superior Council of Pignerol, that our subjects of our newly conquered lands and countries of Pragela, do not observe the festivals commanded by our holy mother church, &c. . . ." (Turin, Archives of the Court.)

⁴ Edict of Louis XIV., signed at Versailles, 17th September, 1712.

⁵ History of the Vaudois in Brandenburg. . . . Chap. vii.

than twelve or fourteen persons. Under pretext of this ordinance, all public worship was prevented in Pragela. Captain Friquet, whom Victor Amadeus had commissioned, in 1709, to write to his brethren who had emigrated, to induce them to return to their homes, where he promised them the fullest liberty of conscience, was one of the first victims of this return to arbitrary measures. Religious meetings were held in his house; he was cited to Pignerol, and in order to escape condemnation, was himself compelled to leave his native land."¹

Meanwhile the English minister, who had been the protector of the Vaudois, had been changed. They were lost sight of amidst political events. At the time of the treaty of Utrecht they were forgotten by the Protestant powers, and nothing was done to secure their rights. England, which had secured the possession of the valley of Pragela to the Duke of Savoy, on condition that he should maintain religious liberty there, was, by new arrangements, prevented from interfering. Victor Amadeus, having made up his quarrel with the King of France, perceived a possibility of adding to his dominions the county of Nice, and yet of keeping the valley of Pragela, upon condition of destroying Protestantism there. And that this double cession might be represented as an exchange of territory between the two powers, he ceded the valley of Barcelonnette to Louis XIV., who accepted this disadvantageous arrangement as an honourable bargain, in order thus to deprive England of her sole right to interfere on the frontiers of Italy. And thus, by these secondary transactions in a council of potentates, the whole religious prospects of a people were sacrificed to the secret ambition of Popery, which was pursuing them to destruction.

"We possess a report by M. Léger,"² it is said in a document emanating from Geneva half a century after this event, "concerning the engagements of Victor Amadeus II. with the court of England, and the facility with which, at the time of the treaty of Utrecht, that court might have secured to the people of Pragela the same rights which the three other valleys enjoyed. But, through negligence, they were forgotten, and their valley was lost."³ These are the words of men who were amongst the most constant protectors of the Vaudois. It now remains for us to see in what manner the loss which they deplore took place, and how the light of the gospel was extinguished on the banks of the Cluson, more than a century ago, by the breath of tyranny and intolerance. May a new historian yet have to tell how it has been rekindled by that of liberty!

¹ John Gonnet and John Guigas were cited at the same time with him, and found it necessary likewise to go into exile.

² Pastor and professor at Geneva—nephew of the historian. He died on the 18th of January, 1719, aged sixty-seven years and four months.

³ Mémoire concernant la situation présente des vallées du Piémont . . . présenté au Synode de la Haye, le 9 Septembre 1762. (Synodal Records of the Walloon churches.—Copy communicated by M. Appia.)

CHAPTER XVII.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.

SEVENTH PERIOD.—FROM THE TREATY OF UTRECHT, IN 1713, TO THE FIRST EMIGRATIONS CAUSED BY THE EDICTS WHICH PRECEDED THAT OF 1730.

Obligations incurred by Victor Amadeus in his treaties, in favour of the Vandois—How he got quit of these obligations—Measures adopted against the Vandois of Pragela during his absence in Sicily—Exertions of the King of Prussia on their behalf—Beneficial interference of the English ambassador at Turin—The pastors of the other parishes prevented from entering Pragela to minister—Severities employed against the elders of Pragela, to prevent their conducting religious meetings—Famine—Advantage taken of it for proselytism—Prohibition of all religious meetings—The case of Peter Ronchail and his family—The people of Pragela forbidden to attend public worship in the other valleys—Other tyrannical measures—All the inhabitants of the valleys acquired by the treaty of Utrecht are ordained to have their children baptized in the Church of Rome—Iniquitous law regarding inheritance—Compulsory observance of festivals—Illustrative instances of persecution—Victor Amadeus shows the most ungrateful forgetfulness of the former services of the Vandois.—Friendship shown to them by Mr. Edges, the British ambassador—Gradual increase of intolerance; emigrations, and wearing out of the Vandois church in Pragela.

WE have seen that by the third of the secret articles of the treaty concluded between Victor Amadeus II. and England, on the 4th of August, 1704, all the fugitive Protestants of the valley of Pragela had acquired the right to return and enjoy there the free exercise of their religion as much as they had enjoyed it before their departure. The same condition was inserted in the treaty of the Hague, of 21st January, 1702. But in the archives of the court of Turin may be seen a diplomatic note in these terms:—"By the fifth article of the treaty of alliance between her majesty, Queen Anne, of England, and the King,¹ the acquisition of the valleys of Pragela, Oulx, . . . &c., was promised to him in such a way, that they were to become his without his giving anything instead. In the third of the secret articles of the said treaty, the king, on his part, promised the free exercise of their religion to the Protestants. But her Britannic majesty, not having been able, at the peace of Utrecht, to cause the King of France to cede this country to the King of Piedmont, it is evident that the promise of England has been of no effect; and consequently the king's promise is no longer binding upon him, as he now holds these valleys in virtue of a direct exchange made with Louis XIV. for the valley of Barcelonnette."¹

¹ Victor Amadeus II. took the title of king, as King of Sicily, on the 21st of December, 1703.

The treaty of Utrecht was concluded on the 11th of April, 1713.² In the end of the previous month, Victor Amadeus had signified to the Vaudois that he entertained kind intentions with regard to them, and was much satisfied with their good conduct during the war just ended;³ but no sooner was the treaty concluded, than the oblivious monarch did not even deign to reply to their most respectful and rightful petitions.⁴ He did not, however, declare against the schemes of ecclesiastical organization which were laid before him, and said nothing which could make the Vaudois believe that he harboured the design of despoiling them of that liberty of conscience which he had promised them; but he refused to come under any obligation in this matter, exacting, however, from his new subjects the oath of fidelity, which bound them to his service.⁵ Louis XIV., seeing that the exercise of the Protestant religion was not immediately repressed in the valleys which he had ceded, prohibited his own subjects newly converted to Catholicism from having anything to do with foreign Protestants.⁶

¹ Turin, Archives of the Court, No. of series, 437.

² Five different treaties were concluded on that day between France and other European powers. That between Louis XIV. and Victor Amadeus II. was signed at four o'clock in the afternoon.—The fourth article of it is in these terms:—"His most Christian majesty transfers to his royal highness of Savoy, irrevocably and for ever, the following valleys, to wit, the valley of Pragela, with the forts of Exilles and Fenestrelle, and the valleys of Oulx, Sezane, Bardonnèche, and Chateau Dauphin, and all which is on the Piedmontese side of the water-shed of the Alps. On the other hand, his royal highness cedes the valley of Barcelonnette . . . so that the summits of the Alps shall henceforth form the boundary line between France and Piedmont."

³ This testimony from their sovereign was conveyed to the Vaudois by the Marquis D'Antourne, 31st March, 1713.

⁴ Towards the end of April, 1713, Victor Amadeus paid a visit to Pragela, to see his new possessions, and especially the fortresses of Fenestrelle and Exilles. The Vaudois addressed a petition to him for the free exercise of their religion, but it remained unanswered. ⁵ The oath was administered on 29th July, 1713.

⁶ By edict of 8th November, 1713.

Intercourse with the Vaudois, in particular, was regarded as excessively pernicious to their Catholic neighbours. In the sermons, the mandatories, and even the rescripts of this period, Catholics were incessantly recommended not to take Vaudois into their service, and not to be present at their meetings; and it was added, that if a Papist had reason, for decency's sake, to accompany the funeral of a Protestant, he ought to retire from the burying-ground before the officiating pastor had commenced to speak. The Bible gave these humble children of the Alps a power of conversion more efficacious, for changing the hearts of men, than all the appeals to violence by which the Church of Rome had sought to make servile adepts embrace her cause.

In 1713, says Dieterici,¹ the Duke of Savoy went to Sicily to be crowned, and remained there till near the middle of 1714. The enemies of the Vaudois took advantage of this circumstance to destroy their church in Pragela. In 1713, the Savoyard² intendant Pavie, issued orders that no schoolmaster should be settled there without the approbation of the Catholic clergy. Two teachers, who had been previously settled, were compelled to cease their functions in February, 1714. Thereafter, the consuls, syndics, and other Protestant magistrates of the valley, were removed from their offices, and Catholics appointed in their stead. The former had been elected, according to custom, six months before their entry upon their duties. At that time Victor Amadeus was still in Piedmont, and he offered no opposition to these elections. But in the beginning of 1714 they were annulled in absence of the sovereign.

The Vaudois addressed themselves to their foreign protectors. Captain Friquet wrote to Papon, a former pastor of Pragela, then minister of the French church at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, to acquaint him with the griefs of his compatriots. Papon put the representations of the Vaudois into the hands of the resident of the court of Berlin,³ who transmitted them to the King of Prussia; and that monarch, by a letter of the 24th of March, 1714, charged his representatives in England, Holland, and at Augsburg, to make known to these courts the increasing dangers which threatened the existence of Protestantism in the valley of Pragela. "You may declare," he said, "that we are ready to concur in all the measures which the States-General, Queen Anne, and the evangelical states of the empire may deem it proper to take, in order to preserve the Reformed religion from imminent ruin in the valleys of Piedmont."

¹ History of the Vaudois in Brandenburg, ch. vii.

² This adjective does not indicate that he was a Savoyard by birth, but merely that he was in the service of the Duke of Savoy.

³ M. Reinhold Hecht.

This first communication not having produced the effect which he had expected, Frederick William renewed his endeavours by a letter of 28th April, 1714, in which he said—"You will, verbally and by writing, make the most urgent representations to her majesty the queen, and her ministers, . . . that they may induce the Duke of Savoy to leave our fellow-Protestants in Pragela in the enjoyment of entire liberty of conscience, and faithfully to fulfil the promise which he made in regard to this matter." But Victor Amadeus was then absent, and the proceedings against the people of Pragela were continued. "Who can even tell," says a letter of that period, "but that he may prolong his absence of purpose, to be able to say on his return, that all was done without his knowledge? Meanwhile, the great blow will be struck, and his highness will find an excuse in his conscience, not permitting him to overthrow a work of conversion."¹

The violent measures anticipated by the author of the sentences just quoted, soon began to be employed. In the month of May, 1714, the commandant of Pérouse entered Pragela with troops, made his way into the dwellings of the principal persons amongst the Vaudois in the middle of the night, dragged them from their beds, and conducted them in chains to Fenestrelle.² The King of Prussia, having heard of this cruel treatment, renewed his solicitations in favour of the Vaudois. "We learn from every quarter," he wrote on the 19th of June, 1714, "and you will see by the inclosed, that the persecutions against the Vaudois go on increasing; so that the entire suppression of the religion of the gospel in these countries will be inevitable, if nothing is done to succour these poor people. . . . You will entreat, in our name, her majesty, the Queen of Great Britain, to urge upon the Duke of Savoy, in the strongest manner, the maintenance of liberty of conscience in these valleys."

The English ambassador at the court of Turin received orders to address himself accordingly to the ministers of Victor Amadeus. His representations produced, at first, some happy effects. The king, having returned from Sicily, moderated in some degree the character of the re-actionary proceedings which took place in Pragela. However, it was not long till the prohibition was renewed against the pastors of the other Vaudois valleys crossing the Cluson, to conduct the exercises of religion. One of them having braved this prohibition, was imprisoned by order of the intendant of Pignerol. The interposition of the Protestant ambassadors at the court of Turin readily obtained his restoration to liberty; but thenceforth, his colleagues and himself very naturally felt an increased and increasing reluctance to go beyond the field of labour assigned to them, within the limits of their own parishes.

¹ Letter written from Vevey, 17th April, 1714, and quoted by Dieterici, ch. vii.

² The particulars are taken from a letter by Captain Friquet, written from Geneva, 31st May, 1714. Quoted by the same author.

The people of Pragela, however, were not discouraged: the elders of each commune undertook, as in former times, to conduct, in their turns, familiar and edifying prayer-meetings. And what followed? These elders received orders to attend at Turin. They went thither, accordingly, and were seized and carried to different towns of Piedmont, where they were kept prisoners.¹ However, all the citations to Turin were not obeyed in the same way by those to whom they were addressed. Jacob Perron, a Vaudois, who received one of them, says, in his memoirs, "This was in the month of May, 1714. The king was then in Sicily. Summonses were sent to the principal people of our valley, the object being to banish them to Piedmont, or to make them change their religion. To save myself from this persecution, I was obliged to quit the country, leaving my father, who was eighty years of age, sick and bed-ridden, and my wife, who was almost in a dying state; and I remained six weeks away from home before I could venture to return."² He passed these six weeks in the valley of Lucerna, an evidence of the brotherly feelings with which the people of these poor valleys always regarded each other. "During my absence," continues the narrator, "one of these summonses was brought to my father, and a few days after, the officer of justice came to say to him, on the part of the châtelain, that he had only to give him thirty livres of Piedmontese money, for the informations which the said châtelain, the registrar, and the procurator-fiscal, had drawn up against him, on account of religion."

By these particulars we may judge to what odious exactions the magistrates of these districts were accustomed to subject the Vaudois. Permitted to escape with impunity, and perhaps encouraged in their proceedings, because of the injury which they did to the

¹ There were eight of them who were thus treated.—These particulars are derived from a document on stamped paper, entitled Minute de requête pour présenter au roi, laquelle n'a pas été présentée. It is in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.

² Mémoire des persécutions pour notre sainte religion, qui me sont arrivées depuis le mois d'août en l'année 1708, que le roi de Sardaigne avec les alliés, ont conquis notre pays de Pragella.—These memoirs were written by an elder of the church of Suchières, named Jacob Perron.—For brevity's sake, I shall henceforth quote them as Mémoires de Perron.—This MS. was communicated to me by M. Lombard-Odier, of Geneva, whose family had in 1730 received into their house the exiled author, who left them this memorial.

Protestants, they went about the work with all the more zeal, as they contrived to make it serviceable to their own interests. "The registrar," says Perron, "added, that if this money was not given to him, he would come and take our furniture out of the house. My father replied that he had done no wrong nor harm to any one—that he had no money—that they might come and take away his furniture if they would, but as for his religion, he would never forsake it."

At this time, moreover, great distress reigned in these valleys.¹ The famine was so great, that unhappy people, who had neither home nor food, might be seen wandering about the country, trying to support life on the herbs that grew in the fields.² Monks, Jesuits, and missionaries of every denomination took advantage of this state of things to obtain from them promises of becoming Catholics, in exchange for a little money or a morsel of bread.³

There was even a plan formed for systematically turning the miserable circumstances of the country to account in this way, by united and concerted measures.⁴ All the parish priests received supplies of money, which were destined exclusively for the relief of those who had become Catholics, and were refused to the Protestants.

But at the same time that the Vandois of Pragela were violently dispersed through Piedmont, their brethren, who desired to settle in Turin, were driven from it.⁵ The Protestant schools of the valleys of the Cluson and the Doire were now also shut up; and the public services of the Reformed religion were formally prohibited.⁶ The people of Pragela reclaimed against this prohibition.

¹ Rapport du triste état des Eglises du Pragela et des anciennes vallées; dated 1st June, 1714. (Archives of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, register S, p. 258.)

² Letter of Reynaudin to the Genevese pastors; 15th June, 1714.—Same source, p. 260.—This Reynaudin was then pastor at Bobi. In 1689, when still only a student, he left the academy of Basle, to follow the expedition of Arnaud, the narrative of which was written by him.

³ Same documents.

⁴ Plan, per contenere ne limiti, gl' eretici; impedire a loro progressi; aiutare le conversioni, e sostencere li convertiti. It is here proposed, amongst other things, to give to each parish priest, 600 livres annually, in order to give marriage portions to fifteen girls who shall have become Catholics, to pay the taxes and debts of the converts—to obtain divers exemptions in their favour, &c. . . . (Archives of Turin. No. of series, 247.)

⁵ Progetto di reale biglietto, pel vicario di Torino, nel concernente i religionarii. (Archives of Turin. Series 512.)—This paper contains notice of a multitude of restrictions imposed upon the residence and commerce of Protestant strangers in the capital.

⁶ Requête des habitants du Pragela. (Without date; but it must have been in 1714 or 1715.) Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.

The reply to their petition was a prohibition against holding even private meetings. "It having been represented to us,"¹ said Victor Amadeus, "that clandestine meetings are frequently held in the valleys of Oulx, Exiles, Cézane, Bardonnèche, and Pragela, . . . we prohibit the religionaries of these districts from assembling in numbers of more than ten persons, whether of the one or the other sex, in any place or on any pretext whatever, except in the meetings of municipal councils. The transgressors of this order shall be punished by a fine of one hundred crowns of gold, for the first offence, and by ten years of the galleys for the second. Women guilty of the like infraction, shall incur a fine of twenty crowns of gold, for the first offence, and a punishment of two hours of the pillory for the second."²

This edict was published in Pragela, on the 7th of February, 1716. It is impossible to tell in what a multitude of instances it was made a pretext, by a servile magistracy and a malevolent clergy, for public or secret acts of oppression, underhand vexation, and annoyance of every possible description. "It has been proved," say subsequent instructions for proceedings at law, "that in the stable of Peter Ronchail, there were twelve persons assembled, men and women, without reckoning the little children and three women who were before the door."³ Thereupon followed report, denunciation, official petition, the officers of justice sent down to the spot, imprisonments, advocates' fees, condemnation, the ruin of the family, the dispersion of its members, who went into exile to avoid the galleys or the pillory, the abandonment of children left to perish of want, and the triumph of the persecutor—Popery. In vain was it urged that amongst the twelve persons denounced, there were a beggar woman to whom alms had just been given, and three children of a nearly related family, who were playing with their little cousins Ronchail, also a sick woman visited by two of her neighbours: all these representations went for nothing with the judges. Peter Ronchail, a man bowed down with age, was condemned to two years' imprisonment; his brother Stephen, to three blows of the strapado; and the whole family collectively to the costs of process, and a fine of one hundred crowns of gold for each member.¹ This is an example of the way in which those very Vaudois were now treated, whose fidelity Victor Amadeus II. had so often praised. It shows, also, what fruits the edict of 1st February, 1716, was destined to bear.

¹ By the intendant of Pignerol, under the influence of the council, whose members were guided by the clergy of the city, who themselves were instigated by the Jesuits of Pragela.

² Given at La Vénérrie, 1st February, 1716. Signed Victor Amedée; counter-signed Lanfranqui.

³ Substance des éclaircissements donnés sur lesdits articles, par M. le président Borla, dans sa lettre à S. M. du 13th Juillet, 1727. (A paper in the Archives of State at Turin. No. of series, 530 bis.)

Thus prevented from conducting the exercises of their religion in any way, either in public assemblies or in private houses, the invincible Christians of Pragela resumed their Sabbath-day pilgrimages to the churches of Macel and Le Pomaret. They did not scruple to take long journeys in order to be present at the religious assemblies of their brethren, to whom the ancient edicts of the house of Savoy guaranteed the free exercise of their religion. But they were soon deprived of this resource likewise, through the instigation of the clergy, always possessed of great power over the council of Pignerol.² A few French Protestants, whom the Duke of Savoy had specially retained in his new dominions, obtained, as a favour, notes, authorizing their admission into the place of worship at Le Pomaret. But, upon various pretexts, these notes were afterwards withdrawn from most of them.³ The prohibition was then renewed against the Vaudois working on the Catholic festival days.⁴ They petitioned again, and obtained liberty to work on these days with their doors shut, or in their fields, if they should receive permission from the local judge.⁵ These were but new openings for arbitrary tyranny, and new opportunities for vexation on the most frivolous pretences.

The people of Pragela now sent a deputy to Geneva,⁶ to ask counsel and protection. Switzerland, in its turn, had recourse to ¹ This sentence is of date 4th June, 1727; but as the facts correspond with the edict of 1716, I have thought it right to state them here, as an immediate consequence of that edict.

² The following is the series of papers relative to these facts:—I. (Of date, 31st March, 1717)—Petition of the procurator-general, that the Protestants of Le Pomaret may be forbidden to admit Catholics to their exercises of worship.—II. (Of date, 2d April)—Rescript of Victor Amadeus, in accordance with this demand.—III. (Of date, 30th April)—Petition of the refugees who had been permitted to reside in the valleys.—IV. Biglietto Regio, by which they were allowed to go to the Vaudois place of worship, upon obtaining a written permission for themselves, individually, from the governor of Pignerol.—V. New order (of date, 8th May), prohibiting the reception of the Protestants of Pragela in the place of worship at Le Pomaret.—VI. Proclamation of the council, calling attention to all these measures, and dated 28th May. (Extracted from the records of the old superior Council of Pignerol, and from the Archives of Turin.)

³ Especially because they had been settled in Pragela before the treaty of Utrecht.

⁴ Rescript of 14th July, 1718. (Archives of Le Villar, vol. Religionarii, fol. 176.)

⁵ Rescript of 9th August, 1718.—This paper is in the form of a biglietto regio in the Archives of Turin, and of simple Instructions to the intendant of Pignerol, in the Archives of that city.

⁶ He arrived there in February, 1719, and went thence to Zurich.

the intercession of Holland and of England.¹ Some insignificant concessions were obtained,² but the relief was only momentary. At last a new order,³ more severe than the preceding, absolutely interdicted the Reformed religion. But human hearts could not be closed like places of worship, and the proscribed religion, notwithstanding all the impediments with which it was surrounded, was continually springing up anew in exercises secretly conducted in the woods or in cottages—like those vivacious plants which, if pressed down by a stone, grow afresh in the course of a night through any crevice which remains; and whose vigorous shoots, continually sprouting up, fill every chink which they can find, and need nothing but a little air to make them green and luxuriant.

The pastors of the other Vaudois valleys were also repeatedly prohibited from admitting any stranger into their places of worship;⁴ the object of this prohibition being to banish their brethren of Pragela from their congregations. The most urgent petitions against this regulation were in vain addressed by the Vaudois to the sovereign;⁵ their adversaries met them with arguments to the opposite effect;⁶ fanaticism was aroused, severities were continued, and finally, all the inhabitants of the valleys acquired by the treaty of Utrecht, were ordered to have their children baptized in the Church of Rome, twenty-four hours after their birth, under penalty of two hundred livres of fine for each contravention.⁷ The Vaudois in vain sent up new petitions: they received no relief nor consolation except from foreign Protestants.⁸ The civil code, promulgated in 1723, under the title of the Piedmontese Constitutions, sanctioned all the iniquitous orders against which they protested,⁹ and their new supplications were less regarded than the former.

But these indefatigable defenders of liberty of conscience sent to Geneva, at this time, a young man of their valley, that he might

¹ Letter of 6th February, 1719. (Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, register S, p. 708.)

² 25th June, 1720; instructions to the Senate of Pignerol, to be indulgent towards the Vaudois.

³ Of date 17th July, 1720.

⁴ On 25th September and 22d October, 1720.

⁵ By a memorial of the 18th of January, 1721, entitled Griefs des vallées du Piémont. (Communicated.)

⁶ Memoria sopra il raccorso, fatto . . . e sopra diversi abusi dei Protestanti. (Archives of the Court.) A long and wearisome dissertation, heartless and unjust.

⁷ Decree of the Court of Pignerol, passed on 21st April, 1721, on the report of the procurator-general.

⁸ Amongst other gifts, they received 500 florins from the Walloon church of Middleburg, where one of the sons of Henry Arnaud was then pastor.—9th January, 1722.—(Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. T, p. 120.)

⁹ See the tenth chapter; also pp. 25, 605, &c. of the 4to edition.

prepare himself for the ministry of the gospel, eventually to come and preach amongst them the word of God. They hoped that, not being of foreign birth, he might be permitted to exercise his peaceful functions in his own country, as was the case in the other Vaudois valleys.¹ They did not foresee that, before the termination of his studies, the church for which he was intended would have terminated her own long course of sufferings and desperate conflicts.

Proselytism redoubled its efforts to overthrow this church, now indeed almost destroyed already, but by no means conquered. A law had been obtained to the effect, that any child of Vaudois parents embracing Catholicism should be entitled, although his parents were still alive, to enforce a claim to that portion of inheritance which would have fallen to him after their death.² From this arose a multitude of intrigues in order to draw away children from the religion of their family, that legal proceedings might then be instituted in their name against their own parents, for the division of the property which belonged to these parents, to the impoverishment of the Vaudois families. It is easy to imagine what troubles, disorders, and heartburnings, must have resulted from these iniquities.

Contemporaneously, however, with all this fierce zeal, there were also remarkable acts of disinterestedness, especially on the part of those simple and warm-hearted persons, who, even amidst the doings of Popery, still fixed their eyes upon the charity of Christ. In 1724, for example, there were already eighty young Vaudois girls, mostly belonging to the valleys of Pérouse and Pragela, who, having become Catholics, were provided with marriage portions at the expense of their new church.³

But, at the same time, Protestant notaries were forbidden to receive the testamentary deeds of Catholics, and Catholics were forbidden to sell their lands to Protestants beyond the tolerated limits.⁴ The order, also, to the industrious Vaudois, to do honour

¹ The name of the deputy sent from Pragela to Geneva, to obtain the admission of the young Pragelan into the academy of that city, was Borel. (He arrived there on 21st March, 1723. A commission was appointed on the 14th to examine his proposal. The report was favourable. The name of the student thus admitted was Guyot. He arrived at Geneva on the 4th of June, and did honour to his benefactors.) Borel obtained also from the Bernese government, the foundation of a bursary, in the academy of Lausanne, for another student from Pragela. (See the Records of the Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. T, pp. 247-250, 258, 307, 315, 335, 405, 431, &c.)

² Constit., p. 25.

³ Mandatory of the vicar-general of the archbishopric of Turin, dated 18th January, 1724. (Printed.)—[Perhaps some readers may, like the Translator, be inclined to a view of this fact, not quite so favourable as that of the author.]

⁴ Biglietto regio, al Senato di Pinerolo, 27th June, 1724.

to the popish festivals by an unproductive idleness, was several times repeated.¹ It is evident how easily they could thenceforth be annoyed on many futile pretexts. The following is an example:—"In 1726," says Jacob Perron in his memoirs, "on the eve of the day which Catholics call the Fête-Dieu,² and on which they are accustomed to plant little leafy boughs in front of their houses, the parish priest of Suchières came and said to me, in presence of two witnesses, that he had orders from the king (which was not true) to cause me to adorn my house like the Catholics. He added that those of our religion did it, as they ought, in the other villages through which the procession passed, and that if I did not do it he would make the châtelain acquainted with it, that he might inform against me." Perron refused thus to do what implied a consent in ceremonies which his religion condemned, and legal proceedings were speedily commenced against him. He was cited before the governor of Fenestrelle, and with difficulty made his escape from the soldiers who were sent to take him prisoner.

We find Messrs. Friquet and Gonnet also setting forth in a letter,³ that, on the 7th of the month of March (1726), they, with others to the number of twelve persons, being assembled to keep a fast, were seen by the parish priest, who wrote to the court, from which, in course of a few days, orders were issued to the senate of Pignerol to inquire into the matter; which having been done, they were apprehended by order of the senate, and conveyed to the prisons of Pignerol, where they were detained for five weeks, and afterwards condemned to pay a fine of 100 crowns of gold each, besides the expense of their detention, which amounted to 900 livres. They add that they had not transgressed any edict of their sovereign, as there were only a small number of persons assembled, and solely for the purpose of prayer; that they had presented a petition to the King of Sardinia to be acquitted of that exorbitant fine, but that their petition had been remitted to the procurator-fiscal of Pignerol, the same who had already prosecuted the case against them; and that thus they had no recourse but to the charity of their brethren. "M. Léger,"⁴ it is added, "states that these persons are truly worthy of consideration, and that there does exist an edict of the King of Sardinia, forbidding the inhabitants of Pragela to assemble in any greater number than ten per-

¹ 2d July, 1721; 12th May, 1724, &c.

² [When the mass is carried in triumphal procession.]

³ Dated from Les Traverses, in Pragela, 5th June, 1726. What is here said is verbally extracted from the Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. v. p. 193. Sitting of 21st June, 1726.

⁴ Pastor at Geneva.

sons;¹ but that this had been understood to mean heads of families, because there are in these valleys families whose members exceed this number; and in the meeting in question, although there were twelve persons, there were only eight heads of families." But these considerations, however reasonable, were of no weight with the persecutors; and for the least act of prayer which the inhabitants of Pragela were discovered to make together—for reading a few pages of the Bible in their families—they were treated as criminals.

A great number of details might be added to the instances already adduced; and although these details are sometimes insignificant, they serve to show, more perfectly than official documents, the condition in which the Vaudois of this valley were then placed, and the vexations to which they were exposed. Thus, in course of that same year, 1726, we find a memorial of the senate of Pignerol setting forth to the sovereign, "That the heretics, although obliged to have their children baptized by the parish priests in virtue of the decree of 21st April, 1721, nevertheless bring them up in the Protestant faith; and that the senate therefore proposes, in order to repress these intolerable abuses—1. To have the children taken from their parents and the charge of their education committed to Catholic congregations.² 2. To set aside the edict of 12th May, 1679 (emanating from Louis XIV.), which pronounces the punishment of death against relapsed persons, and which could not be applied to a whole population; and to put in force the decree of 7th May, 1685 (emanating from the council of state), which absolutely prohibits the public or private profession of any religion but the Catholic."³

About the same time the same senate, of its own authority, extended to all the parishes of the Val Pérouse the prohibition previously addressed to that of Le Pomaret,⁴ against admitting any of the inhabitants of the Val Cluson into the Protestant places of worship, under pain of banishment for the pastors, and confiscation of goods for the elders of the church.⁵ The Vaudois replied by a petition, in which they advanced strong arguments, and set forth that the elders and pastors could not perform the functions of a police force at the place of worship, and could not know every indi-

¹ The edict of 1st February, 1716.

² [i.e., religious societies or confraternities.]

³ This memorial fills nine folio pages. It is entitled Remontrance.—It has no date, but it is placed according to the date of its reception at Turin, 8th January, 1726. (Archives of the Court. No. of series, 493.)

⁴ Rescript of 2d April, and manifesto of 23th May, 1717.

⁵ Rescripts of the Senate of Pignerol, of dates 14th May and 15th June, 1726.

vidual who entered their meetings.¹ But the advocate-fiscal of Turin decided in accordance with the rescripts of the council of Pignerol,² and the arbitrary prohibitions of that body were maintained in force, with the excessive punishment attached to them.³

Next year Cyprian Appia, the pastor of St. John, was prosecuted for having baptized the child of an inhabitant of Fenestrelle, named Simon Rochette. This process proved a very tedious one. The pastor was condemned to banishment, with confiscation of goods; but Mr. Edges, the English ambassador at the court of Turin, obtained his pardon. "I wish it to be particularly understood," said Victor Amadeus upon this occasion, "that it is not at all out of regard for the Vaudois, but from personal respect for the ambassador, that this pardon is granted." Yet these Vaudois, according to the language of the same prince twenty years before, were the most faithful friends of his adversity, the props of his throne, the well-beloved and trusty of his grateful heart. But Popery had veiled from his sight these recollections of the past, and put distrust and severity in their place. The more intolerance that its demands produced, the more did it still demand.

The priests of Pragela complained that the inhabitants of that valley did not attend mass; that they did not observe the Catholic festivals; that they contracted marriage within the degrees forbidden by the church;⁴ and that they buried their dead without the assistance of the priests. They therefore demanded the exercise of further severities against them.⁵ To understand some of these things, it must be borne in mind that the Protestants were prohibited from having inclosed burying-grounds,⁶ and that the family of a deceased person, in order not to leave his remains in a place exposed to all sorts of profanations, often preferred to bury in some private property. The Vaudois were also forbidden to assemble in greater number than six persons for a funeral procession;⁷ and these prohibitions gave occasion for incessant annoyances.

¹ The petitions of the Vaudois were never dated till 1827, with very few exceptions.

² On 14th September, 1726.

³ By royal letters of 28th October and 22d December, 1726. Quoted in the Instructions of 20th June, 1730.

⁴ Anche il terzo grado di consanguinità. [Within the third degree of consanguinity.]

⁵ I do not know the date of their petition, and have only seen the report upon this petition prepared by the Abbé di Barolo. It is dated 12th September, 1726, and is a MS. of 10 folio pages.—(Turin, Civil Archives, series 491.)—The conclusions of the report are favourable to the petition, and even refer to other documents of the same nature previously presented.

⁶ In virtue of the edicts of 2d July, 1618, and 25th June, 1620.

⁷ By the edict of 5th February, 1698, relative to the Vaudois of Saluces.

In 1727 the prosecutions already mentioned took place against a Pragelan family. "On the 9th of the month of March," says a report by Mr. Edges, the representative of Great Britain, who took a warm interest in these poor suffering people,¹ "Father André, the chaplain of Le Laux, in the Val Cluson, entered the house of Peter Ronchail, with a serjeant, to see how many people were there, and what they were doing. 'You see, Sir,' said that worthy man, 'there are some attending to the cattle, others are doing nothing, and the children are amusing themselves with their sports.' There were eight of the family. There was also a beggar woman, to whom had been given a porringer of soup; and there were the sister-in-law of Ronchail, and a female cousin of his. Nevertheless, proceedings were instituted, a condemnatory sentence was pronounced, and this family was ruined." On the other hand, persons guilty of more serious offences were pardoned if they abjured their religion,² as if it had not even increased their guilt thus to make their conscience an article of traffic.

Exposed to so much intolerable injustice, the poor Vaudois of Pragela began to remove from their afflicted country. Those who were owners of lands let them, or transferred them to relatives who might send the rents to them abroad. Thus, at the cost of voluntary exile, they purchased that liberty of conscience which they held so dear. But even of this sad expedient for relief from oppression, their oppressors soon endeavoured to deprive them. "If your majesty," said the enemies of the Vaudois to Victor Amadeus, "would be pleased to ordain that all the property of those who leave the country without your permission should be confiscated, it would be an excellent means of retaining these people within the happy dominions of your majesty."³ What language, and what morality!

Particular indignation was manifested against all who did anything to favour emigrations, or the return of Catholics to Protestantism; and it may well be deemed surprising that any such conversions should have taken place amidst the dangers with which they were surrounded. But those who became converts in such circumstances gave all the greater proof of the strength of their convictions.¹ A minister of Pragela, named Perron, having received the charge of souls in the parish of Onex, near Geneva, had proceeded to do the work of an evangelist in his neighbourhood. We are not aware what treatment he received, but in a letter by the parish priest of Pontverre² we find the following words—"I do not think that he will have the insolence to come again to teach his doctrines in my parish."³ The same priest expresses great indignation against the people of Caronge, "who," says he, "with a malice more than mortal, make it their business to supply the dresses of laymen to monks and priests who go to apostatize in the city of Geneva, that unhappy Samaria," . . . &c.⁴ Thus the gates of Switzerland were besieged at once by those who wished to change, and by those who wished to retain their religion. For this, both of these classes sacrificed their country and their possessions. But they acquired a surer inheritance in heaven.

¹ The report is dated 30th June, 1727, and is addressed to the Marquis of St. Thomas, minister of foreign affairs in Piedmont. (Turin, Civil Archives, series 530 bis.)

² Memoria esattamente raccolta, da registri e relazione esistenti nell' ufficio della grande cancellaria, &c. . . . A paper dated from Turin, 26th August, 1727. (Civil Archives, series 496.)

³ The document is dated Suza, 8th January, 1723, and signed Perron, surgeon-major of the regiment of Rhebinder.—This surgeon was an apostate, the first cousin of Jacob Perron, the author of the memoirs which I have quoted.

Many Vaudois had already emigrated. A new edict of Victor Amadeus bore that in a Protestant family, of which either the father or the mother became a Catholic, all the children must be brought up Catholics.⁵ A further demand was very soon made for the simple annulling of all the edicts on which the privileges of the Vaudois depended,⁶ except that of 1694, to which Holland and England had been parties. But these powers had made no stipulation for the preservation of the Vaudois church in Pragela, and Louis XIV. insisted that it should be destroyed. The powerful influence of the clergy was exerted for the same object. A young woman, of whom the aged monarch was enamoured,⁷ united her voice with that of the persecutors. Victor Amadeus suffered himself to be persuaded, as it were, with regret, to the adoption of one after another of all the intolerant measures which were brought into operation against this inoffensive people.

Each of these measures was followed by some new emigrations. The Vaudois of Pragela were destroyed by degrees; they did not disappear all at once, but, like the snows of their own mountains—

¹ Philippians iv. 13.

² In the bailiwick of Gaillard, in Savoy.

³ Letter of 18th July, 1727. (Turin, Civil Archives, series 508.)

⁴ Letter of 4th July, 1727. (Same source, No. 509.)

⁵ Biglietto regio, of 17th July, 1728; quoted in a paper entitled, Reply to the memorial transmitted by the Duke of Bedford, Minister of England, to the Chevalier Ossorio, and forwarded by him to Turin, with his letter of 31st May, 1718, &c. . . . (Turin, Civil Archives, series 459.)

⁶ Memoria distesa in casa del Signor Marchese di San Tomaso, li 24 Ottobre 1728, circa il capo da aggiungere alle costituzioni a riguardo de Valdesi.—Progetto di capo per l'aggiunta alle costituzioni, &c. . . . (Same source, Nos. 441 and 471.)

⁷ Victor Amadeus was then more than sixty years old.

which insensibly diminish in depth till they cease to cover the soil, and melt away without the eye being able to observe the progress of the change—this church, within whose bounds synods were once held of 150 pastors, which at a later period reckoned eighty places of public worship, which was afterwards reduced to mere private religious meetings, and was at last entirely deprived of the preaching of the gospel, gradually died away, and was extinguished, recovering life at the least breath of liberty, but only to be more and more weakened by oppression, until it disappeared, to be seen no more.

It now remains only to relate the last attacks to which it was subjected, the sufferings which it endured, and the zeal which the greater number of its children displayed, preferring exile rather than to abandon their faith.

CHAPTER XVIII.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS OF PRAGELA AND THE ADJACENT VALLEYS.

EIGHTH PERIOD.—EXTINCTION OF THE VAUDOIS CHURCH IN PRAGELA.

(A.D. 1729 TO A.D. 1733.)

Famine of 1729—Base advantage taken of it for the advancement of the work of proselytism—Conversation between a Vaudois and a Jesuit—Edict of 20th June, 1730—Immorality of the persecuting king—Instances illustrative of the persecution—The case of Jacob Perron—Many go into exile—Attempts to prevent emigration—Victor Amadeus resists the remonstrances of the King of Prussia—Continued annoyances to which the Vaudois are subjected, and especially those who had been baptized in the Church of Rome—Trials and difficulties of the Vaudois pastors—Traces of lingering Protestantism in Pragela—Burning of Bibles there in 1833.

IN 1729, the Vaudois suffered great distress¹—foreign assistance alone preserved them from starvation.² The popish congregations and ecclesiastics, who pursued in Piedmont the work de extirpandis hæreticis, eagerly took advantage of these circumstances of affliction, increasing their efforts to persuade the poor people to change their religion, offering to relieve their wants, but putting a price upon their benefactions. Theirs was not the loving-kindness and disinterested charity of the gospel; it was not even the noble-mindedness of the Pagan, who, feeling that he was a man, would deem nothing that interested humanity foreign to his regard¹—it was the narrow-minded but active zeal of sectaries, who have never failed to turn a question of fraternity into a question of party, designating by the name of conversions their mere party triumphs. The charity which loves and embraces all—which bears and excuses everything—was utterly unknown to them; as they too abundantly proved, by incessant accusations of the Vaudois who continued faithful to their principles, by odious insinuations against them and perfidious denunciations.

¹ See on this subject a memorial by the minister Léger, inserted in the Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. X. pp. 173, et seq.

² Ten thousand florins from Holland, and 14,000 Piedmontese livres, from what quarter is not stated. (Memorial above quoted.)

These poor people were accused, without trial, of all sorts of faults. Infidelity—corruption—the disrespect shown to priests—the neglect of public religious services—the indifference manifested in the matters of offerings, ex-votos, and enrolment of neophytes in the various Catholic corporations—all these grievances were attributed to the Vaudois. It was therefore demanded that they should be excluded from every office and employment, and from all intercourse with the Catholics;² and, as may be supposed, religious meetings were proceeded against more severely than ever.

“On the second of January, 1729,” says Perron in his memoirs, “a Jesuit came up from Fenestrelle and came to me to speak with me about religion.” ‘Is it possible that you are so obstinate in your notions?’ said he. ‘It is not obstinacy,’ I replied; ‘but my salvation is dearer to me than life; and the king may cause me to be cut in pieces, but I will not renounce my religion.’ ‘Do you think you have more abilities than the king?’ said he—‘the king is a decided Catholic.’ ‘I know very well,’ replied I, ‘that my abilities are not to be compared with those of the king; but Jesus Christ said, ‘I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: for so it seemed good in thy sight.’ The Jesuit paused a moment without answering, and then he exclaimed—‘Is it possible that the Vaudois can have disseminated such a religion in this country!’ ‘The Vaudois are not the cause,’ said I. ‘And who is, then?’ he asked. ‘It is God himself who, of his great goodness, has been pleased to make the light of his holy word to shine in these parts.’ ‘Does it not shine in the Church of Rome?' 'Sir,' said I, 'I will give no ambiguous answer upon that point. Jesus tells us that those who confess him before men shall be confessed of him before his Father who is in heaven, and that he will deny all those who deny him; and I would hold myself to have renounced the gospel if I could not make an unreserved appeal to its authority, for its authority alone is Divine.'¹

¹ “Homo sum, et nihil humani a me alienum puto.”

² Parere sopra la tolleranza degl' eretici, in Piemonte. (Civil Archives, No. 461.)

I pass over other details in silence, to come to the most important event of all. As many streams are lost in a great inundation when it breaks out, so all the particular trials which the people of Pragela had at that time to suffer, are lost in the general catastrophe in which they were destroyed. The edict of 20th June, 1730, promulgated under the form of Instructions for the Senate of Pignerol,² renewed all the cruel and restrictive regulations against the Vaudois which had ever been imposed from the most ancient times. It is said, in the twentieth chapter of this exceptional code, "that all those who were born in the Church of Rome, or who had abjured Protestantism, for any reason whatever, before 1686, and who had thereafter entered or returned to the Reformed Church, ought to be condemned to death, in virtue of the edicts anterior to 1686 which declared this penalty against relapsed persons; and that, moreover, all those who, being born Catholics or without the territorial limits of the Vaudois valleys after 1694, had nevertheless followed the Protestant religion, and all those who, having become Catholics since 1686, had in like manner returned to Protestantism, ought to incur the same penalty, to wit, the loss of life: but that, by special grace and extraordinary clemency, worthy to excite the perpetual admiration of grateful people, his majesty would allow them to live, on condition that within six months all persons being in the cases aforesaid, should return to Catholicism or leave the country."

The same influence which had operated upon the old age of Louis XIV. now operated upon that of Victor Amadeus II.—the influence of the prelates and of the Jesuits—which in both courts also was augmented by the immorality of the monarchs. The analogy is remarkable even in particulars; Louis XIV. received the bloody crucifix from the adulterous hands of Madame de Maintenon, at whose feet he was soon to lay down the dignity of his crown; and Victor Amadeus II. became cruel and bigoted, under the like influence of an intriguing ambitious woman, for whose sake he soon after abdicated his throne;¹ whom he married, as the King of France had married the widow of a jester; and who caused him to be cast into prison by her intrigues,² after having dishonoured him by her prostitution.³ Such were the persecutors of the Vaudois, the adversaries of the Bible, the mortal antagonists of all liberty. Vice appears prominently in the first rank, rendering its support to Rome, and under the guidance of Rome.

¹ These last words are not in the manuscript, of which, however, they merely complete the sense.

² This document has been published by Borelli.—It is in the Archives of Turin, in a folio MS. volume with this title, Istruzione a riguardo de Valdesi.

"As to the inhabitants of Pragela, Salabertrans, Bardonnèche, and Chateau Dauphin," it was said in the Draconian code of 1730, "you must consider them all publicly as Catholics, without inquiring what they think, but without suffering any religious exercise, other than that of the Roman religion." Moreover, the French Protestants, who had settled in the Vaudois valleys since 1698, were ordered to depart from them within six months, and prohibited from returning, under penalty of whipping for the first offence, and six years of the galleys for the second. These measures immediately occasioned a great number of emigrations. But they had been preceded by other acts of severity, which made it but too easy to foresee the melancholy conclusion.

"In 1730," says Perron, in his memoirs already quoted, "towards the commencement of February, the Count de la Tuille came with a Jesuit and ten soldiers to the communauté of Usseaux, which is a league and a half from our residence. Seeing in what manner our poor people were treated, I went into the valley of Lucerna, where I spent seventeen days. After I had returned to my village, the count, with his troop, arrived there on the 26th of February. That evening, about nine o'clock, six soldiers came to my house, and asked, 'Is it not here that Jacob Perron lives?'—and I answered from my bed—for I had already gone to bed—'Yes, here I am, what do you want?' They said, 'Get up, and come and speak to the count.' These soldiers escorted me to the priest's house, where I found fifteen persons assembled, amongst whom were the count, the Jesuit, and seven priests. And the Jesuit said to me, 'Here you are then, preacher! for it is you that preach to the rest in this country?' 'Ah, Sir!' said I, 'you make your sport of me.

¹ On 2d September, 1730.

² During the night of 23–29th September, 1730.

³ The pamphlets written at that period against the person here referred to, and whose name I do not give, go much too far in the misconduct which they attribute to her. The term which I employ might be unjust in an absolute sense, but it is certain that she was too intimate with Victor Amadeus II. before the morganatic marriage which united them, and must have taken place between the 4th and the 10th of September, 1730.

Am I capable of being a preacher? Sure enough, there is more learning needed for that purpose than I possess.' 'I know what I say,' he replied; 'and I can prove that you have made some of your folks weep, to prevent them from changing their religion. You have been seen going into houses,' &c. Thereafter the Jesuit said to me, 'Are you not willing to go to mass?' And I answered, 'No, Sir; neither I, nor my children. I was born in my religion, and by the help of God, I mean to die in it.' At these words, the reverend father gave me a blow with his fist on the stomach, and said to the count, 'You see how this rascal answers me!' Then he said to the soldiers, 'Take this man away to prison, and drive him along very hard.' 'Sir,' said I, 'it is better to suffer for well-doing if such is the will of God, than to live' . . . But the soldiers forced me out and conducted me to prison, driving me along very hard, as the Jesuit had said, so that they threw me four times down on the ground, before I arrived there."

He was imprisoned, near the convent, in an apartment the door of which was barricaded with bars stretched across, bound together by cords; and a guard of soldiers was placed over him. "On the day following," says he, "the canon Ponsat came and said to me, 'Are you always the same obstinate man?' 'Truth has not changed since yesterday,' said I. 'Take care!' said he; 'you will be punished in an exemplary manner. Think of your wife who is near her confinement. Your children are young and not healthy. If you die, what will become of your family?' 'God is the widows' stay and the orphans' father,' I replied. 'Let them make of me what they please! Nothing can happen but according to his will; but it is needless to speak to me of changing my religion, for I will never do it.' 'If such is your resolution,' said he, 'I have nothing more to say to you,' and upon this, he withdrew.

"Next day, being the 1st of March, 1730, about ten o'clock in the morning, the Count de la Tuille came and caused me to be brought out. 'Are you always to remain obstinate as to your religion?' said he. 'Sir, I assure you that it is not obstinacy,' I replied, 'for as to any other thing' . . . 'Enough!' said he; 'make your arrangements for leaving the country between this time and to-morrow; and if you are not out of the village with your family to-morrow morning, by ten o'clock, I will have you made fast in a place from which you will not get out.' And I answered, 'Farewell, Sir! since you order me to go, there is an end of it—I will go.' I went to my house to get some luggage packed up, and next day at ten o'clock, I was ready to start. Two beasts carried our baggage, but neither my wife nor my children could go on horseback, because of the bad weather and bad roads, for there was a great deal of snow. And the Jesuit came to my house and said, 'O! it is all a joke! whither would you go, with your wife so near her confinement, and your weakly children, at this time of the year and in such weather? Stay in your own house, and if you keep within doors, you will be left undisturbed.' And he ordered two men who were with me to unload the beasts. But their object was to detain me till my wife's confinement, that they might have the infant baptized as a Catholic, and force us all to go to mass, thinking that if my wife were confined, I would not in these circumstances be able to go. Therefore I replied, 'Sir, as you and the count have ordered me to go, and have already caused me to be maltreated by your soldiers, I am ready and I will go.' And so saying, I set out, holding my children by the hand. A soldier accompanied us out of the village, and that evening I rested at Pourrières, which my wife had very great difficulty in reaching. Next morning, I set out again from Pourrières in dreadful weather, with eleven men to carry, guide, and beat a path for my poor family. We were the first who were driven from that country by persecution in that terrible year. We went by the Col de la Fenêtre, where I thought I would have lost all—wife, child, and life—because of the fearful weather and high wind. But by the help of God I got through it, and rested for the night at Suza."

We shall not follow him through the vicissitudes of his journey; he was compelled almost constantly to have his wife and children carried, because of the difficulty of the roads and the depth of the snows. The dangers of the exiles were particularly great at Mount Cenis, where at that time no practicable road had been formed. Then their muleteers wished to turn back. At Aiguebelle, they refused to go farther. It was necessary to double their wages to get them to convey the exhausted family to Geneva. Perron arrived in that hospitable city on the 10th of March, 1730, and his wife was delivered of a child there a few days after. "To God, only wise, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, be glory, dominion, and power! Amen." Such are the concluding words of the narrative which he has left us.

Sufferings, pains, and sorrows, like those of this exiled family, must have been experienced more or less by all those which followed them. On the 20th of May, 1730, Victor Amadeus ordered the Count de Chiusan to expel from Pragela the most obdurate Vaudois families—that is to say, those most attached to their religion. He offered them, however, permission to remain in their native country, if they would promise to abjure. These families were twenty-three in number; only four availed themselves of the offered conditions, and preferred an earthly country to a heavenly. The other nineteen, composed in all of fifty-nine persons, went into exile with much sorrow, but glorifying God. And the Lord was indeed glorified by their sacrifice even more than by their words. These proscribed families arrived at Geneva in the month of June, and there received the succour needful in their circumstances. They were then scattered in different places throughout the wide canton of Berne, where some of them thenceforth remained. But the greater part of them removed in course of the following year, attaching themselves to the new bands of their emigrant countrymen, who were soon compelled to follow them into Switzerland.¹

Victor Amadeus wrote on the 6th of June to the Count de Chiusan, to express his satisfaction with the execution of his orders of the 20th of May. "The effect has been," said he, "that nobody has left the country, except voluntarily and without violence."² What an absurdity!

After the promulgation of the edict of the 10th of June, 1730, the number of the exiles soon became so considerable, that the government itself became alarmed, and thought it necessary to take measures to prevent the depopulation of the country. But when the keeping of the frontiers was intrusted to the Vaudois militia, these troops not only allowed their emigrant compatriots to pass, but sometimes joined them to forsake that land of bondage. At other times, when the troops were Catholics, they abused their opportunity to plunder the emigrants.³ The people were then forbidden to guard their own frontiers. But this order only rendered it the easier for them to leave the country. Even those who had yielded in their weakness to all the outward forms of an abjuration which was forced upon them, beholding the courage and firmness of those who had left their country rather than yield to such a yoke, recovered themselves, and in more than one instance followed their brethren to foreign lands, to resume along with them the religious worship of their childhood, which they had never ceased to love. They seemed desirous to throw off a sense of degradation, by thus atoning for their apostasy by exile, and for the error of a moment by the faithfulness of the rest of their life.

¹ Du Tillier, Hist. de Berne; MS. vol. 109, p. 90.

² These expressions of the letter of the 6th of June, which I have not seen, are quoted and repeated in the letter of 24th June, 1730, also addressed by the king to the Count de Chiusan. (Turin, Archives of the Court. Category dei Valdesi, No. 499.)

³ The order of 30th July, which withdrew these troops, had for its avowed object to prevent the thefts and robberies which are committed under pretext of religion.—Letter of the minister of the interior to the Bishop of Pignerol, dated from Le Valentin, 5th September, 1730. (Archives of the Bishoprict of Pignerol.)

"I learn with regret," said the minister of the interior, writing from Turin, on the 5th of September, 1730,¹ "that, through a false interpretation of the king's order of date the 3d of July last, which forbids the communities of this province from guarding the places and passes by which numbers of his subjects depart from the kingdom, some new converts have erroneously supposed that they had liberty to leave the country. . . . I have therefore thought it necessary to have the honour to signify to you three or four things which you will say to the priests of your diocese.

"1. I have sent some detachments of troops to apprehend the fugitives. The châtelains are charged to discover the guides who make an infamous trade . . . of conducting the king's subjects across the frontiers. When these wretches are caught, I will cause them to be hanged without form of trial.

"2. I know that there are many falsehoods propagated in that province . . . tending to make the religionaries believe that they will be happier in foreign countries. And thus not only do they expose themselves to the danger of being killed in passing the frontiers, but afterwards, they cannot again come to dwell in Piedmont, and above all, they render themselves guilty of violating the oaths which they have sworn . . . when they embraced Catholicism."

It was made a crime for them to lack faith in the Church of Rome, whatever might have been the violence employed to make them become members of it: and when any one would not abjure, his fidelity to the religion of his deliberate choice and of his conscience was also made a crime for which he perhaps lost his property, his repose, and his life. Such is the equity of oppressors! All this injustice, accompanied with so much cruelty, was not calculated to make the Vaudois love the persecuting church which opened its arms to receive them. And, in fact, a short time after the promulgation of the edict of the 20th of June, a multitude of Protestant refugees made their preparations for departure from the different Vaudois valleys. Six months had been allowed them to abjure or leave the country, and almost all of them left it. The generous intercession of their foreign protectors, and particularly of the King of Prussia, was in vain employed to prevent this disaster.

"We have just learned with much regret," wrote Frederic William I. to Victor Amadeus II.,² "that your majesty has thought proper to order your Protestant subjects of the valley of Pragela forthwith to abandon the religion which they profess, or else to leave the country of their forefathers. As these poor people have not committed any crime which ought to bring upon them the displeasure of your majesty, we cannot but be very sensibly moved, to see them overwhelmed with so great a calamity, and almost entirely plunged into misery. . . . We earnestly beg of you . . . that they may be permitted to remain or to return to their country, there to live as good and faithful subjects of your majesty."¹

¹ Letter just quoted.

² On 25th April, 1730.

Victor Amadeus replied that he held the valley of Pragela in virtue of the treaty of Utrecht, which imposed upon him no obligation in regard to the Vaudois.² But the King of Prussia was not discouraged. "We cannot refrain from signifying to your majesty," said he, "that in virtue of the edict of 23d May, 1694, the Vaudois ought neither to be inquired after nor molested in any way upon account of their religion. . . . The common faith which we profess with these poor people, and which makes us regard them as our brethren in Jesus Christ, is the reason which induces us . . . to entreat your majesty that they may be permitted to enjoy, without interruption, all which the above-mentioned edict provides in their favour. As this is the first mark of friendship which we have asked of your majesty, we hope you will have the goodness not to refuse it."³

"Instead of contravening the edict of 1694," replied Victor Amadeus, "our edict of 20th June, 1730, considerably moderates, in favour of the Vaudois who have contravened the old edicts, the penalties to which they have rendered themselves liable."⁴ "It would have been exceedingly agreeable to us," said Frederic William again, "if it had pleased your majesty to grant something to our intercessions. We entertained all the more hope of this, because it appeared to us that the above-mentioned Vaudois were included in the general provisions of the edict of 1694. However, as your majesty assures us of the contrary, and it belongs to yourself alone to explain the meaning of the edicts which relate to the domestic affairs of your dominions, . . . we still hope to obtain from your clemency what we can no longer venture to expect from your justice. May it please your majesty to consider with an eye of compassion and of pity the sad condition to which these poor people are reduced—not for having committed crimes which should have brought upon them the displeasure of your majesty, but solely because they have followed the guidance of

¹ Dietricici, p. 393.

² His letter is dated from Rivoli, 10th June, 1730.—See Dietricici, p. 399.

³ Dated from Berlin, 14th November, 1730.—Dietricici, 400.

⁴ From Turin, 23d December, 1730.—Dietricici, 401.

their piety, and therefore of the hand of the Almighty, who governs the conscience of man, and is its sole and sovereign Lord."¹ "The matter is ended," was the cold response of the King of Piedmont. "I am sorry for it, but I cannot go back upon it, and I beg your majesty to rest assured of my most perfect friendship."²

In the list of the expatriated Pragelans, we find the name of the notary Guyot, whose son had hoped one day to exercise the functions of the gospel ministry in his native valleys, and was then a student at Geneva.³ Amongst the number of the exiles were also Jacob Perron, the author of the memoirs which I have so often quoted, with his young family;⁴ with them was a poor blind man of sixty years of age,⁵ and the Ronchail family, so cruelly ruined by an iniquitous legal process—also the grave and mild old man who was accustomed to conduct religious exercises at Les Traverses, in the absence of the pastor, and whose wife became the mother of a third child, on her way into exile.⁶ A surgeon named Gonet; Papon, an engineer; Bert, a geometrician; and a great number of persons, torn from the labours of agriculture or the tending of flocks, accompanied them—all displaying the same courage, and all enduring the same distresses. Before the end of the year, more than eight hundred exiles had left the Vaudois valleys and their native land.⁷ Some of them set out for Holland;⁸ others remained in Switzerland, or passed into Germany. Those who remained in Piedmont were compelled to make a public profession of Catholicism; and their children, brought up in that communion, became at last its sincere adherents.

But great dissension and trouble had been occasioned in families.⁹

¹ Dated from Berlin, 17th March, 1731.—Dieterici, 402.

² From Turin, 23th April, 1731.—In extenso, Dieterici, 403.

³ One of his brothers then practised as a surgeon in that city.

⁴ He was fifty-six years of age, and had five children; his brother James was forty-seven years of age, and had nine children. John Perron, the physician, had the same number; and Claude Perron had eight.

⁵ His name was Stephen Cantelme.

⁶ The name of this worthy elder of Les Traverses was John Pastre; his brother Thomas was accompanied by his wife and six children.

⁷ Etat des pauvres persécutés de la vallée de Pragela, cantonnés au pays de Vaud, sortis en 1730.—A MS. of ten folio pages.—Private library of the late M. Appia, pastor at Frankfort-on-the-Maine.—In May, 1730, there were in the canton of Berne, 360 Vaudois of Pragela (Dieterici, pp. 404-407); and towards the end of the year, there were in Switzerland, 840 exiles from the Vaudois valleys. (Id. p. 414.)

⁸ Letter of Cyprian Appia, pastor of St. John, 3d March, 1731.—In my own possession.

⁹ Situation présente des Eglises Vaudoises.—Report by pastor Léger (of Geneva), extending from 12th May to 1st November, 1730.—Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. X. p. 177.

Intestine divisions had arisen, even amongst the pastors of the valleys. I shall speak of them in a subsequent place.

Numerous petitions were addressed to the government, to obtain a mitigation of the cruel measures of the 20th of June. But England and Holland, which interposed with regard to this, could with difficulty obtain some insignificant concessions.¹ These concessions, however, although limited to recommendations that the measures petitioned against should not be enforced with the utmost expedition and severity, excited in the poor expatriated people a hope that persecution was now at last to cease; and the love of their country brought some of them back to their native valley.² An outcry was immediately raised that they came thither to bring back heresy, and they were compelled to conform to the outward ceremonies of Popery, under penalty of the galleys. Some individuals, who had returned secretly to conclude family affairs, and who refused to abjure, were thrown into prison.³

However, means as violent were used to retain the fugitives as had given occasion to their departure. Contrary to the liberty of returning to Protestantism, allowed by the edicts of 1692 and 1694, to those who, having abjured under the influence of coercion, desired to revoke their abjuration, orders were issued in 1733, that all persons who had made profession of the Romish religion before 1686, or who, without having made such profession, had been baptized according to its rites, should remain faithful to it, and not leave the dominions of the King of Piedmont, under penalty of confiscation of goods and of the galleys.⁴

Sometimes families were met with in which either the husband or wife did not come within the range of these measures, whilst the other was threatened with their application. It was sufficient, for example, that an infant had received baptism in the Catholic church when newly born, in order that that event, forgotten afterwards in the constant profession of Protestantism, should serve as a

¹ The letter of the States-General of Holland is of 7th November, 1730, and the reply of Victor Amadeus II. of 2d December. The letter of the King of England (George II.) is of 23d February, 1731. A special memorandum on this question was afterwards presented by his ambassador at the court of Turin, under date 27th April, 1731. All these documents are at Turin, in the Archives of the Court.

² About the beginning of 1732.

³ For example, a man named Grill. A letter of 7th March, 1733, says of him, "He is now a prisoner of the Senate of Turin. . . . His property has been confiscated, and his family, consisting of fifteen persons, is reduced to the most dreadful misery." (Correspondence of the moderator of the Vaudois church, from 18th February, 1733, to 4th March, 1734. A manuscript volume containing twenty-two letters. In my possession.)

⁴ Same correspondence. Letter of 12th July, addressed to M. Turretin, rector of the Academy of Geneva.

pretext for incessant vexations. This child might have become a man, might be married, might have a family, and be the stay of a new generation, but all this went for nothing: like the sword of Damocles, the awful recollection of a vain ceremony, of which he had no knowledge, hung suspended over his life; so that, on the ground of this unfortunate baptism, received in his childhood, he was tormented all the rest of his days, and violence was done to his most sacred affections.

Two mothers of families were thus situated. At first, they fled from the rigour of the edict; but maternal love brought them back to their families, and "so soon as they came back," says a letter from the valleys,¹ "they were obliged to conceal themselves. The first time, their husbands sent them away again immediately."² At present, the Marquis of Angrogna has in vain exerted himself in their favour. . . . Their father had changed his religion a number of years before 1686; they were therefore born and baptized Catholics." When they grew up, they embraced the Protestant religion, but by the edict of 1730, they were required either to remain in exile or to return to Popery. "Mary Ponsat (by birth Danne), has done very wrong in coming back," adds the same letter. "The vicar Danne said to her, in presence of witnesses, that she had better not go to the preaching, or she would bring herself into trouble, and likewise the minister" (who admitted her where he officiated). "Anthony Geymet, who is also returned, is in great perplexity," &c. . . . "We dare no longer assemble for any business," it is said in another letter, "except in synod and by express permission of his majesty, in consequence of the process which has been instituted against five of our number who had met to consult about public business."³ The greater part of those who had returned to their native country, were therefore compelled to leave it again. Some of them were doubly disappointed, both by failing to find the advantages which they expected in foreign lands, and by the unexpected obstacles which they encountered on their return to their own.

Numbers of these unhappy emigrants, especially of those who belonged to the valley of Pragela, having been so long deprived of regular religious instruction, did not worthily maintain the ancient reputation of the Vaudois Church which they left, or in which rather they preferred to remain when they forsook their native country. "There are some of them," said a letter from Berne,¹ "whose ignorance and inconsiderateness are extraordinary. They receive our alms, and then they go away home again. Most of these poor people say, that if they had had this little supply in the valleys, they would have lived upon it for the winter, instead of spending it in travelling. I have observed in them so great an ignorance, that their pastors must certainly be to blame. It would be necessary for them to send us a list of those among them, who stand most in need of relief. Their excellencies of Berne are very charitable, . . . but the committee intrusted with the affairs of the Vaudois, is now by no means satisfied."² "This gentleman is very hard upon us!" wrote Pastor Reynaudin, after these observations; "his idea of drawing up a precise and accurate report of the poor of each church, could never be carried into effect, because in these circumstances, every one becomes poor, and then all are in want. I will not add that he is wrong in arguing from the ignorance or folly of a few to that of the general body; . . . but it is easy for persons such as he, whose position is a sort of paradise in comparison with ours, to find something to blame in folks like us, already sufficiently pressed down by misfortune, and the weight of many a heavy cross,"³ &c. . . .

¹ Letter of 12th June, 1733. (Same correspondence.)

² It will be seen that these unhappy mothers had now returned for the second time to their homes.

³ Same correspondence. Letter of 24th August, 1733.

But the fault found with the pastors of the valleys, related especially to the great number of their flocks whom they had allowed to leave home, and who now were a burden on those that had received them. "When I was at Berne," replied the moderator,⁴ "I was entirely ignorant of the departure of so great a number of families. I was exceedingly grieved at meeting so many of them on the road. Although our friends in Geneva had written to us, that they would receive all who were in danger of giving way, . . . I always exhorted them to have patience, and not to set out without having some certain assurance that they would be received. They came to my house in a crowd, to obtain attestations, which I absolutely refused, for which I have been in danger of suffering at their hands. All these poor people set out during my absence. A report was spread, that those who had set out for Holland, had received thirty crowns each, which has been an inducement to many; who, not having the means of

¹ Letter of M. de Frey, of 15th October, 1733. (Same correspondence.)

² All these fragments of this letter are selected in such a manner as of themselves to indicate facts, the knowledge of which is necessary to the history, but which the restricted limits of this work prevent me from fully exhibiting.

³ These observations occur immediately after the letter above quoted, and are written in Reynaudin's own hand.

⁴ Same correspondence. Letter of 2d November, 1733.

subsistence, and neither choosing to beg nor to abjure, have gone away upon that hope." "Others, more unprincipled—there are such persons everywhere—had no other motive than their own private interest, and finding themselves disappointed, they have come back, with threats and outcries, to their four empty walls, which they accuse the members of the consistory and the pastors of having persuaded them to leave . . . This affair has become very serious; precognitions are taken, and prosecutions threatened against many innocent persons." The author of the letter begs his correspondent to receive a declaration to the contrary from several people, and to send him that document, legally attested. "Do not lose time in sending it to me," he says; "the case is urgent, and God grant that it may arrive before they take any other steps. See to what we are exposed! Moses had not more difficulties, in leading the people of Israel, than we have in our parishes," &c. . . .

These quotations are sufficient to give an idea of the state to which the Vaudois church was then reduced. Decimated by proselytism, ignorance, poverty, and exile—burdened with the maintenance of its own pastors and schoolmasters—full of troubles, caused by the last struggles of its ancient faith, and the first assaults of that spirit of unbelief, which did it so much injury in the eighteenth century—we shall soon see it wearying itself in fruitless agitations, amidst the vicissitudes of a period characterized by the want of glory and of dignity.

Here terminates the history of the Protestant Church of Pragela. The senate of Turin still issued another decree to prohibit emigrations,¹ which shows that they had not ceased at that date; but the greater part of those who were resolute in their Protestantism had already departed. These expatriated Vaudois mingled with those who had founded the now rising colonies in Germany. The villages of Waldorf and Frederichsdorf, in particular, were thus increased. Another portion of these exiles settled in Holland; some went to America; some remained in Switzerland, especially in the Bernese Oberland.² Those who remained upon the banks of the Cluson and the Doire, were thenceforth considered as Catholics, in virtue of the instructions of 20th June, 1730, which gave the final stroke to this long oppressed people.

There were a few rare exceptions—a small number of families still continuing secretly attached to the doctrine of the gospel in Pragela, as if to attest the previous existence of the Vaudois church there. There, where the gospel had reigned, the last triumph of Popery was to commit it to the flames, amidst these same mountains, by the hands of priests, a century after the events which have just been narrated.¹ Amidst the enlightenment of our age, Rome is still as much estranged from modern civilization, as she is from the primitive church. Like the relics which she adores, she is herself merely the rubbish of past times, surrounded with an unmerited veneration. When we now behold so many nations aspiring after liberty, and liberty always showing itself favourable to the gospel, it is impossible to believe in the long duration of that degrading tyranny, which deprives man of the liberty of his very conscience, and proscribes the word of God. Happy are those countries in which the despotism of Popery has exercised its fatal influence with no other effect than that of producing martyrs!

¹ Under date 9th October, 1733. Prohibition, sotto pena corporale, a noi arbitraria, da estendersi sino alle morte, secondo le circostanze delle persone e de casi, oltre la confiscazione de beni, to go out of the kingdom without special permission. (Archives of Lo Villar. MS. vol. Religionarii, folio 177.)

² Du Tillier, Hist. de Berne, 133, 134. Muller, Hist. de la confédération suisse. . . . continuée par Monnard et Vuillemin, xiv., 42.

¹ Some copies of the Bible and of the Gospels were recently seized in Pragela, by Catholic missionaries. These ecclesiastics resolved to destroy with their own hands the Bibles which they had seized. For this purpose they prepared a pile, with all the pomp of an auto-da-fé, in the garden of the priest of La Rua, and there solemnly burned the Holy Scriptures. This took place on the 18th of June, 1838. The names of these missionaries were Grant, Marjollet, and Villien. (Note communicated.)

CHAPTER XIX.

HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS FROM THE EXPULSION OF 1698 TO THAT OF 1730THE DUKE OF SAVOY IN THE VALLEY OF LUCERNA—THE REPUBLIC IN THAT OF ST. MARTIN.¹

Results of the edicts of expulsion—Good brought out of evil—Pastors obtained from Switzerland—Zeal of the ministers—Loyalty of the people—Political events—Disputes concerning the succession to the throne of Spain—Political perfidy of Victor Amadeus—War between France and Savoy—Victor Amadeus seeks again to win the support of the Vaudois—Services rendered to him by their militia—New French refugees arrive in the valleys—Events of the war—Successes of the French—Exploits of the Vaudois—The valley of St. Martin becomes a republic under French protection—Brief and unfortunate existence of the republic of St. Martin—Continued triumphs of the French—The Duke of Savoy finds refuge amongst the Vaudois—He makes further efforts to conciliate them—Final defeat of the French at Turin—The Duke of Savoy regains possession of his lost territories—Further progress of the war—Treaty of Utrecht—Afflicted condition of the Vaudois, after the termination of the war—The Vaudois subjected to many vexations, through the influence of the Propaganda—Expulsion of Protestants of foreign birth, in 1730—Religious and moral condition of the Vaudois at this period.

IN virtue of the edict of 1st July, 1698, all the French refugees, exiled by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, who had retired into the Vaudois valleys, on the express invitation of Victor Amadeus II.,² were obliged to quit that asylum, and proceeded, along with a portion of the native inhabitants of Pragela, and many other Vaudois families who were allied to them, to found those colonies in Germany whose history has been traced in the preceding chapters. This event, which deprived the Vaudois valleys of a considerable part of their population, could not fail to be very grievous in its effects upon the interests of these valleys—to which, certainly, the measure that brought it about was intended to be in the highest degree unfavourable. This unexpected and cruel expulsion of the half of a people, violently broken up and driven into exile, like a garment torn to shreds and flung upon the winds, may well be regarded as a new persecution.

But it must needs have been for good reasons that Providence permitted this catastrophe; and now, when the dust raised by this sudden change no longer blinds the eyes of the historian, we cannot fail to perceive the providential influence which this elimination of all strangers from amongst the Vaudois must have had on the integrity, perpetuation, and preservation of this Israel of the Alps, already so much tried by calamities, as distinct and separate from other peoples, in the sphere and situation which had been appointed for them. This measure had been adopted by the King of Piedmont, only upon the reiterated, and perhaps imperious representations of Louis XIV., whose Catholic rage pursued his fugitive subjects even into the asylum of foreign hospitality; and Victor Amadeus, whilst he closed that asylum against the exiles of other nations, conveyed to the native inhabitants of the Vaudois valleys his renewed assurances of their continued and undisturbed tranquillity.¹ His views were entirely political; the results were entirely religious, but they were not developed till a later period.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—All of them are unpublished documents of no great magnitude. They are indicated at the bottom of each page.

² Edicts of June, 1692, and May, 1694.

Being deprived of the seven pastors of foreign birth, who were obliged to leave Piedmont before the 1st of September, 1698, the Vaudois church held an extraordinary synod at Bobi, on the 12th of August of the same year, in order to make immediate provision for the parishes which were about to become, or which already had become destitute of a stated ministry; and the six pastors who were Vaudois by birth, and who alone remained in the valleys, divided amongst themselves the duty of supplying them.² New appointments were also made of members of the Vaudois table.³

¹ The letter of Victor Amadeus II., addressed for this purpose to Count Martiniano, governor of Pignerol, is dated 23d August, 1698; he charges him to say to the Vaudois, che puono con ogni quiette e sicuritta, applicarsi a luor affari domestici; poiche proveranno sempre gli effetti della sua reggia prottettione (sic).—Count Martiniano wrote accordingly, but at more length, to Sieur Pasca, the podestat of the valley of Lucerna, who in his turn made the substance of the king's communication known in all the Vaudois communes.—(Archives of Le Villar; vol. Religionarii, fol. 107.)

² This division was made as follows:—LÉGER, pastor of Bobi, united to this parish that of Le Villar; MALANOT, pastor of Angrogna, united St. John to it. These two pastors were also jointly to supply the parish of La Tour. REYNAUDIN, pastor of Pral, was to remove to Ville Sèche, and to unite Le Pomaret to his field of labour. BERTIN remained at Maccl, but was also to supply the parish of Pral. JAMES JAHIER, pastor of Pramol, was also to supply Rora. BERNARD JAHIER was to unite to his parish of St. Germain those of Prarusting and Rocheplate.—The synod adds that “if the Divine Providence should ever recal to these valleys the pastors now compelled to leave them, they should each of them return to the church which they left.”

³ THE MODERATOR, Henry Arnaud, was succeeded by David Léger, Moderator Adjunct. The latter office was confided to Malanot; and the office of SECRETARY, occupied by David Jordan, was given to Laurence Bastie.

At the same time, the king was petitioned to allow pastors to be brought for a time from Switzerland, to succeed the French ministers;¹ and his permission having been obtained, application was made by letter to the Academy of Geneva, which hastened to make provision for the wants represented.² The synod likewise asked, that the course of study of the Vaudois students, who were preparing for the ministry of the gospel, under the care of the Swiss Faculties of Theology, should be accelerated as much as possible; and, finally, it stated the pressing necessities of the valleys—the debts with which their communes were burdened—the destitution of the inhabitants—the distress, the penury, the want of work—the bad harvests, and the impossibility of the Vaudois providing for the maintenance of their pastors without foreign aid.³ This aid was not refused—it was manifested that the members of the same body have a mutual interest in each other; and the inexhaustible charity of Protestants, at that time more happily situated than those of Piedmont, enabled the latter to carry on their public worship and their schools, which they had, indeed, till then, themselves supported with a patient and devoted zeal.

Besides the general meetings of their synods, which took place only once or twice in a year, and afterwards so unfrequently as once every five years, the pastors of each Vaudois valley had then

¹ Captain Pastre and Joseph Donneaud were deputed to Turin for this purpose by the synod of 1698.

² Archives of Berne, compartment E. Letter of the Moderator (23.1 September, 1698), recommending the departing pastors.—Archives of the Venerable Company of Geneva, vol. O, pp. 499, 510, &c., and vol. Q, pp. 20, 82, &c. (concerning the request for Swiss pastors and their being sent).—The Swiss pastors who came to the valleys, and the parishes where they were placed, were as follows:—DUBOIS, at Bobi; DIND, at Le Villar; SENEBIER, at La Tour; DECOPPET, at St. Jean; and DUTOIT at Prarusting. The Vaudois pastors assigned to themselves the poorest, most mountainous, and most difficult parishes—to wit, BERTIN, at Rora; MALANOT, at Angrogna; J. JAHIER, at Pramol; B. JAHIER, at St. Germain; DAVID LÉGER, at Le Pomaret (where he was succeeded two years after by JAMES LÉGER, whilst he himself went to Ville Sèche); LAWRENCE BERTIN, at Mancille and at Maccl (where he was succeeded next year by HENRIOD); and PAUL REYNAUDIN, at Pral and at Rodoret.—These arrangements were made in the year 1699.—Reynaudin went to Bobi in 1705, to succeed PORTAZ, who himself had succeeded DECOPPET in 1703.—M. SENEBIER left the valleys in 1700 (the letter recalling him is dated November, 1699); but in 1701, two Vaudois ministers were ordained, JOHN JAHIER and CHARLES BASTIE.

³ Mémoire touchant l'état politique et ecclésiastique des Vaudois, par rapport au pressant besoin d'assistance qu'ils réclament pour acquitter leurs dettes. (Archives of the Venerable Company of Geneva, vol. Q, p. 83.)—This memorial was sent to the Duke of Zell—to the Archbishop of Canterbury—to the Bishop of Salisbury, for his British Majesty—to M. Spanheim, professor at Leyden, for the States-General of Holland—to the Count of Dhona, for the Elector of Brandenburg—to the first pastor of the Court of Hesse-Cassel—and to M. Herwart, envoy of the King of England in Switzerland.

their separate Colloques,¹ which met every month.² They preached in their parishes twice every Sabbath, and conducted a meeting for prayer, accompanied with religious instruction, every day of the week.³ A minister, who had no parish, did not scruple to undertake personally the charge of the school of La Tour.⁴ The parishes threatened with deprivation of public worship, did not shrink from the heaviest sacrifices, in order to maintain it.⁵ The temporary suspension of the subsidies, which Queen Anne had granted to the Vaudois pastors, caused no abatement of their activity in any of the functions of their ministry.⁶

The cruel returns which the Vaudois received at the hands of their sovereign, in acts of arbitrary violence, did not prevent them from giving proof of their fidelity to him upon many occasions. When a revolt broke out at Mondovi, in June, 1700, the Vaudois militia contributed greatly to its suppression.

Victor Amadeus II. had then a difference with the court of Rome,⁷ on the subject of the Monarchy of Sicily;⁸ and this difference continued throughout twenty years. Nor was it long till he

¹ [Or Presbyteries.]

² In the Synodal Acts of 10th February, 1699, we read: "The pastors of the Colloque of Val Lucerna shall supply the church of Rora time about." (Archives of the Table.)

³ The pastors who came from Switzerland were authorized to have only one sermon on Sabbath and one catechetical exercise during the week; but only for the first year of their ministry in the valleys. (Same source.)

⁴ This was Abraham Henriot, who also was from Switzerland.—1699–1700.—The school was a Latin and Italian one.—See the Acts of the Synod of 19th July, 1701.

⁵ In the Synodal Acts of the 28th of October, 1699, we read: "The church of Prarusting having been obliged to expend nearly 300 livres in order to maintain the exercise of public worship, its right to which was disputed . . . all the other churches of the valleys are strongly recommended to stretch out their hand for its aid . . . to mark their union and Christian charity."—The rescript of Victor Amadeus, authorizing the Vaudois of Prarusting to have a place of worship, is dated 20th October, 1699. (Turin. Archives of the Court of Accounts. Regio controrollo generale. Year 1699. No. 199. Fol. 112.) A report concerning the erection of the place of worship and the old site at Rocheplate, on which it was required that the new one should be built, are to be found in the Archives of State. (Category, Valdesi, No. 488.)

⁶ See the Synodal Acts of June, 1700, and July, 1701.

⁷ Mercurie historique, XVIII. 16, 238; XX. 7, 128, 616; XXI. 235, 355, 480, &c. All these references belong to dates included between July, 1700, and November, 1702.

⁸ Urban II., by a bull dated 5th July, 1098, had granted to Roger, Count of Sicily, that a tribunal, called the Monarchy of Sicily, should have the right of judging supremely and without appeal in all ecclesiastical affairs. Clement XI. disputed the privileges of this institution with Victor Amadeus II.; and finally published, on 20th February, 1715, a Constitution in order to its abolition. An appeal was taken from this bull to a Pope better informed; and the dispute was prolonged to the death of the pontiff.

was again in a state of hostility with France, and had brought upon his dominions the scourge of war, more terrible than all the dissatisfaction of Rome. In 1701, having recognized the Duke of Anjou as King of Spain, he gave him his second daughter in marriage.¹ But soon after, being drawn into a contrary course of policy, he turned against his son-in-law, having deceived France and Spain during two years, with that high-born duplicity, which is dignified with the name of diplomacy, but which would deprive the art of government of all dignity, if it were its necessary basis or means. These capricious fluctuations of a policy, which sacrificed everything to interest, and which remained constant only in its inflexible selfishness, breaking with equal indifference the bonds of honour and of affection to take part always with the strongest, present a melancholy spectacle, repulsive to upright minds.

All the powers of Europe confirmed the choice of the Duke of Anjou, as King of Spain, with the exception of Austria, which saw with jealousy a prince of the royal family of France ascend the throne of Charles II.² But the whole German empire, with England and Holland, soon formed a league,³ for the dethronement of this monarch. The old animosities of these powers against Louis XIV., who supported him, were their true motives for this conduct.

Victor Amadeus, having been named Generalissimo of the armies of France and Spain in Italy,⁴ instead of defending his son-in-law with affection, and faithfully maintaining the cause of his ally, entered into secret engagements with their enemies. The house of Austria promised him Montferrat as the price of his defection; and doubly perfidious, he still fought against the imperial forces in several encounters. This course of conduct was pursued for two years. The imperial armies, commanded by Prince Eugene, and the French troops, commanded by Catinat, met in Piedmont about the middle of the year 1701.⁵ The Marshal de Catinat re-

¹ Louise Gabrielle, of Savoy, who was married by proxy, on 11th September, 1701.—The Duke of Anjou, born 19th December, 1653, was called to the crown of Spain, on 2d October, 1700, by the latter will of Charles II., who in that deed referred to the rights of Maria Theresa, the grandmother of the Duke of Anjou. In virtue of this deed, he was declared King of Spain, by the name of Philip V., at Fontainebleau, on 16th November, 1700; and on the 24th of the same month, at Madrid, which he entered on 14th April, 1701.—The treaty of Utrecht alone (11th April, 1713) gave him peaceable possession of this disputed throne.

² The predecessor of Philip V., in Spain.

³ Signed on 7th September, 1701.

⁴ In September, 1701.

⁵ On 9th July, 1701, was fought the battle of Carpi on the Adige;—on 1st September, the battle of Chiari, near the Oglio. There were numerous skirmishes.

ceived a number of little checks, one after the other, which he could not ascribe entirely to the skill of his adversary. He suspected the connivance of the Duke of Savoy with the enemy, and imparted his suspicions to the court of Versailles, which repelled them. But eighteen months afterwards, Louis XIV. was no longer able to doubt that they were well-founded; and suddenly adopting one of those energetic resolutions, which seem natural to men whose haughty disposition and strength of will have been developed by the habitual exercise of an undisputed power, he ordered the Duke de Vendôme to disarm, and retain as prisoners, the troops of the Duke of Savoy in the Milanese.¹ These orders were executed. Three hundred and forty Piedmontese officers found themselves suddenly deprived of liberty, and distributed in different fortresses.

This news reached Turin on the 1st of October, 1703. The gates were immediately closed; the greatest agitation prevailed in the court and in the city; the French ambassador was arrested in his house;² and the French who were resident in Turin received orders not to go beyond its walls. All the available troops were called to active service; those which were in Ivree and elsewhere were recalled to the fortifications—the relations with Austria became more intimate.³ The Duke of Savoy sought to rally all his forces; and the following are the terms in which he made the Vaudois acquainted with these events:—

“Dear and well-beloved trusty subjects,—Unparalleled violence having been done by France, contrary to the good faith of treaties and the law of nations, in the disarming of our troops who were in its service in the Milanese—the retaining of our officers prisoners—and the marching of a body of troops for the invasion of our dominions; . . . we acquaint you with it, being persuaded that the same motive which led you on all occasions in former wars to display such fidelity and zeal in our service, will induce you to give us no less proof thereof in this war, which is much more important. You will require, for this purpose, without loss of time to form your companies, as you did in the last war, and to receive all the French refugees who may wish to come to your valleys; you will do well even to invite them to come, that they may act in concert with you. Our commissaries will provide for the subsistence of these troops. . . . The matter concerns the preservation of our dominions, our glory, and our safety. . . . And in respect hereof, we pray God to take you under his good and holy protection.”¹

¹ Louis XIV. wrote at the same time to Victor Amadeus: “Sir, since religion, honour, interest, alliances, and your own signature, avail nothing between us, I send my cousin, the Duke de Vendôme, at the head of my armies, to explain to you my intentions.” (Lamberty, Part II. p. 564.)

² The same thing was done with regard to the Spanish ambassador. (Merc. hist. XXIV., 508.)

³ On the 25th of October, 1703, the treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, was signed between Savoy and Austria, by which the latter power guaranteed to Victor Amadeus the possession of the Mantuan Montferrat, the price agreed upon for the defection of that prince. (Art de vérifier les dates.)

The Vaudois immediately organized thirty-four companies of their valiant militia, and soon attracted attention by some brilliant exploits. “The Duke of Savoy having permitted them to name a commandant for themselves,” we read in a statement published at that time, “they, towards the end of the year, made choice of M. De Malanot, who was one of their captains in the preceding war.”² They have already made several incursions into the frontiers of Provence and Dauphiny, and have exacted a contribution of fifty thousand livres from the latter province, besides a great number of cattle. They have offered this money to his royal highness, but he has been pleased to leave it in their hands, in order to give them the means of arming and equipping themselves better.”³ Moreover, so long as the Vaudois were useful to him, Victor Amadeus treated those with severity who brought complaints to him against them.⁴

This people, always exposed to the severest hardships, either through the tyranny of their kings, when their kings were powerful, or through their own devotion to their cause, when they were threatened with danger, signalized themselves again by new exploits in the year 1704. But in the meantime, their ranks were augmented by a crowd of French refugees, who came from Switzer-

¹ This letter is dated from Turin, 5th October, 1703.—It was sent to each of the Vaudois pastors, with another letter addressed to themselves personally, and bearing also the signature of Victor Amadeus—the address being in the following style:—To our dear, well-beloved, and liege N. minister of . . .—These documents may be seen in LAMBERTY, Mémoire pour servir à l'histoire du dix-huitième siècle, t. II.; Mercure historique, XXI. 629. The letter of Victor Amadeus to the Vaudois, is also in Moser, Proof Documents, No. 18; and in Erman and Reclam, vol. VI.—I have quoted only the part essential for the history.

² This passage is exactly copied from the Mercure historique, vol. XXV., January, 1704.—However, I must observe that the particle which may precede any name amongst the Vaudois, has, according to their usage, nothing to do with any indication of noble birth—although the reader might be apt to think so from the name of this commandant as given above.—When a number of persons bear the same name, they are distinguished by that of the place where they dwell, preceded by the (contracted) article. But no distinction of rank is connected amongst them with these designations.

³ Mercure historique, XXV. 136.

⁴ The governor of Fort Mutino, who came to complain against the inhabitants of the valleys, was arrested at Pignerol.” Merc. hist. XXIV. 509.

land¹ and from the Cevennes. The latter had taken up arms against Louis XIV. in the beginning of 1703. "This is no revolt," said they in their manifesto,² "nor a rebellion of subjects against their sovereign. We have always been obedient and faithful to him. . . . But a law of nature obliges us to repel force by force; otherwise we would be to blame for our own misfortunes; and would be traitors to our religion, to ourselves, and to our country," &c. But notwithstanding the intrepidity of their leaders, they were crushed;³ and the inhabitants of Orange, who maintained their resistance longest, were banished, and retired into Prussia. The fugitives of the Cevennes, upon whose heads a price was set, or whose properties had been confiscated, retired to the valleys.

The forces of Victor Amadeus received a valuable accession in these brave partizans, inured to privations and dangers. In his prosperity, however, he had prohibited the Vaudois from giving them an asylum;⁴ and at a subsequent period he was again to banish them.⁵ But at the time to which our history now relates, they were welcomed, and all the more gladly the more that his dominions were threatened by the enemy. The Duke de la Feuillade⁶ had made himself master of the whole of Savoy,⁷ and thereafter soon crossed the Alps. In June, 1704, he took the town and castle of Suza. A few days after, the Duke de Vendôme took Vercueil,⁸ where almost 6000 men were made prisoners. Ivrée soon afterwards suffered the same fate.⁹

Whilst the Duke de Vendôme thus pursued his successful career, the Duke de la Feuillade endeavoured to detach the Vaudois valleys from the cause of their sovereign. After having occupied Suza, he turned towards our valleys. He first offered them exemption from all the calamities of war, if they would preserve neutrality between him and the Duke of Savoy.¹⁰ This fact suffices to

¹ Louis XIV. sent an agent, M. de Puisseaux, to obtain from the Swiss government the prevention of the French refugees who were in Switzerland, from going to take arms under the banners of the Duke of Savoy.—Long conferences ensued.—See the Mercure historique, XXIV. 512, 634, 641, 648; XXV. No. for January, &c.

² Dated 17th February, 1703.—Separately printed.

³ See the histories of the Camisards.—Lamberty, II. &c.

⁴ In April, 1703, "the Duke of Savoy sent for some of the principal inhabitants of the valleys, and declared to them that he forbade them, under severe penalties, to have any dealings with the insurgents of the Cevennes, or to give shelter to any of them," &c. . . . Mercure historique, XXIII. 355.

⁵ By the Instructions of 20th June, 1730. ⁶ Others say the Marshal de Tessé.

⁷ Except the fort of Montmellian, which did not surrender till 1705. The fortifications were then demolished.

⁸ Suza was taken on the 12th of June, and Vercueil on the 21st of July.

⁹ On 30th September, 1704.

¹⁰ Mercure historique, XXVI. 140.

demonstrate the importance of their services in war. "The inhabitants of the valleys of St. Martin and St. Germain, who are the most exposed, were strongly enough inclined to this neutrality; but M. Vandermeer, the minister of the states-general, having repaired thither with M. Arnaud,¹ completely re-animated the resolution of the people, and caused the designs of the French to fail. Thereupon the marshal, perceiving that he could effect nothing by negotiation, attacked the valleys from all sides. He caused M. de Lapara to assail the fort of Miraboue,² whilst he himself, with the rest of his troops, entered the valley of St. Martin and took possession of it.³ From thence he passed into that of St. Germain, where he met with much resistance on the part of the Vaudois, who guarded the approaches to the valley, but were at last compelled to yield to the superior forces of the enemy. However, the Marquis de Parelles having arrived with orders for the militia of the neighbouring districts to march to the aid of the Vaudois, and the Duke of Savoy having also sent some regular troops, the people of the valleys of St. Germain sent their wives, their children, and their movable effects into the neighbouring communes and into the woods, after which they assembled anew under the command of M. de St. Hippolyte.⁴ They began, that same day, to reconquer the positions which they had lost, and on the 1st of July, they attacked the French at Angrogna, and defeated them, having on their own side only five men killed and seven wounded. This so disconcerted the enemy, that they began secretly to quit the heights around Angrogna, and gradually abandoned the whole of the valley of Angrogna, as well as that of Lucerna."⁵

¹ This was Henry Arnaud, who had led the Vaudois in their return to their country in 1639, who was banished in 1698, and who returned to the valleys in 1703. He then exercised his ministry in the church of St. John, as we learn from a Report, of date 27th December, 1706, in which it is said, The church of St. John is now supplied by M. Henry Arnaud, as provisional minister. (State of the Churches of the Valleys. Private library of M. Appia, at Frankfort.) Shortly after this, Arnaud went to London, for he was there in 1707.—According to tradition, he wished to extend to the valley of Lucerna the republican government which that of St. Martin had adopted, and a price was set upon his head. (I received this tradition from the last of the Vaudois pastors in Wurtemberg, M. Mondon, successor to Arnaud's son at Gros Villar, who died not long ago, almost 100 years of age.—Another son of Arnaud was appointed pastor of Pomaret in 1713.—The name of the former was Scipio, that of the latter was Vincent.)

² On 20th June, 1704.

³ His troops continued to occupy it till 8th August, 1703. (Notarial attestation of this occupation, of date 18th May, 1713.—Archives of Le Perrier.)

⁴ On 30th June, 1704.

⁵ The fort of Miraboue, which had been besieged, was relieved by the Vaudois on 14th July, 1704.—The whole passage within inverted commas is extracted from the Mercur historique, XXVI. 140, et seq.

The valley of St. Martin was not, however, evacuated in the same manner. The Duke de la Feuillade persuaded a few communes to erect an independent republic,¹ under the protection of Louis XIV. His object was to have a footing for his troops in Piedmont, and to divide the country and weaken the authority of Victor Amadeus. Moreover, the valley of St. Martin is one of the strongest in the Alps. It is not only its extent that renders it important, but also its position. And the Vaudois had acquired a renown, which made them appear to a stranger greater than they really were. This people were regarded as a sort of power—as one of the lowest rank, no doubt, but better known, however, than many others which had a right to that designation. This explains how Louis XIV. condescended to sign, with all the forms of a serious treaty, that inconceivable piece of mystification or puerile stratagem of war, which gave a nominal existence for four years to the republic of St. Martin.²

The following are the principal provisions of this treaty:—"The leaders, elders, syndics, councillors, captains, and other officers of the valley of St. Martin, Pomaret, Envers-Pinache, and Chenevières, both Catholics and those of the pretended Reformed religion" (1), Shall erect themselves into and shall be recognized as a republic, under the protection of the King of France and his successors. (2) They shall make their own laws, which shall be approved and maintained by his most Christian majesty. (3) They shall establish amongst themselves liberty of conscience, with exception that the French refugees shall not be permitted to come and enjoy it. (4) *For the strengthening and defence of the said republic, his majesty shall maintain there the troops necessary.*³

¹ He had attempted to persuade the communes of Val Lucerna to the same effect, but without success.—Loc. cit. p. 248.

² Its existence not being mentioned by any historian, I have thought it necessary to quote a large number of testimonies in support of this fact.—The same remark applies to the sojourn of Victor Amadeus at Rora, which has been disputed.—Hence the great number of notes in the following pages.

³ The words in italics are the very words of the treaty.—It contained seven articles in all, which sometimes descend to trifles of no political importance. The fifth article stipulates in name of the Vaudois: "That his majesty and his successors shall always furnish them [leur fournira] with salt at Le Perrier, at two sols per pound." At the bottom of the treaty are these words, "We, being satisfied with the above treaty, accept it, and promise to observe it invariably in all points, in testimony whereof we have signed these presents with our hand, and have caused our privy seal to be attached to them.—At Versailles, 25th July, 1704." Signed Louis, countersigned Colbert. (Treaty agreed upon between the Duke de la Feuillade and the inhabitants of the valley of St. Martin, 15th July, 1704.—Turin, Archives of the Court, No. 486.) According to a memorial of that period, the proposals of the French general, on this subject, were in the first instance rejected by the Vaudois of the Val Pécrouze and of the Val St. Martin,

This was all that La Feuillade wanted; and that I may not have to return to the subject, I may here state that the history of this ephemeral republic was fraught with calamity, both to those who were included in it, and to their neighbours. The French troops being located there, according to the treaty, and continuing to occupy it during the whole time of its existence,¹ made hostile incursions into the neighbouring regions.² Vagabonds from all parts congregated in it, coming to seek an asylum.³ The pastors and schoolmasters ceasing to be supported by a share of the English subsidies,⁴ and perhaps banished by some popular caprice, were compelled to remove from it, and became wanderers, without means of subsistence;⁵ primary instruction and Divine worship fell rapidly into decay;⁶ and when the people desired to have pastors, young men, without any orderly call to the office, were invited to but he seized their properties, and it was in order to regain possession of them that they consented to this treaty. (Mémoire pour les Eglises évangéliques des vallées du Pragela, 1704-1707. Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. R.)

¹ Till 8th August, 1708.—Notarial attestation, in the Archives of Le P'rierri.

² "The church of St. Germain, in the valley of Pérouse, is at present abandoned by the inhabitants, and without exercise of religion, because of the enemy, who have entirely ruined and burned it. It has no minister nor schoolmaster, because they are obliged to seek refuge in the neighbourhood, a little farther out of the way of the enemy.—The church of Pramol is equally deserted by the parishioners, because of the enemy, who have indeed burned the greater part of it, and they have been obliged to withdraw themselves to other parts of the valleys." (Mémoire sur l'état des vallées, 27th December, 1706.)—[The word church (église) here must be taken for the district occupied by the church or congregation.]

³ "This valley having fallen into rebellion is now inhabited by the dregs and scum of diverse peoples . . . who bear arms against his royal highness."—Mémoire pour les églises évangéliques du Piémont, 1704-1707.—Geneva, Archives of the Venerable Company of Pastors, vol. R.)

⁴ "These 784 louis which come from England are here worth no more than four ducal livres each. Hence the pastors receive only 200 ducats each and the schoolmasters 100. The Latin regent has about 170. But the sum was much smaller still, before the calamity of the valley of St. Martin." (Mémoire en faveur des vallées, 1708.—Same source.)

⁵ "The three churches of the valley of St. Martin . . . having unhappily fallen into disloyalty . . . their pastors have left them." (Loco cit.)—"The meeting having deliberated on the condition of the wandering pastors, and the means of providing for their subsistence," . . . resolved that something shall for this purpose be kept off the stipends of their colleagues of the valley of Lucerna.—"John Jahier, formerly pastor at Pral, shall be recognized as pastor of the Flying Camp." . . . (Synodal Acts of 7th October, 1704.—Archives of the Vaulois Table.)

⁶ "The church of Villesèche, which before their revolt was composed of the communities of Rioclarét, Faët, Bouvil, Traverses, and St. Martin, has now neither minister, nor schoolmaster, nor any sort of exercise of religion." (Etat des églises de la vallée de St. Martin, et du Pomaret, présentement dominées par les ennemis.—A report without date.—Communicated by M. Appia.) It is afterwards said, "All the other churches of these valleys are in the same state."

undertake its solemn duties,¹ who committed the greatest irregularities.² The Vaudois considered this valley as lost to their church,³ and feared lest, the unity of their body being thus broken, the destruction of the whole might ensue.⁴ But at last, when the war was ended, the valley of St. Martin returned under the government of Victor Amadeus, who granted a complete amnesty to all its inhabitants,⁵ in consideration of the fidelity shown to him by the valley of Lucerna, where he had found an asylum in the time of his misfortunes. For the French generals had for a time deprived him of almost all his dominions.

The Duke de Vendôme, who had laid siege to Verrüe on the 22d of October, 1704, took that place on the 10th of April, 1705, after it had made the best defence which any besieged place ever made.⁶ The Duke de la Feuillade took Villefranche by assault,⁷ and also Montalban and Nice, the governor of which retreated into the citadel, but was not able to hold out there for more than three days.⁸ Miradole surrendered at discretion, on the 11th of May, twenty-two days after the trenches were opened. On the 16th of August, the Imperial and Savoyard troops, commanded by Prince Eugene, were defeated near Cassano; thereafter the fortifications

¹ See the Archives of the Company of Pastors of Geneva, register R, pp. 312, 313.

² Mentioned in a letter by Reynaudin, of 28th September, 1708. (Same source.) See also the Synodal Acts of Le Villar, 23d October, 1708. (Archives of the Vaudois Table.)

³ "The valley of St. Martin, which was supposed to have been lost, has returned to its duty." . . . (Synodal summons addressed by the moderator, Reynaudin, to the pastors, elders, directors, and other heads of families, &c. Dated Eobi, 26th December, 1708.—Archives of Le Villar. REL. fol. 158.)

⁴ "This division will inevitably cause the ruin of these valleys." (Mémoire sur l'état des vallées Vaudoises, 27th December, 1706.)—"The preservation of the valley of Lucerna depends upon that of the valley of St. Martin . . . without which it cannot be hoped that it should long be able to maintain its existence." (Mémoire pour les églises des vallées du Piémont.)

⁵ Under the name of Patents of Grace, dated from the camp of Balbottet, 17th August, 1708, granting the amnesty, on condition that the pretended republicans should renew their oath of fidelity to the house of Savoy, in presence of the governor, Gasca. This document begins thus: "Dopo l'enorme crime di ribellione, comesso da i particolari, e abitanti della valle di San Martino," &c. . . . —Being all guilty of high treason and lese majesty, they have incurred the penalty of death, &c. . . . But his royal highness, moved with compassion, &c., . . . pardons them. (State Archives at Turin. Vald. No. 482.)

⁶ This judgment is taken from the Mercure historique, XXVII. 479; the dates are taken from the work of the Benedictines, for the Mercure places the surrender of Verrüe on the 7th of April.

⁷ On the 2d of April, 1705, according to the Mercure, and on the 7th of March according to the Art de vérifier les dates.—But the castle of Villefranche was not taken till the 3d of April.

⁸ The town was taken on the 6th, and the citadel on the 9th of April, 1705.

of Nice, Ivrée, and Verrüe were destroyed by the French. In the following year, the French obtained another great victory at Calcinato.¹ Turin was invested by them on the 12th and 13th of May, and their trenches were opened in the night between the 3d and 4th of June. The Duke of Savoy retired to Bubiana, where he received a deputation of the officers and pastors of the Vaudois valleys.² He then went to Lucerna, where, according to the words of an ancient manuscript, the Vaudois made for him a secure retreat.³ There is reason for supposing that this retreat was the deep valley of Rora,⁴ where Janavel, with eighteen men, had arrested an army, and at which also the enemy were compelled to pause, who had pursued the Duke of Savoy as far as Briqueras.⁵ Perhaps it may have been nothing else than the arms of the Vaudois which arrested the progress of the French general upon this occasion.⁶

Victor Amadeus, in thus retiring amidst these valiant moun-

¹ 19th April, 1706.

² "During the war lately terminated, his majesty the King of Sardinia seemed disposed to favour the Vaudois, insomuch that in the year 1706, he having gone into the valley of Lucerna, at the time when the French army pursued him so very closely, the Protestant pastors and officers of the valleys, repaired to Bubiana and Lucerna, to protest an inviolable fidelity to him in whatsoever circumstances of trial. He received them very graciously, saying to them that if they were faithful to him as they protested, they would find in him a good friend, as well as an affectionate father; and he would maintain them in all their privileges, without permitting the least infraction of them." (Extract from a MS. note appended to a copy of the Negotiations of 1686, belonging to M. Ant. Blanc, of La Tour.—These words, the war lately terminated, lead to the supposition that the note was written soon after the events of which it makes mention. The last which it relates took place on 9th August, 1718.

³ "At the peace of Utrecht, the influence of the British court might have obtained for the Vaudois of Pragela the same privileges which the three other valleys enjoyed, the more especially as the latter had, at the time of the siege of Turin, provided a secure retreat for their sovereign, . . . and as all this was recent." (Mémoire concernant la situation, &c. . . . Report concerning the present condition of the valleys of Piedmont, and of the ministry in their churches, drawn up by the pastors . . . appointed as commissioners in name of the Synod . . . to watch over their interests, &c. . . . Presented to the Synod of the Hague, 9th September, 1762. Archives of the Walloon Churches, communicated by M. Appia.)

⁴ See Monastier, II. 173.—Gilly, Waldensian Researches.—Brokedon, Excursions; Acland, &c.

⁵ Histoire militaire du Piémont, by the Count De Saluces, v. 189; quoted by Monastier, II. 172.

⁶ Upon the arrival of Victor Amadeus in the valley of Lucerna, the Vaudois, "exposing their own lives in his service, opposed the French army with such vigour, that they compelled the enemy to retire and abandon the valley of Lucerna." (Note above quoted; MS. of M. Ant. Blanc.)—"The Duke of Savoy then came into the valley of Lucerna, where La Feuillade still thought to fight with him, but he was everywhere repulsed, and returned to his own camp. (Histoire de Prince Eugene; Vienna edition; 5 vols. 8vo, 1755; III. 77.)

taineers, intended not only to seek a refuge which he might have found elsewhere, but above all to attach them to his service by personal manifestations of good-will, which might make them forget all that they had suffered. He knew that the Duke de la Feuille had offered them the protection of France; it was important to prevent a defection like that of the valley of St. Martin, or at all events to give to the valley of Lucerna such marks of confidence and kindness as its fidelity deserved. Victor Amadeus II. employed himself also in organizing the military forces of these faithful subjects, who crowded around him in great numbers,¹ and whom perhaps he meant to make a body-guard in place of the Swiss who had abandoned him.² At all events, he arrived at Carmagnole, escorted by 600 Vaudois and 100 Camisards, who had belonged to the intrepid band of Cavalier.³ Nor did he fail to thank the general secretary of the valley of Lucerna, as their representative, for all the good services which had been rendered to him on the part of all the inhabitants of the valley;⁴ and he even left at Rora a memorial of himself in the form of a gift at parting to those who had received him as their guest.⁵

At Carmagnole he was rejoined by Prince Eugene, with eight regiments of the line and 4000 dragoons. After this, the duke remained for a few days at the castle of Pianesse, and then marched from thence upon Turin, the siege of which he compelled the French to raise,⁶ after a glorious victory which restored him his

¹ Expression of the Count de Saluces, Histoire militaire du Piémont, v. 189.

² Mercurio storico, xxvii., 1705. "The Vaudois are still proud of having, at the time of the siege of Turin, in 1706, given an asylum to Victor Amadeus, their most cruel persecutor, who came unattended, to take refuge amongst them until the approach of the immortal Eugene. It was in the village of Rora that he found his place of retreat, and all our men who were capable of bearing arms, followed him to the siege, or rather to the deliverance of his capital." (Letter of M. Paul Appia, deputy of the valley of Lucerna, to the Count of Nieperg, dated from La Tour, 2d December, 1799. Communicated by M. Appia of Frankfort.)

³ History of Prince Eugene of Savoy. Edition of Vienna, 1755; III. 104.

⁴ "Invitati dalli buoni servigi, sin qui resi, con ogni applicatione—fedelta e zelo, del Nodaro Collegiario, Guiseppe Brezzi, del Villar, in qualita di segretario delle valli di Luserna, deputato dal corpo, in generale delle ufficiali valdesi, &c." . . . (Rescript of Victor Amadeus II., dated from Bubiana, 31st July, 1706, and printed in 1711, in Torino, per Gio Battista Valetta, stampatore di S. A. R.)—Victor Amadeus arrived at Bubiana on 7th July, 1706; he remained there till the 14th, in the house of the missionaries. (Storia della missione, dal P. Bonaventura di vergemoli. Folio MS. in the Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.) From Bubiana he went to Lucerna; it can only have been from the 16th to the 28th of July that he was at Rora, as on 31st July he was at Bubiana on his return.

⁵ A silver goblet. (See all the modern writers.) Monastier, II. 173. Gilly, Narrative of an excursion . . . —Beattie, Vallées vaudoises pittoresques, 170, &c.

⁶ On 7th Sept., 1706. The Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene arrived, in the night between the 6th and 7th, on the hill of Superga, where Victor Amadeus, in dominions.¹ The loss of the vanquished amounted, indeed, to no more than 2000 men; but such was their consternation that, instead of seeking a new position under the walls of Casal in order to cover the Milanese, their army retreated to Pignerol in order to retire into Dauphiny. This was to abandon all that they had won; and they experienced new losses in this retreat. The Vaudois, commanded by Colonel de Saint-Amour, harassed them during the whole time of their retreat, and took a number of their convoys.² They had organized a flying camp which passed rapidly from one mountain to another, and made incursions even into Dauphiny.

The war was carried on feebly for some years. In 1707, the French and Spanish troops restored to the allies the places which still remained in their hands in Lombardy,³ and evacuated that country. In the following year, Victor Amadeus attempted to seize upon Dauphiny; but the Marshal de Villars, the able governor of that province, frustrated all his designs. The duke, however, regained the cis-alpine districts of which La Feuillade had deprived him, and amongst the rest the valley of St. Martin.⁴ He fixed his camp near Mentoules,⁵ where the deputies of the valley of Lucerna⁶ came to solicit his clemency on behalf of their brethren who had been so grievously misled, and whose puerile republic had vanished upon the first appearance of his advanced guard. "His majesty, says one of these deputies, conversed with us for half an hour, with the kindness of a father, and with an affability which is without example on the part of a sovereign towards his subjects."⁷ Nor did he refuse pardon to those for whom it was asked, requiring only that they should renew their oath of allegiance to his dynasty.⁸ accordance with a vow then made, caused a most beautiful church to be erected, nine years after, from plans by Philip Juvara of Messina, in honour of the Virgin, "who, as the people pretended, had received in her apron the bombs which the French showered upon Turin." (Mémoire pour servir à l'histoire des Vaudois, folio MS., p. 61, by M. Paul Appia. Referring especially to the era of the Restoration. Communicated by the family of M. Appia.)

¹ On occasion of this victory, a medal was struck representing the fall of Phaeton, with these words, Mergitur Eridano MDCCVII. On the reverse is the Duke of Savoy embracing Prince Eugene, and Fame flies above them, displaying a scroll on which is written Sabaudia liberata: is triumphat!

² L'Esprit des cours . . . , t. XV. Histoire militaire du Piémont, v. 212.

³ By capitulation of 13th March.

⁴ Suza was surrendered on 30th October, 1707.

⁵ At Balbottet.

⁶ Paul Reynaudin, the moderator, with MM. Goante and Lécuyer.

⁷ Letter of Reynaudin, dated from Bobi, 26th September, 1705. (Archives of Le Villar, vol. Religionarii, folio 158.)

⁸ Patents of Grace, dated from the camp of Balbottet, 17th August, 1708. (Archives of the Court.)

He at the same time authorized the meeting of a synod, in order to provide for the wants of the parishes thus restored.¹

It was in 1708, also, that the Duke of Savoy² entered into possession of Montferrat, which had been promised to him by Austria upon his alliance with the imperial party.³

The following year passed without any remarkable incident; but in 1710, the Marshal de Berwick was sent into Savoy by Louis XIV., and the Vaudois again took up arms for their sovereign. "A proclamation has been published at Turin," said a letter from that city, "that those who choose to go and serve amongst them shall enjoy the ordinary pay and wages of the militia, till the end of the campaign."⁴ This was a new invitation indirectly addressed to the French refugees. Ah! why should kings, after they have become victorious, so often prove unfaithful to the promises which they have made during their reverses? These unhappy exiles, already twice deceived, were again deceived a third time; for numbers of them at this time also joined the defenders of the throne of Savoy.

Victor Amadeus II. declared his resolution, on 26th May, 1711, to place himself in person at the head of his troops;⁵ and shortly afterwards he had recovered possession of Savoy. Next year, the Marshal de Berwick crossed Mount Genève with a French army, and encamped at Cézane.⁶ Thence he made himself master of the valleys of Oulx and Pragela. The Piedmontese king immediately raised his camp from St. Columban, where he then was, and drove the enemy back into Dauphiny. Meanwhile the Baron de St. Rémy seized the valley of Barcelounette; and the Vaudois, being in the very centre of all these movements, did not fail to act with their accustomed valour and bravery. They made many victorious excursions and skirmishes at this time, which very much contributed to repulse the enemy, as well as to give themselves the means of providing ammunition, and of equipping themselves at the enemy's expense. The king, to testify his satisfaction, ordered the Count de Bagnol to send a cashier to Pignerol, to pay the arrears due to these valiant troops, to whom he even offered a continuance

¹ Decree dated from the same camp, 13th September, 1708.

² The title of His Majesty was already given to Victor Amadeus, but as King of Sicily, and not as King of Piedmont. It was not till the 18th of August, 1718, that he accepted Sardinia in exchange for Sicily, with the title of King of Sardinia, which has been inherited by his successors.

³ In virtue of the treaty of 25th October, 1703.

⁴ Mercure historique et politique; the Hague, 1710. No. for July, p. 524.

⁵ Extract from a letter from Turin, dated 17th June, 1711. (Mercure historique et politique. No. for July, p. 551.)

⁶ On 11th July, 1712. (Id., No. for August, 1712, p. 1647.)

of pay, on the war footing, if they would continue to defend the passes of the Alps as they had done.¹

The treaty of Utrecht² gave Victor Amadeus peaceful possession of his enlarged dominions. The high valleys of the Cluson and the Doire remained in his hands, along with the county of Nice, in exchange for the valley of Barcelonnette, which remained in the possession of France; and we have already seen what the Vaudois of Pragela had afterwards to suffer because their interests were at that time overlooked and neglected by the Protestant powers. The Pragelans, however, took part by their deputies in the general synod of the Vaudois churches which was held at this time for the reorganization of the church.³ But they did not long enjoy this privilege. The acts of that assembly received the authorization of government in order to their being carried into effect, with the exception of the incorporation of the old Vaudois parishes of Pragela into the same body with those of the valleys.⁴

Henry Arnaud, who had returned to the work of the ministry in the valleys in 1703,⁵ left them again in 1707.⁶ The King of England invited him to his court,⁷ but in vain: the unambitious pastor of the Alps, not finding it possible to reside amongst the inhabitants of those valleys of Piedmont which he had reconquered, preferred to rejoin his exiled companions in their humble colony on the banks of the Eintz, where he occupied himself, like Xenophon, in drawing up the narrative of his patriotic labours.⁸

¹ Same collection. No. for May, 1713, p. 372.

² 11th April, 1713.

³ At Bobi, 11th November, 1709. The previous synod had already considered the duty "of proceeding, for the service of his royal highness, to the establishment of some pastors, in the valley of St. Martin, as a thing calculated to confirm the people of that valley in the fidelity which they owed to their lawful sovereign." (Preamble of the Synodal Acts of 23d October, 1708. Archives of the Vaudois Table.)

⁴ See the declaration of the intendant of Pignerol, appended to the Acts of the Synod of Bobi, 1709. It is in the Synod of Le Villar (23d Oct., 1708), that we find for the first time the intervention of the civil power to sanction the acts of our religious assemblies by declaring them executory: "quelli (articoli) admettiamo e dichiaramo esecutori . . . Pasca, intendente e direttore." In other matters, the support of the secular power would have been of great value, and would have given great force to the decisions of our synods, if they had been contested. But they never had need of it.

⁵ See the Mercure historique, XXVI. 140, and the Mémoire pour les Eglises du Piémont, dated from St. John, 27th December, 1706. (Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. R.)

⁶ See the 15th article of the Synodal Acts of 13th and 14th February, 1708. (Archives of the Vaudois Table.)

⁷ Acland, The Glorious Recovery, &c. . . . Bracebridge; Plenderleith, and Mémoires de Paul Appia. (Communicated.)

⁸ Published in 1710. Some say at Basle, others at Cassel. Republished at Neuchâtel in 1815.

The subsequent fortunes of the Vaudois people, whom he left, were worse than his own. Impoverished by the recent vicissitudes which they had experienced, and by the war just concluded, they exhausted themselves in providing for the necessities of the numerous refugees whom they had welcomed to their territories.¹ The military enrolments had at once taken away hands from agriculture, and added to the number of mouths to be filled,² and without the foreign succours which were bestowed upon the Vaudois,³ the generosity of their prince⁴ would not have saved them from the overwhelming pressure of extreme privations.⁵

This state of distress continued for many years.⁶ The Vaudois Church, nevertheless, seemed to acquire strength.⁷ The inhabitants of these regions regarded them with friendship. Not a few of the

¹ Order of Bercastel, governor of Lucerna, to the French refugees, e altri stranieri . . . che non sono arrolati, e che possedono alcun registro, to quit the country within three days. Dated from Lucerna, 27th April, 1706. (Archives of Le Villar, vol. Religionarii, folio 131.) But this order produced merely a temporary effect: for we find, under date 18th September, 1708, a note of the poor and of foreign refugees in the Vaudois valleys; and on 25th May, 1709, a new order of expulsion, for the execution of which the Vaudois communes are made responsible, in which these refugees find harbour. (Archives of Le Villar, vol. above quoted, folio 161); and finally, under date 23d March, 1714, a new order for the same purpose. (Id., ibid., folio, 171.)

² Report on the afflicted condition of the churches of Pragela and the old valleys; addressed to Geneva by the Vaudois pastors, dated 1st June, 1714. (Archives of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. S, p. 253.) The first cause of this was the edicts of 1703 and 1704, by which Victor Amadeus invited foreign exiles to serve under his banners.

³ Mémoire en faveur des Vallées in 1707. (Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. R.) Mémoire du ministre Léger, délégué par la compagnie pour se rendre aux Vallées, &c., . . . extending from 2d August, 1729, to the end of November, and inserted in the same Archives, vol. x. p. 173, et seq. A mémoire justificatif of the proceedings of Léger was published in the following year, under date 20th October, 1730. (Communicated by M. Vaucher Mouchon, of Geneva.)

⁴ Stato delle compagnie Valdesi, che hanno servito S. M. durante l'hor scorsa guerra . . . quali hanno continuamente gioito del pane e delle contribuzione, stateli graziosamente accordati da detta S. M. &c. Document dated St. John, 22d May, 1717. (In the State Archives at Turin, categ. Vald., No. 456.) MS. of 40 pages, folio. The names are written in double columns. There are 73 columns. The paper was drawn by the notary Joseph Brezzi.

⁵ Letter of the pastors of Bobi and Le Villar to the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, setting forth that so great a famine reigns in the country, that some of the poor sufferers are even compelled to subsist upon wild herbs. "The Catholics," say they, "receive assistance from those of their own religion, and many of our people are in danger of sacrificing their religion in order to preserve their lives." Written by Reynaudin, 15th June, 1714. The council of the city of Geneva adopted a resolution granting 100 crowns for relief of the churches of Bobi and Le Villar. (Archives of the Company of Pastors, vol. S, pp. 260, 270.)

⁶ See Mémoire sur la situation présente des Eglises évangéliques des Vallées, . . . presented to the synod of the Hague, 9th September, 1762.

⁷ See the Synodal Acts of the Vaudois Church, from 1708 to 1730.

magistrates, appointed to govern them, even proved their protectors.¹ But the friendly feeling of the sovereign² and the esteem of the neighbourhood were not sufficient to counterbalance the hostile influence of the Church of Rome, which continually pursued them. To this influence it was conceded that they should be compelled to cease from all manual labour on the Catholic festival days,³ and that they should be prohibited from admitting into their places of worship any person not of their own religion;⁴ whilst, under

¹ The Marquis de Bercastel, governor of Lucerna, spirito da un atto di carità, e mosso a compassione verso il detto popolo, se compiaciuto di farli l'offerta e di dar e sborsar, la soma di lire trecento ducati d'argento . . . for the erection of the Protestant place of worship at Le Villar. (From a notarial deed of 11th February, 1706.) The place of worship was completed in 1707: it was merely a re-building. (This document, and many others relating to this place of worship, are in the Archives of Le Villar, vol. Religionarii, folio 121-157.) The bell of this church was recast in 1719, by a person named Nigretti, of Crussol. The stipulations made with him are of date 28th April, and are to be found in folio 174.

² In 1693 and 1694, in 1703 and 1706, 1708 and 1713, Victor Amadeus II. signified to the Vaudois not only his good-will, but even attachment and gratitude. (See at these dates.) We read in a letter of the moderator to the English ambassador at Turin:—"Will your excellency be so good as to remind our sovereign, that he gave his word to Mr. Molesworth (predecessor of Mr. Edges), never again to trouble the Vaudois." The letter is dated 26th May, 1727.

³ An order of Victor Amadeus II., dated 14th July, 1718, enjoined the Vaudois to abstain from all kinds of work on the festival days of the Romish church. (Archives of Le Villar, vol. Religionarii, folio 176.) The Vaudois petitioned against this prohibition; and by a new order, dated 9th August, 1718, they were permitted to work in their own houses, with closed doors, but only during the hours when the Catholics might be at liberty to employ themselves in similar labours. In order to apply themselves to those for which the Catholics required a permission from their parish priest, it was necessary for the Protestants to obtain one from the judge. (This document is in the form of a biglietto regio in the Archives of Turin, and of explanatory instructions transmitted by the Count de Mellardère, minister of the interior, in those of Pignerol.) The second article of the edict of 25th June, 1720, confirmed these regulations. But the Vaudois still petitioned against this compulsory resting on the festivals of a church to which they did not belong. (Memoria sopra il raccorso fatto, nel 1718, dalli Protestanti, per la libertà di travagliare le festi, e sopra diversi abusi. Archives of the Court, Turin, No. 451.) New instructions were addressed, in 1721, to the Senate of Pignerol, to confirm the edict of 14th July, 1718. (Id. No. 452.) But the vexations which arose from the arbitrary execution of this edict became so grievous, that upon a new petition from the Vaudois, the king mitigated it a little; by rescript of 12th May, 1724, confirming the regulations of 25th June, 1720, and by biglietto regio of 27th June, 1724, confirming those of 9th August, 1718. (Same source, Nos. 442, 927, &c.)

⁴ The superior Council of Pignerol demanded in the first place, on 31st March, 1717, that the Protestants of Le Pomaret should be prevented from admitting Catholics to their worship. (This was especially intended to keep away the Reformers of Pragela, who had been compelled to conform to the rites of the Church of Rome.) Victor Amadeus II., by a rescript of 2d April, 1717, assented to this demand. On 28th May a manifesto appeared, which allows some individual exceptions to this prohibition. (Turin, Archives of the Court; category Valdesi, Nos. 474-478.) But this prohibition was soon extended to all the Vaudois places of worship. (Orders of 28th Sept. and 22d Oct., 1720; quoted in a petition of 1721.)

pretext of public security, their most lawful rights were often disregarded.¹ It had already been attempted to restrict the number of their places of worship;² and the Propaganda redoubled their activity in instigating new annoyances.³

These severe measures were followed by proceedings still more vexatious;⁴ even criminal attempts remained unpunished—cruelties

¹ Order of 20th June, 1714; which, whilst it banished the French Protestants from the country, forbade the Vaudois themselves to leave it. Note of the Procurator-General, dated 11th September, 1714, saying that these measures are for the public tranquillity. (Archives of Le Perrier.)

² When the territory of Lucerna and that of St. John formed but one commune (in 1638, in consequence of the depopulation of the country by the expulsion of the Vaudois), the Catholics of St. John built a church, which afterwards, on the return of the exiles, passed into the hands of the Protestants, in virtue of some transactions unknown to me; and the restitution of this edifice to the Catholic religion was ordered by decree of 12th May, 1717. The Protestant church of St. Germain, which had been demolished in 1636, and rebuilt in 1711, was not in the same spot with the old one. Upon this account its destruction was demanded; but as the site of the old church could not be exactly determined, the new one was allowed to remain. (Risoluzioni prese nel congresso tenuto avanti S. E. il signor conte ministro e primo segretario di stato, Mellarède, li 12 maggio, 1717. (Turin, Archives of the Court, Valdesi, No. 473.) A special edict of Victor Amadeus had authorized Protestant worship in the commune of Prarusting: dalle regioni di costa longa e Massera in su, verso la montagna; e alla Duriva del Colloretto, ove vi an piccolo canale, &c. (Edict of 2d October, 1699. In the Archives of the Court of Accounts, at Turin, Reg. contr. gen. MDCXC. No. 199, folio 112.) The instructions of 20th June, 1730, could not suppress this edict, but they laid down the rule that no new Protestant place of worship should be erected in the valleys; and as to that of Prarusting, it is said “vogliamo ben permettere che sussista la campana” (some authors have read la cabane), “on condition always that it be not extended, and that the pastor who formerly lived at Rocheplate shall again fix his residence there, and shall not be entitled to reside at St. Barthelemy.” (Istruzione a riguardo de Valdesi, 20th June, 1730, art. ix.) Subsequently all places for religious meetings, other than the churches, were closed in the valleys. (Decrees of the Senate of Turin, of 19th Feb., 1756, and 18th January, 1771. Archives of the Senate.)

³ Particularly in order to obtain conversions to Catholicism. The marriage portions were fixed (stato delle dotti costituite a figlie convertite &c. Archives of the Court, No. 448.) Even gifts abounded. (Testamentary deed of 2d July, 1723, by which the testator disposes of his property in favour of such Vaudois as should become Catholics. Archives of the intendency of Pignerol, categ. I., class IV., art. viii., No. 8.) Concerning the annoyances, I possess a memorial entitled Grievances of the Valleys of Piedmont, belonging to the year 1721. It would be too tedious to enter into the details.

⁴ Criminal prosecutions were instituted against pastors who performed the functions of their ecclesiastical office for any one born on the left bank of the Cluson or in Pragela, where the government would acknowledge the existence of none but Catholics. For having administered baptism to an infant born at Fenestrelle, on 18th April, 1727, the pastor of St. John, Cyprian Appia, was condemned to banishment and confiscation of goods. But the English ambassador, Mr. Edges, obtained his pardon. “We can no longer venture to meet for any business,” wrote this pastor afterwards, “because of the prosecution which has been commenced against five of our number, who had met for public affairs.” (Letter of

were from time to time openly perpetrated, or being shrouded in mystery, inspired the greater alarm.¹ The protection of foreign powers did no more than repair these injuries—it did not prevent them.² Distrust everywhere prevailed;³ the complaints of the Appia, dated 24th August, 1733, to Mr. Chetwynd, at London.—Vaudois Correspondence.) This prosecution also terminated in a condemnation, but through the indulgence of the sovereign, it was annulled by letters-patent, dated 16th April, 1734, and recorded on the 20th. Amongst these persons was one named Daniel Musseton. Cyprian Appia was also implicated in it, as well as other pastors.

¹ It seems to have been in 1727 that the monks of Le Villars formed the project of blowing up, by means of a mine, the Protestant church of that place, built in 1707. I have given some particulars of this story, in a volume on the Vaudois, published in 1834, p. 53. See also BLAIR, History of the Waldenses (2 vols. 8vo, Edinburgh, 1833), ii. 533. Of cruelties openly perpetrated the greatest and most frequent was the carrying away of Vaudois children, which took place from time to time either by open violence or secretly. The Vaudois Correspondence from 1725 to 1765, which I have consulted, contains a great number of instances. “No means are neglected to make children rebel against their father and mother. . . . Stephen Odin, of Prarusting, is much annoyed about his daughter, who has become a Catholic. . . . The tribunal of Pignerol caused Odin’s property to be judicially sold, to endow his daughter’s apostasy, to the prejudice of his children who remain faithful. . . . All the petitions which we have presented since 1718, have been disregarded.” (Passages extracted from divers letters of the Moderator, from 5th January to 12th June, 1727.)

When the walls of the convent of Le Villar were demolished, some human skeletons were found, incased in the thick partitions of the edifice.

² “The evangelical churches of Piedmont, which exist only by a perpetual miracle of Providence . . . have always been the object of especial patronage and protection on the part of the sovereigns of Great Britain, since the reign of Queen Mary. The afflictions to which they are continually exposed render this protection now more necessary to them than ever.” (Letter of condolence, written on 10th September, 1727, by the moderator of the Vaudois churches, to George II. of England, on the death of his father, George I.—Vaudois Correspondence.)—“Amongst foreign powers,” says the Report of 1729 on the State of the Vaudois churches, “England is now their firmest support, as before the peace of the Pyrenees they were supported by the King of France.” (Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vol. X, p. 174, &c.)—We must add Holland and Prussia, which certainly have, at all times, done much more for the Vaudois than ever was done by France.

³ Even against the pastors: for the pecuniary supplies which came from abroad had no fixed destination. The synod disposed of them. Part of the support of the pastors and schoolmasters was derived from these sums. Hence arose some irregularities, many rivalries and jealousies, and rumours of malversation incessantly renewed, although always disproved. The directors of the Vaudois churches complained of the ingratitude and the accusations to which they were subjected. Their letters, again, were often intercepted at Pignerol. No one could venture to express himself freely, nor to confide in anybody at home or abroad, &c. (The Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva, vols. T, V, X; the Correspondence of the Vaudois Moderator, and a great number of letters and pamphlets of the period, which it would be tedious to particularize, contain proofs of these facts.) In 1727, an impostor presented himself in London, with forged papers and an imitation of the seal of the Vaudois churches, with the view of appropriating to himself the supplies designed for them. (Letter of the Moderator to Mr. Chetwynd, agent for the Vaudois in London, dated 6th May, 1727, &c.)

Vaudois were no longer listened to.¹ Their synods could do no more than to redress particular grievances,² to maintain union in families,³ to watch over the morals of the people,⁴ and to keep up the exercise of discipline.⁵ But this discipline itself had participated in the effects of those perturbations by which everything was unsettled:⁶ and the laxity of opinion which characterized the age increased continually without putting an end to religious fanaticism, now without even the excuse of sincere conviction for its intolerance.⁷ The Vaudois church multiplied its public prayers and

¹ "No answer is given to our petitions; our complaints produce not even an echo; the very letters which we send to you are retained." Vaudois Correspondence of 1718-1729. (Letters to Mr. Edges at Turin, and to M. Turretin at Geneva).—"The books which we procure from Geneva for the religious instruction of our children are stopped at the office at Pont d'Arve, and we cannot recover them from it." (Note in the handwriting of Cyprian Appia, dated in 1729.) "Our deputies are not permitted to obtain access to the king, . . . our petitions are unfairly dealt with" . . . (Synod of 28th November, 1724, § 5), &c.

² See Synodal Acts of 3d June, 1694, art. 1 and 2; of 25th October, 1695, art. 7 and 9; of 25th April, 1697, art. 2 and 5; of 28th April, 1705, art. 7 and 10; of 23d October, 1708, art. 8 and 9; of 1712, art. 3; of 1724, § 7; of 1727, § 4; of 1729, § 9 and 16, &c.—"The Vaudois are little in favour with the Catholic magistracy; but the disputes which they have amongst themselves are almost always terminated by the intervention of their ministers and others, whom they choose for arbiters." (Briève narration des Vaudois, ou sujets protestants de S. M. . . faite par un gentilhomme, en ses voyages d'Italie: without date; but it mentions the differences between the court of Rome and the house of Savoy, fourteen years ago, which would place this note in 1707, if the reference is to the differences of 1694 relative to the re-establishment of the Vaudois; or in 1733, if it is to those concerning the Monarchy of Sicily, which were prolonged till 1719. State Archives at Turin, category Valdesi, No. 458.)

³ See the Synodal Acts, at the sections already quoted. (Archives of the Vaudois Table.)

⁴ See also the Synods of 1703, § 14; 1707, § 7, 8; 1708, § 11, 12; 1712, § 6, 11; 1713, § 4, 15; 1716, § 9; 1718, § 8, 9; 1725, § 3; and 1729, § 8, 9, 16.

⁵ See the synod of St. Germain, 29th November, 1729, art. viii. (Various regulations follow.) The preceding synod, according to a letter of the moderator to M. Iselin, at Basle (dated 12th March, 1727), "resolved henceforth to examine students, before sending them to the places which may be granted them by foreign academies." All the proceedings of these assemblies had, however, no other object than the maintenance of order, morality, evangelical doctrine, and discipline.—For the regulations in detail, see the minutes of their proceedings.

⁶ The same sources as are indicated in the preceding notes; also Synod of 1708, art. 1 and 2; of 1710, § 23 and 24; of 1715, § 4 and 8; of 1716, § 2; of 1727, § 5, &c. "Our schools are very irregularly kept." (Letter of the moderator to James Léger, pastor at Geneva, dated 5th April, 1728.) "Our churches stand in need of considerable reforms." (Letter to M. Burlamaqui, of 23d April of the same year.)

⁷ The Vaudois were forbidden (1), to acquire properties beyond their limits, and to exercise certain professions; (2), to settle out of their valleys, even for trade; (3), to make proselytes from the Romish church, and to oppose proselytism amongst themselves; (4), to reclaim their children taken from them under pretext of abjuration; (5), to increase the number of their places of worship and of their minis-

fasts, in order to obtain the blessing of God for the time to come.¹ But a transformation was taking place in society—habits and opinions were changing, and meanwhile the spirit of the past struggled with new energy to regain its empire. The promulgation of the old Piedmontese statute,² which made the situation of the Vaudois so much worse than before,³ took place about the same time with the opening of the council of Embrun,⁴ which fomented the dissensions occasioned by the bull Unigenitus.

Remonstrances were vain on the part of the Vaudois; they could obtain no more mild or equitable regulations,⁵ but on the contrary they had reason to apprehend new severities, and the edict of 20th June, 1730, published under the form of Instructions to the senate of Pignerol, did nothing but collect and codify, so to speak, all the oppressive measures which had already been adopted with regard to them. It was then that all Protestants of foreign birth were for the second time expelled from their valleys, and, with a few exceptions, all the Protestants, natives of Pragela, were banished, no more to return.⁶ In vain did the organs of the ters, even within their own valleys; (6), to hold religious assemblies, or even simple prayer meetings, out of these places of worship, and without the presence of the pastor. (See Gilly, Vigilantius and Valdo, page 32.)—Each of these prohibitions became a ready pretext for calumnies and prompt proceedings.

¹ From 1701 to 1726, seven public and solemn fasts were appointed by the synod in the valleys. That of 1720 was for preservation from the scourge of pestilence; and that of 1723, to thank God for having preserved them from it.

² The synod of 28th November, 1724, was principally occupied in examining, with reference to the interests of the Vaudois, the Royal Constitutions, as they were called, which were published in 1723. (See the minutes of that synod.)

³ This did not repeal the edict of 23d May, 1694, re-establishing the Vaudois.—There was no mention made in it of the inhabitants of the valleys, although the Jews were, by the same constitutions, protected from all insult and violence. (Such are the terms of a petition drawn up by the Synod of 1724.) The observance of the Catholic festivals was rendered obligatory. Protestants were prohibited from having notaries of their own religion, although they had had them from time immemorial. (Terms of the same petition.) Parents were obliged to dispoise their property in favour of their children who had become Catholics, whom they had just the least reason for favouring, &c.

⁴ Opened on 16th August, 1727. It was on 24th October, 1728, that a parere was adopted, circa il capo da aggiungere alle costituzioni a riguardo de' Valdesi, containing a declaration with regard to the edict of 1694, upon which the Vaudois rested in demanding the maintenance of their privileges, that "when circumstances change, edicts lose their value." (Turin, Archives of the Court, No. 441.) This maxim needs no comment.

⁵ "Notwithstanding all our petitions we have not been able to obtain the slightest relief." (Concluding words of a memorial drawn up in 1728, under the title Griefs des Vaudois. In my possession.)

⁶ A list of the names of the Vaudois of Pragela, exiled in 1730, and who were within the canton of Berne in the month of May of that year, may be seen in Dieterici, p. 404. They amounted to 360 persons. Those of the other valleys who were in Switzerland as exiles, in December, 1730, amounted to 430 persons. The

Vaudois church and its foreign protectors reclaim against these abuses of power: the only replies to their just complaints were deceitful subtleties,¹ or promises almost always illusory.² They renewed their petitions.³ But these protestations of their rights list is also given by Dieterici, pp. 408-414. (Total of the Vaudois exiled at the close of 1730, 840.)

¹ "All these reclamations of the Vaudois, or of the powers which protected them, are founded upon the edict of 23d May, 1694; but this edict leaves untouched all those which were issued anterior to 1686, and consequently the plenitude of action of the sovereign." (Progetto di capo per aggiunta alle costituzioni. . . . Archives of the Court, No. 471.) Instead of granting more liberty to the Vaudois, they must be restrained as much as possible. (Parere sopra la tolleranza degl' eretici, in Piemonte. Same source, No. 464. Without date.) "The King of England caused representations to be made, on the subject of the Vaudois, by Mr. Molenvorck [?], his envoy extraordinary at Turin; a promise was given to regulate their situation according to the anterior edicts, and all the articles of the edict of 20th June, 1730, were successively communicated to the English ambassador, with the edict upon which they were based. He acknowledged their exact accordance; it is therefore with a bad grace that complaints are made of them now." (Extracted and abridged from a note sent to the English secretary, Allen, on 27th April, 1731. Same source, No. 465.) It was, however, acknowledged that many of the edicts brought forward, were not applicable to the Vaudois valleys. (Rescript of 12th August, 1730, published by Borelli.) The States-General of Holland wrote to Victor Amadeus with the same object, on 7th November, 1730; the king's reply, polite but evasive, is dated 2d December, 1730. (Archives of the Court, Nos. 467, 468.) The influence of the Catholic clergy was then exercised over the king, through the instrumentality of a female, for whom he thought it little to sacrifice the repose of the Vaudois, and for whom he ere long sacrificed his throne.

² The King of Prussia wrote to Victor Amadeus, on 6th January, 1725:—"The tranquillity of the Vaudois cannot be a matter of indifference to me. . . . It is attempted to compel them to observe the Catholic festivals, contrary to the edict of 23d May, 1694. . . . The ordinance by which they are required to provide a pension for their children who have abjured the religion of their fathers, seems to me no less hard. . . . And the books necessary for the exercise of the Protestant religion are stopped at the custom-house. . . . I beg your majesty to be well assured that of all marks of friendship which you can give me, that of attending to my intercession for the Vaudois churches will always be the most agreeable to me." This letter, full of such noble and touching expressions of interest, is given entire by Dieterici, pp. 395-397. Victor Amadeus replied on 3d March, 1725:—"Sir,—my brother [monsieur mon frère],—I have received with great pleasure your majesty's letter, which has just reached my hands. I will always be exceedingly desirous to gratify you in everything; but I cannot refuse myself the satisfaction of informing you that the kindness which your letter seeks to do to the Vaudois, my subjects, by a mere act of generous intercession, has been entirely anticipated by the sentiments of good-will and protection with which I regard the fidelity and zeal of the said Vaudois, and consequently their tranquillity. Their tranquillity is in no danger whatever, but my intention is that it shall be as permanent as their faithfulness in fulfilling their duties shall be; and I beg your majesty to rest assured of the perfect friendship and respect, with which I am, Sir,—my brother,—your majesty's attached brother [bon frère], Victor Amadeus." Although this letter makes no reply as to any of the facts mentioned by the King of Prussia, it is not the less remarkable because of the testimony which Victor Amadeus bears to the fidelity of the Vaudois, and their fulfilment of their duties.

³ On 20th November, 1730; signed by 165 heads of families of the valleys; presented to the king by Appia and Léger, deputies.

served only to excite injustice;¹ and the refusals of justice added still more and more to the grievances which they endured.²

Was this a chastisement of Providence inflicted upon this people—small in number, and already tried more than almost any other by the rods of the jealous love of their God—to punish them for the decrease of zeal which was manifested amongst them, and the relaxation of morals of which their own synods already complained?³ “In the end of the eighteenth century,” says M. Monastier⁴ (and we do not hesitate to apply this judgment to the eighteenth century altogether), “the valleys suffered in some measure from the decline of religious sentiments, which were generally weakened everywhere. Christian zeal, in former periods so lively and fruitful, drew less support from the pure fountain of the gospel. A self-sufficient and feeble reason, and human understanding, always the more proud the more narrow its bounds, began to assert for themselves a place in theology.” We shall see in next chapter how these germs of moral and religious weakness developed themselves, and happily, towards the end of this history, we shall behold their decrease. “The Lord,” says David, “will not cast off his people: neither will he forsake his inheritance.”⁵ May the Israel of the Alps also never be forgetful of the blessings graciously vouchsafed by their God!

¹ An inquiry after all persons actually Protestants, but who had been born or baptized in the Romish church, before 1686 and after 1676, to compel them to return to Catholicism, or to leave the country. (From 1730 to 1732.) A rescript of 9th October, 1733, prohibiting the Vaudois who were not so situated, from leaving the country to accompany their friends into exile. (Archives of Le Villar, vol. Religionarii, folio 177.)

This is but too well proved by all the criminal prosecutions which took place at this period, and the numerous proscriptions which decimated the Vaudois valleys, as well as by the measures above quoted.

³ In the preamble of each exhortation to public fasting. (Synodal Acts, &c.)

⁴ II. 198.

⁵ Ps. xciv. 14.

CHAPTER XX.

INFLUENCE OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY ON THE VAUDOIS CHURCH, AND PROGRESS OF EVENTS DOWN TO THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.¹

(A.D. 1730 TO A.D. 1792.)

Persecution continued in many forms of vexation—Growth and effects of new ideas—Children seized and retained by Papists—Popish missions in the valleys—Insincerity in replies to remonstrances of the British Government—Vexatious prohibitions and restrictions—Poverty and distress of the Vaudois—Their services to the King of Sardinia in his wars—Battle of Assiette—Continued vexations on the part of the Popish clergy—The Refuge of Virtue—The Vaudois Table instituted—Origin of the Vaudois congregation at Turin—The Vaudois churches of the French Alps begin to display signs of life—Unhappy effects of the infidel philosophy of the period on the spiritual character of the Vaudois pastors and church.

No period has left a greater number of documents than that of which we are now to treat;² but nothing can be more monotonous than the view of the facts which it exhibits. Never were events more numerous or less remarkable than in this part of our history.

The spirit of persecution continued to exert itself in a multitude of ways against the repose of the Vaudois; but it had lost its audacity, as their faith had lost its heroism. Boldness had passed over to the side of new ideas, equally remote from faith and from intolerance. A long succession of mean and assiduous annoyances, proceeding at once from low cunning and from bitter hatred, and wrought in an underhand manner and upon frivolous prettexts, spread like a stifling network over the Vaudois church.

That church itself already felt in some degree the relaxing influence of the eighteenth century. "The candidates for the holy ministry," says M. Monastier, "no longer acquired, for the most part, in the foreign academies to which they went to pursue their preparatory studies, anything else than a cold orthodoxy or the fatal germs of Socinianism. Virtue was often preached and exalted more than the work of Christ, or faith, or the love of God."³ Yet it was at this very time also that virtue became more rare! This apparent incongruity is only a consequence perfectly clear in the eyes of the Christian; and even the science of metaphysics itself, from recognizing at present merely a great number of moral phenomena which succeed each other within us, without the intervention of our own will, must necessarily advance towards the acknowledgment on scientific grounds of that mysterious, free, and powerful influence which the humblest child of Christ already knows under the name of the grace of God.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—Indicated at the bottom of the pages.

² It must not be forgotten that these documents are almost all unpublished. I will point out a sufficient number of them to enable the reader to judge of their abundance, at the same time mentioning the sources from which they are derived.

³ Monastier, Hist. des Vaudois, II., 198.

But at the period at which this chapter must resume the history of the Vaudois, questions of form still struggled to maintain an empire which already had in reality ceased to be theirs. The narrow and tyrannic formalism of the Romish church in particular endeavoured to impose its own shackles upon all, and contended by violence against the increasing repulsion which it caused. "We are subjected to very bitter tribulations," says a letter from the valleys at this period, "for the persons born or baptized Catholics before 1686, and those who became Catholics during the persecution, but who returned to their own church in more quiet times, as the edict of 1694 also authorized them, have received orders, contrary to that edict, to abandon Protestantism, and not to leave the country to go and profess it abroad, under pain of confiscation of goods and of the galleys. Many of those who have returned since 1730 have died in the prisons; others are wandering in the mountains or without resources in foreign countries."¹

"On the 23d of June last," says another Vaudois (in 1735), "one of my daughters, named Catharine, was carried off from us without our knowing at first what had become of her. But a few days after, her little brother, aged seven years, met her; and she, taking him by the hand, conducted him to Le Perier, to the house of the priest Don Quadro. I then went to the house of that ecclesiastic to reclaim my children; but he refused to give them up to me, on the pretext that they had become Catholics. I then said that the little boy, of seven years, was not come to an age when he could have understanding for anything of the kind; but all was to no purpose, and I have not seen them again."² The Vaudois pastors demanded at Pignerol the restoration of these children to their unhappy father; but they obtained only promises from which nothing resulted; and the petition addressed to the king with the same object appears not even to have received a reply. However, the edict of 18th August, 1655, did not authorize the abjurations of children, contrary to the will of their parents, before a fixed age.¹ But so great was the influence of the persons by whom these things were done, that they ventured frequently to repeat the same kind of enormity.

¹ Letter of 12th July, 1733, addressed by M. Cyprian Appia, pastor at St. John, to M. Turretin, professor at Geneva. (In my possession.)

² Petition of John Richard, native and inhabitant of the village of Les Prâs, in the valley of St. Martin. It is not dated. (Archives of the Court, Turin, No. 528.) The petitioner asks to have his children restored to him. I have not found the answer to this petition.

In the Synodal Acts of the valleys,² we read that "the assembly, grieved to see that, contrary to the edicts of our sovereigns, and, in particular, contrary to the letters-patent of Pignerol of 1655, some children have been carried off from their parents, has resolved that a most humble petition shall be addressed to his majesty, to order that they may be restored to us, and that, in future, the royal and gracious regulations of his majesty in our favour, and those of his glorious predecessors, may be observed." The representations of the synod remaining without effect, recourse was had to the mediation of England, which, however, was productive of no better results. "Children have not been carried off from the Vaudois," it was replied to the ambassador of that power; "but those who have voluntarily retired to an hospital of refuge³ have only been received into it."⁴ The note from which these words are extracted even adds that two children who had not attained to the requisite age—viz., a boy of eleven years and a girl of seven—had been sent back from the hospital to their parents. But if this ever took place, it can have been only a deceitful show, perhaps, got up for this very occasion; for we find, on the contrary, that this hospital, far from voluntarily sending back to their parents any of the children whom it had inclosed within its gates, aimed at nothing less than compelling the parents themselves to restore to it, against their will, those of their children who had escaped from the watchfulness of their captors, and had returned to their own families.⁵

¹ Above twelve years in the case of boys, and above ten in the case of girls.

² Synod held at Les Clots, 23d October, 1736, § v.

³ Opera del rifugio, ed ospizio pe' cattolizzati e cattolizandi. It was first founded at Turin, in 1679, by the Duchess Mary, then regent of the dominions of Savoy. To this establishment was attached a rent of 3000 francs, taken from the revenues of the order of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus; and of 2500 francs, taken from those of the company of St. Paul. It was not till 1740 that it was transported to Pignerol. Long details on this subject may be seen in Duboin, vol. xiii. and vol. xv., pp. 217–251.

⁴ "Reply to the memorial transmitted by the Duke of Bedford, minister of England, to the Chevalier Ossorio, and by him sent to Turin, with his letter of 31st May, 1738, to the Marquis de Gorzègue, on the subject of the representations of the Vaudois." (Inscription on the envelope containing this note, in the State Archives at Turin.)

⁵ This appears from a despatch of the intendant of Pignerol, who asked the advocate-general, se possa obligarsi un religionario, a restituire all' ospizio, un figlio

The monks and priests who were scattered over the valleys, were the natural purveyors for this hospital of detention. The government was petitioned to restrict the number of these ecclesiastics, but instead of diminishing it increased it. It was at this period that the bishopric of Pignerol was founded,¹ and the reply of the government was that they had not sent into the valleys more priests than were strictly necessary for the spiritual direction of the Catholics.² These words were intended to mislead foreigners as to the existence of the proselytizing missions which were in the valleys. The denial of their existence was implied, although not made in formal terms, and yet this organized proselytism was incontestible. We may judge what confidence could be placed in promises from a quarter, in which there was such insincerity in diplomatic relations. In the same note it was said³ that the Protestants were never made to contribute to the expense of Catholic worship; and yet, two years before, the Vaudois of St. John were still called on to contribute for payment of the paschal taper, and for the maintenance of the bells of the Popish church in their locality, as we learn from their own petitions.⁴

Meanwhile, with inconceivable injustice, the severest proceedings were adopted against every Protestant who was suspected of making proselytes to the Reformed Church.⁵ This was upon the minore d'anni dieci? The reply of the advocate-general was in the negative. This reply was dated from Turin, 21st July, 1778. (Archives of the Court, No. 613.) But there appears, under date 15th November, 1747, a petition of Peter Roche, having for its object to obtain the restitution of a child which had been taken from him before the age authorized for abjuration. It was in vain that the father produced the certificate of his child's birth; that document was sent back five times in succession, to be drawn out in different forms. I know not if this restitution was obtained.

¹ In 1748.

² Reply to the memorial of the Duke of Bedford. (Document already cited.)

³ In article V.

⁴ Dated March, 1746.

⁵ A prosecution was instituted against the pastor of St. John, Daniel Isaac Appia, on the accusation of a renegade, who pretended that this pastor had spoken to him with the view of preventing him from embracing Catholicism. (Letter of Appia to the commandant of Pignerol, justifying himself from this accusation. The letter is not dated, but it contains the following words, which determine the time when it was written: Sotto li tre di questo medesimo mese d'agosto del cadente anno 1773.) As, between 1708 and 1780, there were in the valleys eight pastors who bore the name of Appia, I think it may be useful to give their genealogy here. Two brothers of this name, Paul and Cyprian, who had both studied in England, were ordained at La Tour, on 13th February, 1708. Paul Appia was pastor at Prarusting, from 1708 to 1724; then at Le Villar, from 1728 to 1738; and, finally, at Bobi, from 1739 to 1756. His son, Paul Joseph, was pastor at Maneille, from 1732 to 1734; then at Rora, from 1735 to 1764. He had one son, named Jean, who was pastor at Prarusting, from 1750 to 1760, and at Bobi from 1760 to 1768. Cyprian Appia was pastor at St. John, from 1708 to 1738. His son, Daniel Isaac, part of Popery a self-condemning manifestation of distrust, indicating a suspicion of weakness in regard to doctrine. Such was, indeed, the dread entertained of Protestantism that opposition was made, even on the part of the authorities, to its adherents obtaining a majority in the municipal councils¹; nay the family worship was prohibited in which the Bible supplied the simple souls of our good mountaineers with the spiritual nourishment of which they stood in need.² This was to deprive them of one of the blessings which they prized most highly; and the value which they attached to it is attested by the numerous but fruitless petitions which they addressed with regard to it to the government,³ which thus reserved to itself the power of instituting arbitrary prosecutions at pleasure, on the pretext of religious meetings.

Nor were these the only vexations of this period. For example, if it happened that any old persons were induced, through the failure of their faculties or for any other reason, to embrace Catholicism, it was demanded that their children who had been brought up in the Protestant faith, should abandon their own convictions, to enter the Church of Rome.⁴ As for illegitimate children, they was pastor at Angrogna from 1736 to 1739, and at Le Villar from 1739 to 1761. The son of Daniel Isaac bore the name of Daniel only, and was pastor at St. John from 1745 to 1762. He had two sons, Cyprian Bartholomew, who was pastor at Mancille from 1760 to 1762, and at Prarusting from 1762 to 1787; and Daniel Isaac, who was pastor at St. John from 1762 to 1780. (It is this last who is named in the beginning of this note.)

¹ Informations and report of the commandant of Pignerol, concerning the constitution of the Council of Prarusting, ch' erano tutti religionarii. Dated 13th July, 1747. (Turin, Archives of the Court, No. 577.)

² Decree of the Senate of Turin, dated 18th January, 1771, and renewing the prohibition of all meetings or religious conferences not in the churches. (Archives of the Senate.) They had been already prohibited on 19th February, 1756, and 9th August, 1769.

³ "After the reading of the report, presented by M. Jahier, concerning the steps which he had taken, along with his colleagues, to obtain the revocation of the prohibitions pronounced by the Royal Senate, concerning the exercises of religion elsewhere than in the places of worship . . . the meeting resolves to renew the petitions presented on this subject on 12th March, 1771, and 23d September, 1773." Minutes of Synod held at Le Chiabas, 6th May, 1772, article VII.) But it would seem that these petitions were fruitless, for in the Synod of 12th and 13th October, 1774, Pastor Jahier read a new report of his further proceedings; and on 24th October, 1774, an order of the intendant of Pignerol (Sylvester Bertram) renewed the prohibition di far adunanze, sinodi o coloquii, in luoghi e case particolari, senza licenza di S. M. (In my possession.)

⁴ Order of the Secretary of State for the Department of the Interior, enjoining the Prefect of Pignerol to see to it, that children born of Protestant parents, whose parents should afterwards become Catholics, should be brought up Catholics. This order, founded upon the biglietto regio of 17th July, 1728, is dated 14th April, 1744. (Turin, Archives of the Senate: Materie ecclcs. et ordinarie, 1738 1745. Register V., folio 351.)

were clear gain to Popery;¹ and the guilty mother often experienced a distress as great as that of her shame, in seeing her infant taken from her arms to be transported to the hospital for proselytes.

Moreover, the Vaudois valleys were during almost the whole of the eighteenth century in a state of great destitution, partly occasioned by public events,² partly by bad harvests,³ sometimes aggravated by exchequer prosecutions,⁴ or by unexpected calamities⁵

¹ Nel 1751, un fanciulo essendo nato da due heretici, sciotti amendue dal Vincolo matrimoniale, fu scritto dal Prefetto da Pinerolo al senato, &c. . . . It was decided that this child should be taken from its parents, and brought up a Catholic. (Parere, sul ricorso del Vescovo di Pinerolo, toccante l'alleramente nella cattol. rel. de spurii nati da religionarii. Dated 21st May, 1788. Turin, State Archives, category Valdesi, No. 518.) By a real biglietto of 24th June, 1739, Charles Emmanuel III. ordered, with regard to an infant born in such circumstances, that its paternity should be inquired into, and that if the father was a Protestant, the child should not be brought up a Catholic. According to an order of the Senate of Turin, dated 2d May, 1755, the prefect of Pignerol was to recommend to the judges of St. John and Angrogna to take care that two children, in such circumstances, should be brought up by their mothers, until they could be received into the hospital. The mothers were held bound to present these infants, as often as they should be required. (Particulars derived from the same parere.) In 1757, the Vaudois presented a petition for liberty to bring up such children in their own religion, when the parents or the church would bear their maintenance. This petition is not dated, but the Report of the Senate of Pignerol, presented to His Majesty, as to the prayer of it, is dated 29th November, 1757. It mentions that this subject was examined into in 1739, and with an opposite result in 1751. It proposes to adhere to the regulations of 18th August, 1655.

² "The calamities with which God has afflicted various nations, the chastisements with which he has visited ourselves, in these last years, by the scantiness of the harvests (the sole resource of this country), and other misfortunes which have reduced the greater part of the inhabitants to a state of lamentable poverty . . . induce the meeting to resolve that a public fast shall be celebrated, &c. . . ." (Acts of the Vaudois Synod, held at Le Villar, 19th April, 1768, art. IV. and V.)

³ "The severity of the winter has destroyed our crops, and caused great distress." (Synod of 19th October, 1716, § IV.) "Our crops have almost totally failed . . ." (Letter of Cyprian Appia, September, 1728.) "I have exercised the ministry in the valleys for twenty-seven years. We are always exposed to the hatred and outrages of our enemies. We suffer the severest afflictions. The valleys are poor, and can do very little for their pastors. Without the British assistance we could not subsist." (Letter of the same. Vol. of 1734.) The crops failed again in 1752, in 1768, and in 1779.

⁴ Sequestration of the goods of those whose taxes were in arrear. (Archives of Le Perrier, year 1716.)—Reports by Léger on the state of the valleys in 1729. (Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. X. p. 174, &c.)—A Brief Account of the Vaudois of Piedmont. Pamphlet published in 1753.—"We are crushed down by extraordinary taxes, whilst the Catholics are even exempted from the taille royale." (Vaudois Correspondence. Letters of 1764, &c.)

⁵ "We still suffer much from the effects of a terrible calamity which took place in 1728." (Letter of Cyprian Appia, moderator, dated from St. John, 3d March, 1731.) This was an inundation. Another disastrous inundation took place in September, 1738. It was in consequence of this flood that the dike called the rampart was constructed at Robi. Collections were made from 1739 to 1743, in Holland and England, for its erection, and to relieve the wants of the inhabitants.

now resulting in the gradual ruin of families, now in their demoralization.¹ This excessive poverty arose in part from the want of employment and of commerce—the sad consequences of the manifold prohibitions which pressed upon the Vaudois; it was also in part owing to the superabundance of the population shut up within the limits of the three valleys, to which they were absolutely confined.² But it must be recorded, to the praise of the doctrines of the gospel, that the foreign Protestant churches displayed an assiduity in relieving the Vaudois commensurate with the indigence by which they were distressed.³

The statement of the distribution of these funds forms a folio MS. of 40 pages. Of the 372 heads of families who appear in it, there are 186 (the exact half) whose signature is represented only by a conventional sign. This circumstance may serve to show us, pretty exactly, what was the state of elementary education in the Vaudois valleys at this period, from the proportion of those who could sign their names and of those who were completely illiterate.

¹ Note on the events which took place after 1730.—"Many of our people, finding nothing but disquietude and disorder at home, wished to leave their native country. Some, knowing that more considerable aid was given to those of whose proselytism most hope was entertained, in order to secure that object, affected to be ready to abjure, that they might participate in this aid. Others sold their properties at a loss and went abroad. Not having found themselves so well off in foreign countries as they expected, they returned more miserable and distressed than before. In many cases, also, persons who had abjured to escape the vexations of the edict, could not get quit of those of their own consciences. Some repaired to Switzerland, to return to the religion which they had abjured. Their properties were then confiscated in Piedmont, and they were exposed to great dangers if they attempted to return thither. Prosecutions were even instituted against the pastors, on the charge of having encouraged these persons to relapse after they had become Catholics; and those of them who remained in the country were forbidden to leave it. Some, after having spent all that they had in foreign countries, returned to augment the misery of their native valleys. The children of some Protestant parents had been baptized Catholics and numbers of these children having returned to the faith of their fathers, were proceeded against as relapsed. A relaxation of family ties, of discipline, and of morals, was the result of this inquiet and wandering life. The country long experienced the effects of it," &c.

² "Besides that the limits within which they have from time to time been restrained are narrow, they are not permitted, although they are Christians, to leave them, and to settle elsewhere with their brethren in the dominions of the same sovereign; so that these mountains are in some places too densely peopled and in other places not sufficiently. Commerce is there impossible, poverty is general, &c." . . . (Petition of the Vaudois pastors aux magnifiques Seigneurs de la Florissante République Helvétique à Zurich; dated 15th March, 1723. It is in the handwriting of Reynaudin, moderator-adjunct, and is signed by nine other pastors, amongst whom is Vincent Arnaud, son of the colonel. (In my possession.)

³ A long series of documents and letters, extending from 16th March, 1730, to 11th August, 1731, all relative to the management and distribution of the 10,000 florins granted by Holland to the Vaudois valleys. (Report by Professor Léger, printed at Geneva in 1731, 30 pages, 4to. See also the manuscript report contained in the Archives of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. X. p. 177.)—Etats de secours accordés par la Hollande aux Eglises Vaudoises, fait et arrêté à Delft, le 13 Mars, 1733, par MM. les commissaires du Synode vallon, &c. . . . (Report communicated.) This

The King of Sardinia might perhaps have contributed more to their assistance; for they had recently given him new proofs of their fidelity. "You know, gentlemen," wrote the intendant of Pignerol to the Vaudois ministers, in 1733, "that his majesty our sovereign has declared war; and you are, no doubt, aware that he goes to put himself at the head of the army. It is my duty therefore to signify to you, that you should, if you please, exhort your flocks to make extraordinary prayers . . . for the success of his arms."¹ We shall by and by see that the Vaudois themselves contributed by their valour to his military glory.

The cause of this war was, however, in no way connected with the interests of the people of Piedmont. It concerned the crown or Poland, which the Emperor of Austria² wished to place upon the head of the Elector of Saxony. This was opposed by France, and the King of Sardinia allied himself with France. He joined his troops to those of the Marshal de Villars, and took from Austria several places in Italy.³ The death of the marshal⁴ put an end to the exploits of Charles Emmanuel III., but did not prevent him from reaping the fruits of them; for the treaty of peace, which he concluded in the following year with the court of Vienna,⁵ aid was regular, and was granted (1) to the poor of each parish; (2) to the actual pastors; (3) to pastors emeriti; (4) to the widows of pastors; (5) to schoolmasters. At the date of the report, there were in the valleys sixty-eight schools participating in this aid, and three widows of pastors, who each received sixty florins. These were Madame Léger, Madame Bastie, and Madame Reynaudin. They all lived together at Villescèche. From 1739 to 1744, the distribution took place of the aid granted in consequence of the inundation of 1738. We find, under the date of 1741, a General Statement of the Ecclesiastical Subsidies for the Valleys, in which England is set down for £270 sterling.—A memorial on behalf of the Evangelical Churches of the Valleys of Lucerna, Pérouse, and St. Martin, addressed in 1753 to the stadtholder, and followed by a note regarding an extraordinary contribution of 300 francs, granted in December, 1753, by the Walloon churches to the poor of the Vaudois churches, and for the building of a schoolhouse at Villar Pinache. Finally, the Mémoire concernant la situation présente des Eglises évangéliques des vallées Vaudoises, présenté au Synode tenu à la Haye, le 9 Septembre 1762, &c., completes the exhibition of these foreign supplies, received at this period by the valleys.

¹ Letter dated 17th October, 1733. (Correspondence of the Moderator of the Vaudois churches from 1732 to 1734. In my possession.) ² Charles VI.

³ Pavia, on 4th November, 1733; Milan, on 30th December of the same year; Novara, on 7th January, 1734; Tortona, on 23th January, &c.

⁴ Which took place at Turin, 17th June, 1734. De Villars was 84 years of age.

⁵ Signed at Vienna, 3d October, 1735. By this treaty, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily were given up to Don Carlos, the ally of France and a descendant of the house of Bourbon. He was the son of Philip V. and Elizabeth Farnèse, was born 20th January, 1716, became Duke of Parma and of Piacenza in 1731, and King of the Two Sicilies in 1735; he was proclaimed King of Spain, under the name of Charles III., at Madrid, on 11th September, 1735. He then left Ferdinand, his third son, at Naples, as King of the Two Sicilies. It was not till 1716 (15th August) added to his dominions the whole of the Novarais and some other districts of Lombardy.

A few years after, war broke out again between Austria and France;¹ but this time, the King of Sardinia, true to the habitual policy of his predecessors, declared against France and allied himself with Austria.² The French army attempted to invade Piedmont in 1742, by the passes of the Vaudois Alps; but Charles Emmanuel drove them back into Dauphiny. In the following year, the French, having entered into alliance with the Spaniards, penetrated into Piedmont by the Var, and defeated the King of Sardinia, near Coni, on 30th September, 1744. They then laid siege to Coni, but could not gain possession of the place, where the Vaudois, as historians tell us, displayed great valour.³ Three years after this, the battle of Assiette took place,⁴ the success of which was principally owing to the Vaudois, and the effect of which was still more to enlarge the dominions of their sovereign.⁵

The Col [or Pass] of L'Assiette is a narrow defile situated between Fenestrelle and Exilles, in the mountain range which separates the valley of the Pragela from that of the Doire. The Piedmontese and Imperial forces⁶ had made strong intrenchments there. The Marshal De Bellisle attacked them. He had nine that the family compact was concluded at Versailles, amongst the four sovereigns of the house of Bourbon, in consequence of which England declared war against them.

¹ France was then in alliance with and supported by Spain.

² In 1742.

³ See Monastier, II., 182.

⁴ On 19th July, 1747.

⁵ By treaty, signed at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748.

⁶ There were there eight battalions of Piedmontese troops, and three battalions of Imperial troops. (These and the following particulars are taken from a manuscript entitled: Memorie storiche, estratto dal libro titolato Liber rerum notabilium et decretorum, pro hoc conventu Sanctæ Mariæ Gratiarum Carmeli collecti, da Fra Cypriano, segretario del convento. Archives of the Bishopric of Pignerol.) For these particulars I have also consulted two ballads or sirventes on that event. One of these pieces is in patois, and commences thus:

“Sé fossé may senti,” &c. . . .

The other is written in bad French, and was probably composed by a Vaudois soldier; it is merely a long play of words on the name of the field of battle. Some idea of it may be formed from the following lines:

“Dix mille fantassins
Y ont laissé la vie. . . .
Voulant tremper leurs doigts
Dans l'Assiette aux Vaudois.”

This complaint contains twenty-two couplets. According to the French historians, only 1500 men fell at the battle of Assiette. The narrative from which I quote gives the numbers differently. I have adopted them because of their precision, but I cannot vouch for them. It would have been difficult and superfluous for me to have made researches on this point.

pieces of artillery—his opponents had not one. He had a reserve of eight battalions, whilst all the Piedmontese forces were engaged at once. The attack commenced about mid-day, and the firing was continued until evening. By the aid of their artillery, the French gained some ground at first, and ascended the mountain to the base of the Piedmontese intrenchments; but by a vigorous sortie, the Piedmontese successfully repulsed them. The Marshal de Bellisle, rallying his troops on the level grounds below, gave them a few moments of rest, and then encouraging them brought them back gallantly to the charge. This time they mounted to the assault with such rapidity, that the Piedmontese musketry could not make them fall back. The combat now became one of swords and pikes along almost the whole line. The place which the Vaudois occupied became so filled up with dead bodies that it has ever since been called the Valley of Death.¹ But the enemy kept their ground; when some of our mountaineers, recollecting the success of their guerilla tactics, rolled down enormous stones upon the assailants, and that in such quantity that the French, notwithstanding the vigour with which they had begun, gave way before these thundering avalanches of rocks, and were a second time repulsed. "Then," says our narrative, "Bellisle, who in this affair had, notwithstanding his reverses, conducted himself very well, and whose countenance reddened with shame, resolved to hazard in a further effort both his glory and his life. He made a last effort, brought back his wearied troops a third time—set them an example in his own person, exposing himself at their head to the fire of the enemy, like a common soldier, and with all the courage of a hero was the first to plant, with his own hand, a standard upon our intrenchments. It was gloriously done, but it was all. The marshal was killed upon the spot. His army lost 6000 men killed and wounded, including more than 300 officers. Three colours also were taken. On our side," continues the narrator, "we had 200 killed and wounded, including three officers, one of whom recovered."²

The attention of their sovereign having been thus favourably recalled to the loyal and valiant inhabitants of the Vaudois mountains, Charles Emmanuel at first granted them some favours. They were allowed to have notaries of their own communion.³ Civil justice also showed less partiality in regard to Protestants,¹ its authority was even exerted upon some occasions for their protection.

¹ These particulars are extracted from the Mémoires de Paul Appia. (MS. communicated by the family of the author.)

² Narrative above quoted, "Memorie storiche, estratte dal libro titolato Liber rerum notabilium," &c.

³ Charles Emmanuel II. established six offices of notaries for the Protestants in the Vaudois valleys, under the restriction that these civil officers should do no business except for those of their own religion.—Royal Letters Patent of 14th

But the Church of Rome only became more active in its schemes of annoyance and of proselytism. It obtained at once new Instructions, more rigorous than those of 1730,² and permission to open at the very gate of the valleys the office for ensnarement and abduction which had hitherto been located at Turin, under the February, 1746. (This was contrary to Section IV. of Chap. II., Title XXII., Book V., of the Constitutions or General Code of the Kingdom.) Before these letters-patent were granted, several Protestant notaries had, however, been authorized to execute their professional functions in the valleys. John Peter Brezzi, at St. John, had received this authority on 4th September, 1732; James Brezzi, his brother, on 7th August, 1733, to act at La Tour, but he removed to St. Germain. John Francis Combe filled the office of notary at St. John, which he purchased on 22d July, 1703, from Manfredo Danna, but for which Combe received no formal authorization before 5th May, 1741. (Extracted from various documents in the Archives of the Court.)

¹ In 1774, the Vaudois petitioned to be freed from the taxes unjustly levied from them. (Their petition, according to the unfortunate custom of the times, is not dated.) An order from the Chamber of Accounts, dated 17th August, 1774, bore that the taxes unjustly levied should be repaid to them. (These two documents are printed on the same sheet.)

² Instructions of the Senate of Turin, dated 29th July, 1740, and addressed to the Judges of the Vaudois valleys on the course which they ought to pursue with regard to the religionaries. They contain thirty-two articles, founded upon all the former edicts, like those of 1730, on which they are a seriously aggravated commentary. According to these new instructions, if it so happened that a Protestant fell ill beyond the legal limits of the Vaudois valleys, the pastor could not go to visit him without being accompanied by a layman; he was forbidden to pass the night with the sick man; he could not remain in the place for more than one day, and must abstain from conducting any kind of religious service. The Catholic worship, on the contrary, could be celebrated everywhere, even in localities entirely Protestant, if the parish priests or the missionaries thought proper. The number of Vaudois pastors and places of worship could not be augmented. All exercise of religion, whether public or private, was interdicted at St. John. Still less were the Protestants permitted to have a school there. The pastor was prohibited from residing there; and if he were called to a sick person, he could not pass more than one night there. (It was then that the Vaudois of St. John celebrated their worship at Le Chiabas, a church built within the district of Angrogna.) Moreover, by these instructions, the Vaudois were prohibited from admitting any Catholics into their places of worship, from inclosing their burying grounds, from purchasing or renting lands beyond the tolerated limits, and from any religious relations with foreigners. Mixed marriages were also forbidden, unless the Protestant party contracting the marriage should first sign a promise to embrace Catholicism. The children of Protestants could be taken from their parents at a fixed age (for boys above twelve years, and for girls above ten), if the children manifested a desire to become Catholics. (And it may be conceived how easy it was to imagine this desire, or to create it by the allurements of some promise, in the unreflecting mind of the child.) Finally, foreign Protestants were not to be entitled to settle in the Vaudois valleys without an express permission from his majesty. "Con questi lumi," add the Instructions in conclusion, "restando voi sufficientemente instrutto, di cio che riguarda li sudetti religionarii, non avete dunque che a vigilare," &c. . . .

title of the Refuge or Alberga of Virtue.¹ This establishment was subsequently still more extended,² and to this period are to be referred some attempts to enforce abjuration by violent means not only in the case of children, but even of men of mature age.³

¹ The Alberga di Virtù was an establishment anterior to the Refuge, but to which the latter was originally united. (From 1679 to 1739.) In 1740 the Refuge was transported to Pignerol, and opened under the title of the Hospital for those who have become, and for those who wish to become Catholics. Those who found refuge there were to have been instructed in some arts or trades, by which they might gain their living after their leaving it. But the religious, or rather the ecclesiastical interest very soon predominated over those of industry and charity. This establishment was then no longer devoted to any purpose but the propagation among Protestants of the doctrines and forms of the Catholic religion. This propagation had especially the object of attaching to the Church of Rome the children who had been drawn into the hospital. It then took the name of the Hospizio di Catecumeni. (In 1772.)

² There is a Royal Order, of date 28th December, 1740, for furnishing 20,000 livres towards the building of the Hospital at Pignerol. On 13th May, 1744, a new order to provide for enlargements of the building. On 1st May, 1745, letters-patent were issued to organize the administration of the establishment. On 14th June, 1745, a biglietto regio, ordaining the transference thither of the Vaudois children, supported nell' Alberga di Virtù, in Torino. On 24th June, 1730, a concordat with Benedict XIV. applied the fourth part of the income of vacant benefices to the Hospital of Pignerol. (Articles VI. and VII.) On 21st March, 1752, letters-patent were issued, by which his majesty declared that he took that establishment under his protection, and approved its rules. According to these (1) the establishment is to be reckoned secular; (2) the direction of it is confided to a commission which shall be presided over by the bishop, and in his absence by the governor or commandant of Pignerol. This commission is to meet once a-month. (Articles II., III., and IV.) The Hospital not being able to maintain more than fifty boarders at one time, they are to be divided into two classes (Article XVI.), &c. See Duboin, t. xiii. vol. xv. pp. 220-223.

³ There is a little poem, very imperfectly versified, but full of simplicity and sometimes of energy, in which a Vaudois, named Michelin, relates that, having set out on a Saturday evening, to go to the valley of St. Martin, he was arrested at Le Pomaret by the soldiers, conducted to La Pérouse, rifled, deprived of his clothes, and thrown into a dungeon. There, says he,

Je n'étais assisté d'aucune nourriture
Et mon corps grelottait par la grande froidure.

[I was supplied with no food, and my body shivered because of the great cold.]
Then follow some details concerning his captivity :

Les enfants, le matin,
Venaient devant ma porte
Me disant, Michelin . . .

Ne nous chantez-vous plus la chanson de l'Assiette?

[The children in the morning came about my door, saying, "Michelin . . . will you not sing to us any more the ballad of l'Assiette?"] This refers to the ballad which I have quoted in speaking of the battle of Assiette. Perhaps it was the work of the same mountain-bard, now a prisoner. Like Homer, poor Michelin appears to have been blind; for in this narration, he speaks only of what he hears, and never of what he sees; he mentions that he fell as he walked in his dungeon; and, finally, that the common people said to him, "Sing, with your violin, and you will win two or three picailions." (The picailon is an old Pied-

Meanwhile, the effect of all this upon the Vaudois church, was to produce a deeper sense of the necessity of perfecting its discipline and organization.¹ It obtained the right to be officially represented montese coin, worth two deniers.) "When the constables came," he proceeds to say, "they had to employ force to drive away the crowd from the gates of my dungeon." And the curious conversed about him in the following terms:—

S'il se faisait chrétien
Se disaient-ils l'un l'autre,
On lui ferait du bien.
Mais il n'est pas des nôtres;
Et puisq' il ne veut pas
Changer de religion,
On va le laisser là
Perir dans la prison.

[“If he would become a Christian,” said they, one to another, “he would receive favours. But he is not one of our people; and since he does not choose to change his religion, he will be left to perish there in the prison.”] Four stanzas are here devoted to the narration of the different remarks of the crowd:—

Croyez-vous que cela le tirera d'affaire? . . .
Que peut-il avoir fait, ce pauvre misérable? . . .

[Do you think the fellow will get out of this scrape? . . . What can he have done, the poor wretch? . . .] “And I,” says he, “who heard all this, as I lay upon the straw, I prayed to God to support me En fermeté de foi, pendant toute ma vie.”

[In steadfastness of faith, during the whole of my life.]

He had also charitable visitors, who brought him something for his comfort. The monks, likewise, came to urge him to abjure. At last he was conducted to Pignerol, where he endured a new imprisonment and new solicitations:—

Si vous n'abjurez pas votre infâme hérésie . . .
Votre corps périra
Au fond d'une prison
Et l'on confisquera
Toute votre maison.

Ma maison est au ciel; c'est en lui que j'espère! . . .
Quand j'aurais en ce lieu
Tout perdu, corps et biens,
Mon ame devant Dieu
Ne craindra jamais rien.

[If you do not abjure your infamous heresy . . . your body will perish in the depths of a prison, and your whole house will be confiscated.—My house is in heaven, it is it that I hope for! . . . When I shall have lost everything in this place, body and property, my soul shall be before God, and shall fear nothing.] At last the perseverance of the converters was overcome by the perseverance of the captive in remaining faithful to the gospel, and Michelin was restored to liberty. This piece of verse has thirty-seven couplets, of two quatrains each. I have thought it right to quote it, notwithstanding its little literary merit, because of the sentiments which it expresses, and the particulars to which it introduces us; for these particulars sometimes do more to enable us to understand the character of the period, than more serious documents.

¹ Being obliged to restrict myself in these notes, which have already exceeded due limits, I can do no more than mention here, without almost any quotation, the Synodal Acts relative to this subject, and the things of which they treat.—Of by elective directors, appointed by its own synods, under the name of the Vaudois Table.¹ Regulations were framed concerning the stipends of the pastors² and salaries of the schoolmasters,³ and arrangements were made for watching over the students of theology at foreign seminaries.⁴

Consistorics: Synod of 1760, § vii.; Synod of 1768, § xiii. Of the Diaconate: Synod of 1765, § iv. Of the Sanctification of the Sabbath: Synod of 1722, § i. and x.; of 1724, § i.; of 1727, § viii.; of 1745, § iv.; of 1748, § ix.; of 1753, § iii.; of 1760, § ii., &c. Of Worship: 1718, xiv.; 1722, viii., xi.; 1729, viii.; 1745, x.; 1762, ii., &c. Of Synods: 1720, viii.; 1744, v.; 1791, iv., &c. "The moderator and adjunct shall make a visit to all the churches, in those years when there is no synod, to inquire into their wants, and to maintain good harmony between the parishioners and their pastor." (Acts of the Synod, held at Les Clots, 23d October, 1736, § x.) The synod of St. Germain, 29th November, 1729, remarked with grief that discipline was more and more relaxed (§ viii.); and the synod of La Tour (1748), ordained that every pastor should read from the pulpit, at Easter annually, the articles of discipline extracted from the Synodal Acts, that the members of the church may not be able to allege ignorance with regard to them (§ viii.) This first compend of the acts relative to discipline was made by Pastor Bastie, but it was very incomplete.

¹ A letter from the intendant of Pignerol, dated 12th September, 1754, authorizes the Vaudois Table to draw up and sign petitions in name of the valleys. In the synod held in 1754, at St. Germain, it was resolved that an inventory should be made of all the papers relative to the Vaudois churches, and that they should be put into the hands of the moderator, to be preserved by him and his successors, in the archives of the body over which they presided (§ viii.) The introduction of lay members into the Vaudois Table was attempted in 1722. (Synod of Le Villar, art. xiii.) It was proposed again at the synod of 1795, but not finally resolved upon till that of 1823. In the synod of 1765, it was resolved that two persons, closely related to one another, could not belong to the Table at once (§ ix.)

² The English subsidies were suspended in 1723. The arrears were paid in 1726. On the report of the attorney-general, Edward Wortley (dated at London, 30th May, 1726), George I. made arrangements for their regular payment in future. (Order signed at Whitehall, 9th June, 1726.) By a mandate, dated 20th May, 1726, the Vaudois churches authorized the banker Chetwynd, of London, to receive this money, in order to transmit it to Piedmont, where they received it from the hands of a banker of Turin. (In that same year, 1726, some assistance was sent to the valleys by the church of Amsterdam.) George II. renewed the order which secured to the Vaudois the regular payment of these subsidies. The first distribution took place in his reign, on 25th March, 1728.

³ There were then sixty-eight schoolmasters in the Vaudois communes, and only fourteen who regularly participated in the foreign assistance, viz., the thirteen regents of the communal schools, who each received 160 francs from the British subsidies, and the regent of the Latin school, who received 250 francs from Holland. The other fifty-four teachers received their payment from their pupils, and kept school only for two or three months during winter.

⁴ There were at Lausanne five places or bursaries for Vaudois students, paid by the Evangelical cantons of Switzerland. In 1726, one of them was transferred to Geneva. In 1727, the synod of the Walloon churches founded one at Marburg. Queen Anne established three in England. There was at that time one, and afterwards a second was created at Basle, in Erasmus' college; and two others were created at Geneva, after 1730. There were thus three in that city, and thirteen in all. See the Synodal Acts of 16th September, 1693; of 3d June, 1694; of 6th October of the same year; of 17th June, 1695; of 19th July, 1701; of 17th Sep-

In the year 1727, we find the origin of the little Protestant church at Turin, which did not obtain a regular supply of ordinances till a century after;¹ and which quite recently, and after a struggle, has obtained a recognized place amongst the Vaudois churches.² It had many difficulties to contend with,³ but it had the patience and hope in God, requisite for happily surmounting them. May it now praise and glorify him for all his mercies by a truly living Christianity!

The long forgotten remains of the ancient Vaudois churches in the French Alps were also gradually restored.⁴ New and vigorous shoots sprung up around the stump, which seemed to have disappeared. And faithful to their origin, these churches thus beginning to re-appear, took advantage of the first ray of liberty which shone upon them, at the period to which we now approach, immediately to incorporate themselves with their sister churches of the valleys of Piedmont.⁵ The course of events prevented this outward unity tember, 1720; of 13th November, 1725; and successively, in the years 1727, § vi.; 1729, § vii.; 1743, § ii., &c.

¹ Cyprian Appia, the pastor of St. John, who had studied in England, offered to the ambassador of that power, at the court of Turin, that he would conduct a religious service in his residence as often as he desired it. (Letter of 5th January, 1727.) But it was not till 1827 that, by decree of 6th July, a Vaudois pastor was named Chaplain of the Protestant Legations at Turin.

² See the Echo of the Vaudois Valleys, of 6th September, 1849, p. 43; and chap. xxiv. in this volume.

³ A reggio vilietto, al vicario di Torino, riguardante i religionarii stabiliti, in questa città, dated 23d March, 1753, ordained—

(1.) That all the Protestants in Turin should have their names inscribed in the police books.

(2.) That they should never have any Catholic domestic in their service.

(3.) That they should not obtain permission to reside there for more than a year, but that after the expiry of this term, the permission should be prolonged if there was occasion for it.

(4.) That they should not be entitled to become tenants of lands in the neighbourhood of Turin, without special permission from the authorities.

(5.) That none of them should be permitted to devote himself to the employments of spinning or working of silk, which were exclusively reserved for the Catholics.

(6.) They were forbidden to speak, write, distribute books or plates, or hold conferences on religious subjects.

The British ambassador, Lord Rochefort, on 4th July, 1753, made a protest, in which the following sentence occurs:—"I do not suppose, that in interdicting all religious conferences, it was intended to prevent any one from being present at the religious service which takes place in the chapel of the legation." The king's reply to this note is dated 7th July, 1753. It is there said on this subject:—"As for Protestants continuing to frequent the house of the English minister, as they have done in time past, we will shut our eyes to it, in the way of toleration." (Archives of Turin, Nos. 529, 530, 531.)

⁴ See in chapter iv. of the First Part of this Work, under the year 1775, the Report on the progress of heresy in the valley of the Po, and in Queyras.

⁵ We read, in the Acts of the Synod of 1801, § iii.:—"The churches of St.

from being maintained; but there is room to hope that their spiritual union has, ever since that time, increased. God permitted the same men at a subsequent period to contribute to it by their labours on both sides of the Alps.

Meanwhile, the spirit of a future era had begun to manifest itself. The hostility cherished for ages by Popery against the Reformed Church was somewhat abated, and a more kindly feeling had begun to exist amongst the more enlightened representatives of both communions.² The Vaudois experienced less opposition in carrying on the exercise of their worship.³ The interests of their church became connected by new reasons with the maintenance of union amongst its members and with the rectitude of their lives. Thus the old difficulties were gradually forgotten, which had created alarm for the very existence of the Vaudois church,⁴ and the intestine dissensions which had threatened its welfare.⁵ The cause which had produced them subsisted, indeed, too long: for, from Véran, Molines, Fonsillarde, La Chalp, Arvieux, and Brunissard, in the department of the High Alps, having deputed to this assembly the citizen, David Monnet, their present pastor, . . . urgently request that they may be considered as forming one and the same body with us." The synod granted with delight this request, rejoicing in this interchange of testimonies of brotherly kindness between the two sides of the Alps.—The venerable pastor Monnet is now (1850) the senior pastor of the Vaudois church.

¹ The sainted Felix Neff came to the valleys in 1826. His influence, although it manifested itself more slowly, was not less deeply felt there than amongst the French Alps, where his memory is so justly venerated.

² In the synod of 1701, it was resolved to address the Bishop of Pignerol, to obtain the removal of the parish priest of Pramol; "persuaded (it is said in art. v.) that that prelate, who is a model of gentleness, equity, and all Christian virtues, will in his wisdom remove a man who is likely to be the author of discord."

³ Religious services were conducted at St. John, contrary to the edict of 1740; but no severity was employed to cause them to be relinquished. However, the Vaudois having petitioned on 11th February, 1792, to have a bell for their church at Serres, the reply, dated on the 13th, was in the negative. In 1722, the superior council of Pignerol opposed the rebuilding of the place of worship at Faët. (See Acts of Synod of Le Villar, 6th October, 1722, § ii.)

⁴ In a letter, written from St. John, 3d March, 1736, we read:—"Those of the plain are so extraordinarily indebted to creditors, who for the most part are Catholics, that, when the creditors ask for payment, the greater part of their debtors are compelled to leave their places of residence. There are always some who change. . . . This church is gradually losing ground. . . ." (Vaudois Correspondence in my possession.)

⁵ Without enlarging on this subject, I remit the reader to the report by Léger inserted in the Records of the Pastors of Geneva, vol. X., p. 177, and to that which he published in 1731. The following, however, are some passages of a letter addressed by the Walloon synod to the Vaudois church, 17th December, 1730:—"Can our churches be insensible to the mournful divisions which they see arising amongst you? . . . In the name of God, gentlemen and much honoured brethren, take effectual precautions to quench, in a Christian manner, so soon as they appear, these first flames of a dissension, whose consequences will be eternally lamentable to you."

the son of Reynaudin to the learned and caustic Peyrani, the valleys scarcely ever ceased to have some pastor whose student life had not only been marked by little seriousness, but, in too many cases, even by things that were reprehensible. Sometimes, the fever of innovation which characterized the time, impatient of all ancient rules and institutions, followed them even into their parishes.² But these aberrations became gradually more rare; and the frequent invocation of the Spirit of the Lord, on the part of the Vaudois church, by fasting and prayer, with exercises of contrition, humiliation, and repentance, was at last answered. It may be said to have issued a second time from the middle ages.

However, the influences, which had affected it but slightly, failing to subvert its ancient institutions, exhibited a fearful strength all over the world, overthrowing the French monarchy and shaking all the thrones of Europe. And when the revolution of 1790 broke out, even our valleys themselves were soon drawn into the terrible vortex of its innovations. "At that time," says M. Monastier;³ everything tended to draw away the mind from the inward life, which is hid with Christ in God. The power of the human intelligence, united with material force, had undertaken to

¹ The son of Reynaudin was dismissed from the Academy of Basle for his irregular conduct, after having been previously removed from Utrecht. He quitted the latter city in company with Scipio Rostan, who was successively at Utrecht, Lausanne, Geneva, and Basle, and who gave cause of complaint everywhere. Notwithstanding this turbulence of his youth, however, he exhibited a generous spirit, and conducted himself in a blameless manner in his maturer years. The same may be said of James Peyrani, whose youth furnished occasion for a very severe report. But we may be permitted to forget these juvenilia, from which the reputation of Theodore Beza himself does not suffer, to recollect that the synod of Bobi (October, 1760) addressed special thanks to Peyrani, for the excellence of his moderatorship, and in the same article (§ i.) cited him as an example to future moderators.

² There exists a Latin report, which must be referred to the year 1780, in which the pastors James Peyrani and Paul Appia are accused of wishing to put an end to the effusion of water in the rite of baptism. These pastors protested their innocence of this charge in the synod of Le Pomaret, 20th July, 1830.

³ "We cannot disguise from ourselves the deplorable condition into which the Christian world has long been sunk" (said the Synod of 1782, § ii.); "vice continuing to reign among us, and even to augment its empire" (Synod of 1788, § ii.) "shows the lamentable effects of the lawless passions which from time to time break out" (Synod of 1777, § iii.) "Our falls are so frequent, our transgressions so multiplied, our vices so numerous, that our consciences, agreeing with religion, urge us to solicit the Divine compassion." (Synod of 1774, § iii.) And the solemn fasts which took place after that date—viz., in 1775, 1778, 1781, 1783, 1786, 1789, and 1799, were all preceded by similar humiliations and fervent exhortations to repentance, full of prayers and supplications, than which, perhaps, none more expressive of deep feeling were ever employed by any church.

⁴ II., 200.

regenerate the world. Nothing was thought of but social organization, visible conquests and worldly glory; there remained no longer, it might almost be said, any room on earth for the interests of heaven." But we may also add, that it was a time of storm, and that storms are rapid and purify the air. Thus the dull atmosphere of the previous age was freed, by these agitations, from the antiquated elements which were incompatible with the life of progress. God brings good out of evil, and men full of their own turbulent passions are unconsciously governed by his hand.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS DURING THE WARS WHICH THE FRENCH REVOLUTION CAUSED IN ITALY.¹

(A.D. 1789 to A.D. 1801.)

Prudent reserve of the Vaudois at the outbreaking of the French revolution—Piedmont, allied with Austria, at war with France—The Vaudois troops on the frontier under General Gaudin—Popish conspiracy for a massacre of the defenceless Vaudois families—It is discovered and defeated by General Gaudin—Odious conduct of the Piedmontese government upon this occasion—Fidelity of the Vaudois to their sovereign—Jealous tyranny of the government—General Zimmerman intercedes for the Vaudois—Pretended favours granted by the government—Continued friendship of Zimmerman—Accession of Charles Emmanuel IV.—Petition of the Vaudois and reply of the king—Attempts to conciliate the Vaudois when their support became very important—Some ameliorations of their condition—Their treatment varies with political circumstances—Abdication of Charles Emmanuel IV.—Suwarrow and the Russian army in Piedmont—Great kindness of M. Rostan, pastor of Bobi, to wounded French soldiers—Suchet's public acknowledgment of it—Characteristic proclamation of Suwarrow—The valleys threatened with pillage and devastation by Russian troops—Successful appeal of M. Appia to the Russian commanders—Illustrative anecdotes of Suwarrow, Prince Bagration, and other Russian officers—The manners and habits of the Russian troops—Hatred of the Popish priests against the Vaudois exhibited in malicious falsehoods assiduously told to the Russian generals—Napoleon's victories—The battle of Marengo—The Cis-alpine Republic—The Vaudois become possessed of equal rights with other citizens.

THE revolutionary scenes of which France was the theatre, were at first regarded in the Vaudois valleys merely with a prudent reserve.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—In general, the modern authors, mentioned at the end of the Bibliography. In particular, the unpublished Mémoires de Paul Appia, containing the narrative of the events which took place in the Vaudois valleys, from 1789 to 1816. And, besides these, the particular sources indicated at the bottom of the pages.

A Vaudois pastor having ventured, in a public discourse,¹ in 1789, to make allusion to the events which were taking place on the other side of the Alps, was suspended from his functions for six months. "This decision," says M. Monastier, "was equally wise and just; for the preacher had failed in his duty, both as a subject of the King of Sardinia in bringing forward questions inconsistent with obedience to his government, and as a pastor in introducing politics into the Christian pulpit. It was next to impossible for men so little favoured by the existing powers, as the Vaudois had been, to have displayed, in such circumstances, more prudence and moderation."² But it was next to impossible, also, that many hearts should not have throbbed in secret with ardent sympathies for the cause of liberty, in these poor valleys which had so long been subjected to hard bondage. The very fact which has just been mentioned, proves the existence of these secret sympathies, of which only the public expression was blamed.

And, as if the genius of the past ages had felt a presentiment of defeat, and had sought to have a last struggle with the genius of modern times, the hateful and fanatical spirit of the old Popery arose again at the very commencement of this new era, to plot the massacre of the Vaudois, and sought to respond by new martyrdoms to the republican acclamation of "Liberty, Fraternity, Equality," by which the echoes of our mountains began to be awakened. In 1792, war broke out between France and Austria. Piedmont supported the latter power. Towards the end of the year, Savoy conquered by Montesquieu, and the province of Nice by Anselme, were united to France, which had just constituted itself a republic.³ The King of Sardinia (Victor Amadeus III.) having caused the Vaudois to take up arms, committed to them the defence of their own frontiers, under the orders of General Gaudin.⁴ All the Vaudois militia were encamped upon the ridge of the Alps to oppose the enemy. There remained in the valleys below only the women, the children, the aged, and the infirm—"feeble defenders!" says M. Monastier.⁵ Catholic fanaticism conceived the idea of a new St. Bartholomew's Day against these Protestant families, thus deprived of their natural protectors, who were occupied in the defence of their country. The execution of this plot was to have taken place in the night between the 14th and 15th of May, 1793. The list of the conspirators contained more than 700 names. A

¹ At the opening of the synod of 1789, says M. Monastier, II. 183. But no synod was held in the Vaudois valleys, that I know of, from 1788 to 1791.

² Monastier, II. 183.

³ 21st September, 1792.

⁴ A native of Switzerland, born at Nyon; his name is by some authors written Gudin, and by others Godin.

⁵ Monastier, II. 185.

column of assassins, assembled at Lucerna, was, on a signal given, to spread itself over the communes of St. John and La Tour, consuming all with fire and sword.¹ The house of the priest of La Tour, his church, the convent of the Recollets, and the houses of a few Catholics of the place, were filled with murderous villains ready alike for pillage or for massacre.²

But there were also some generous Catholics, who refused to take part in this odious wickedness. These worthy men were better than Catholicism; and for the fourth time in the course of this history, we see issuing from the ranks of the Romish church the saviours of the people whom it sought to destroy. Don Brianza, priest of Lucerna, not only refused to join the conspirators, but he also hastened to make this conspiracy known to those whose existence was menaced. Captain Odetti, of Cavour, likewise ran to warn the Vaudois, and to defend the friends whom he had amongst them.

An urgent message was immediately sent to General Gaudin,³ asking him to bring down his troops from the mountains, or at least to permit the Vaudois legion to go and preserve their own homes from invading assassins. The brave general, unable to believe in such perfidy and cruelty, attached no importance to the revelation which was made to him. A new messenger was despatched to him without more effect. A third arrived and presented the list of the conspirators. The general could not believe in it. Moreover, he had his orders; he could not abandon his post, nor consent to the withdrawal of part of his troops; and this third emissary also returned without any success. Seventeen persons went to him in succession. Time pressed; the alarm was given; the Vaudois troops, boiling with indignation, were all impatience to run to the succour of their families. At last the magistrates of La Tour and Le Villar themselves came to assure General Gaudin of the reality of this atrocious conspiracy, and to entreat for protection. He then adopted his resolution.

It was the eve of the fatal day; a report was spread of an approaching attack of the French; the troops fell back, and the Vaudois companies took position in their respective communes. But the troops of St. John and La Tour, being at a greater distance from their homes than the rest, and more impatient to return to them, descended the mountains with such rapidity, that many of the soldiers lost on the way some part of their baggage. The delay of a moment to pick up from the ground anything that might have fallen from their hands, would have seemed to them to endanger the existence of that which was dearest to them, and of which the loss would have been irreparable.

¹ Monastier, II. 185.

² These, and the following particulars, are derived from a contemporary report which even gives, in part, the names of the conspirators. The author was afterwards a member of the general council of the department of the Po, as representative of the canton of Lucerna.

³ Whose head-quarters were at Malpretus, above Bobi.

The conspirators, seeing these irritated and warlike troops arrive, made their escape by the gate of the convent of the Recollets which looks out upon the torrent of the Angrogna.¹ The list of their names, drawn up by themselves, was sent to the Duke of Aosta,² who had manifested some regard for the Vaudois; but none of these traitors was prosecuted. The king³ even reproached General Gaudin for having permitted his troops to abandon their position. "Sire," replied he, "it is the most glorious day of my life, for I have not had to shed blood but have prevented the effusion of it." He was, nevertheless, dismissed from the service. But if he incurred court disgrace, he became the object of the liveliest gratitude to the Vaudois who owed to him their preservation.

"The French," says M. Monastier, "who were not ignorant how precarious and exceptional the situation of these poor people had been, thought that they would have little difficulty in persuading them to revolt, to deliver up to them the passages of the Alps, and to make common cause with them. They were mistaken. The Vaudois deemed fidelity to an oath, even in an inferior condition, preferable to the splendid hopes of religious, civil, and political liberty obtained by perjury. This admirable conduct, however, could not silence calumny, nor stifle suspicion."⁴

The fort of Mirabouc had surrendered. This place was very feeble: it had only two cannons, one of which burst when it was fired. The garrison consisted of a single company of Vaudois and of some Piedmontese invalids. The commander was a Swiss officer, named Mesmer. The French surprised the fort, from the side of the Col la Croix. The Vaudois were accused of having favoured them; Mesmer was sick; he surrendered; in truth, he could not have resisted; but he was a Protestant, and he was shot in the citadel of Turin.

The tyrannical Piedmontese government became always the

¹ These particulars are derived from the report above quoted. There exists on this subject a MS. poem of 225 lines, commencing thus—

Dieu tout-puissant, Dieu de nos pères,
Ton bras s'est encor déployé . . .

(Amongst the papers collected by M. Appia.)

² Who ascended the throne in 1796, and took the name of Charles Emmanuel IV.

³ Victor Amadeus III.

⁴ Monastier, II. 184.

more suspicious, the more that it found itself in danger. Colonel Fresia succeeded General Gaudin in the valleys. One of his commissioned officers was a Vaudois, by name Davit; he was accused of treason, and put to death. Colonel Marauda and Major Goamte, the two officers of highest rank in the Vaudois troops, were cast into prison.¹

All the powers of Europe entered into a coalition against France,² but she increased her territories in combating them. When the storm of the reign of terror had passed over her,³ and Napoleon was making his first campaign,⁴ Piedmont became sensible of approaching danger. General Zimmerman, former colonel of the Swiss guards at Paris, having escaped the massacre of the 10th of August,⁵ entered the service of the King of Sardinia. He very soon succeeded in making himself generally beloved. Although a Roman Catholic, he demanded for the Vaudois those civil and political rights which France had offered them, and which their own sovereigns, faithful to the policy of Rome, persisted in refusing them. The Duke of Aosta, second son of Victor Amadeus, undertook to transmit to the king these requests of the noble-hearted general. The king replied to his son—"We have read the memorial which General Zimmerman has sent us through you, concerning the desires which our dear faithful subjects, the Vaudois, have expressed to you relative to their present political condition. Considering the constant and distinguished proofs of their attachment and fidelity, which they have always given to our royal predecessors, and the devotedness which they have shown in the present war, we are disposed to regard favourably the contents of the said memorial, and to make them at once experience the effects of our special good-will; reserving to ourselves, in regard to some of the articles on which fuller inquiry is requisite, to grant them, after the war, such concessions, compatible with the constitution of the state, as may still more assure them of the estimation in which their services are held by us."

After these not very plain nor intelligible sentences, and as a reward for all the fidelity, bravery, and other virtues which he was pleased to acknowledge in the Vaudois, Victor Amadeus III. granted them (1) authority to practise medicine, but only amongst those of their own religion; (2) a promise that the abuses of which they were the victims, in matters of taxation, should be put an end to.

¹ These details are taken from Menastier, II. 176.

² Except Turkey, Switzerland, Denmark, and Russia. (7th March, 1793.)

³ From 28th March, 1793, to 27th July, 1794.

⁴ At Toulon, in December, 1793.

⁵ 1792.

But abuses ought not to exist in the case of any person whatever. Under what sort of legislation, then, must the people of the valleys have been placed, when their rulers could venture to speak of the cessation of abuses as a great favour? (3) "We prohibit," he added, "any one from taking away their children from the Vaudois, before the age fixed." But the law forbade that already; and was not that fixed age itself the very utmost stretch of arbitrary tyranny? (4) "If any burdens shall ever be imposed upon the Vaudois from which the Catholics are exempt, we will cause the matter to be cared for according to the demands of justice." And these were the signal favours so pompously announced! this was the extent of the special good-will of the King of Sardinia towards these Vaudois, who had always given constant and distinguished proofs of their fidelity to his royal predecessors!

He continues thus:—"You will be so good as to announce to our dear and faithful Vaudois subjects, our resolutions and sentiments above expressed; making them understand that as we are persuaded they will thereby be the more animated to display upon this occasion, all their zeal, courage, and bravery against our enemies, they may also always reckon with increased confidence on our strong desire to give them, *at the close of the war,*¹ the most particular marks of our special protection; and so we pray God that he may keep you under his holy and good protection."²

Is this the language of a father writing to his child—of a sovereign who acts as a father to his subjects? The promises thus adjourned to the end of the war were never fulfilled; but the expression of good-will towards the Vaudois increased with the increase of external dangers, and when these dangers were past severity was resumed as before. A few insignificant concessions ensued at first upon these pompous promises. The communes of Maneille and Chiabrans obtained the right to have a burying-ground.³ A new ratification of their privileges was granted to the Vaudois⁴—these privileges having now been ratified already more than fifty times, without any extension of them in harmony with the wants and enlightenment of the age, beyond what they had been three centuries before. And when the mighty voice of the present seemed

¹ An armistice was concluded at Cherasco on 28th April, 1796, and a treaty of peace signed soon after.

² Given at Turin, 4th June, 1794. Signed Your very affectionate Father, Victor Amadeus. Countersigned Granéri.

³ By authorization granted 6th December, 1694. (Turin, Archives of the Court, No. 617.)

⁴ On 1st February, 1795, sanctioning those of 14th September, 1448. (Turin, Archives of the Court of Accounts, a small folio vol. of stamped paper, No. 576.)

again less distinct and loud, the precarious favour of the government was transferred from the children of the martyrs to their persecutors.¹

"Yet there are none whose attachment the court of Savoy should be more solicitous to secure than the inhabitants of the valleys," said General Zimmerman at another time in one of his memorials,² "for their mountains are almost everywhere impregnable ramparts . . . and an army, however numerous, might fail in the attempt to reduce them to subjection; if it were possible that hostile proceedings should ever destroy that love for their sovereigns, of which they have on so many occasions given the most unquestionable proofs." In the letter accompanying this memorial, it is said that many proposals of democratic insurrection had been made to the Vaudois by the inhabitants of the plain, but that these mountaineers had always rejected them; and the memorial itself adds, "all that can happen on the plain will be but a transient blaze, if we can keep the mountains quiet and attached." "The general has visited all the valleys in person," it is also said in this letter;³ "he has there conversed with the humblest of the inhabitants, and what has been his regret . . . to hear them make bitter complaints . . . especially of their children being forcibly taken from them, one of nine years of age having recently been carried off for the hospital of Pignerol! From the nature of these complaints," he adds, "they deserve the most prompt and serious consideration." He proposes, in his memorial, "to treat the Vaudois on a footing of equality with the Catholics, and in particular recommends to the attention of the sovereign, Colonel Marauda, Major Musset, the two brothers Arnaud of La Tour, and the moderator, M. Geymet, who, he says, "is a man of talent, well-informed, of a pleasant disposition and generally esteemed, and desirous of nothing but order and peace." It was only under the French administration, however, that justice was to be done to his merits; for in the first article of the synod of 1801, we read: "The citizen Geymet, moderator of the Vaudois churches, having been appointed subprefect of the arrondissement of Pignerol, the thanks of the synod are returned to him for the manner in which he has discharged his duties, and J. R. Peyrani is appointed to succeed him."

¹ By a royal rescript of 3d December, 1796, enregistered 17th January, 1797, the king granted a sum of 2114 francs to the Catholics of the valleys, and those who had become Catholics. (Turin, State Archives, No. 507. No. 506 is entitled Relazione sopra l'origine del' annual grazia, sopra i tributi, che S. M. fa, alle comunità delle vall, &c. It was in consequence of this report that the rescript was issued.)

² Accompanying a letter of his, dated 15th June, 1797. (Turin, State Archives.)

³ Third page.

But before these events took place, a new king had ascended the tottering throne of Victor Amadeus III.¹ This new king was the brother of the young Duke of Aosta, to whom Zimmerman, in the first instance, addressed himself on behalf of the Vaudois. The Vaudois themselves sent a petition to him, of which I shall here exhibit in an abridged form the principal points, with the answers given to them respectively by the minister of state.²

Request I.—That Protestants may not be compelled to contribute to the expense of Catholic worship. Reply.—The usual practice must be continued.³

Request II.—That the municipal elections may take place without regard to religious profession. Reply.—The law is to the contrary effect, and expressly requires that the number of Catholic councillors shall be greater than that of the Protestant ones, whatever may be the portion of the population adhering to the one or to the other religion.

Request III.—That when the taxes imposed upon Catholics are diminished, those imposed upon Protestants may be diminished likewise. Reply.—This may depend upon the will of his majesty, but can only have the effect of reducing the revenues of the state.

Request IV.—That, without augmenting the number of their places of worship, the Vaudois may be permitted to repair those which exist. Reply.—This merits some consideration, although the ancient edicts admit neither of repairing nor enlarging the places of worship.⁴

Request V.—That the inhabitants of St. John may be permitted to have a school in that commune.—Refused.

Request VI.—That Protestants may be admitted to employment in civil offices, as well as the Catholics. (This was what Zimmerman asked, and what the Duke of Aosta had held out hopes of, when he was only the heir to the throne; but now when he was ¹ He ascended the throne on 10th October, 1796, taking the name of Charles Emmanuel IV.

² The petition is signed Geymet, moderator, and Meille, secretary (of the Vaudois Table). It bears no date, but the parere of the minister is dated 19th July, 1797.

³ It will be recollected that, in its Reply to the Memorial sent by the Duke of Bedford to the Chevalier Ossorio, and by him transmitted to Turin on 31st May, 1743, the Piedmontese government affirmed (§ v.) that it had never made Protestants contribute for Catholic worship.

⁴ The minister of state ought to have informed us what edicts prohibit the repairing of religious edifices.

the occupant of the throne, he had forgotten it all.) There is no reply to this last request.

We see how prompt the re-actionary spirit was in repulsing the Vaudois, so soon as the support of their arms was no longer necessary.

It was at this time that the national spirit of Italy was united with the aristocratic antipathies of the various powers of that country, in a common effort to throw off a foreign yoke. Bonaparte, by his career of victory, had forced the King of Sardinia to conclude an alliance offensive and defensive with the French republic;¹ but the court of Savoy was not more faithful to the republic than it had been to Louis XIV. Charles Emmanuel IV. hoped to be soon freed from his embarrassing allies. The French were massacred at Verona;² Venice rose in insurrection against them;³ the cause of liberty seemed to decline. This was the reason of the bolder tone which tyranny assumed in the Vaudois valleys. But before it was able to restore the former state of things, a revolution broke out in Genoa,⁴ and the Ligurian Republic was proclaimed.⁵ Milan responded on the east, by proclaiming the Cisalpine Republic.⁶ These shouts of liberty silenced the voice of despotism. Kings found themselves again in danger, and their tone was immediately changed. By his Instructions of 18th July, 1797, addressed to the Senate of Pignerol,⁷ Charles Emmanuel IV. unexpectedly announced (1) That the Vaudois would no longer be required to contribute to the expenses of Catholic worship; (2) That there would be no respect of persons in appointments to public offices, which certainly must have referred to municipal elections alone; (3) That when his majesty should grant any exemptions to Papists, they should be equally granted to Protestants; (4) That the Vaudois would be permitted not only to repair their places of worship, but to enlarge them, and to hold their religious meetings wherever they thought proper; (5) That, after the example of the Divine Being who did good to all, his majesty wished to make all his subjects happy.

And, as if these unexpected concessions were not sufficient, Charles Emmanuel likewise wrote to the prefect that he should invite the Vaudois to address themselves in all confidence to their sovereign, assuring them of his very particular affection, &c.⁸ It

¹ Treaty signed at Turin, 5th April, 1797.

² From 4th to 6th April, 1797.

³ From 17th April to 16th May.

⁴ 22d-23d May.

⁵ 14th June.

⁶ 6th July.

⁷ Deposited in the Archives of the Court, No. 594.

⁸ This letter is dated 25th August, 1797. (Same source, No. 595.) These documents were published under the form of Biglietto regio, on 26th August, but with is easy to see that the times were changed. To a suppressed agitation, tumultuous movements had rapidly succeeded, and that even at Montcalier, at the very gates of Turin. Truth demands the admission that the valleys did not remain free from commotion. A troop of revolutionists, composed of Catholics as well as Vaudois, went to Campillon, the castle of the Marquis of Rora, and demanded his feudal titles in order to destroy them. "My friends," he replied with admirable presence of mind and amenity, "if it is only my titles that you want, I will freely give them all up to you, with the exception of one, which you shall not wrest from me, I mean my title of the friend of the Vaudois, due to my old affection for them." This happy saying sufficed to disarm them; and they retired without the slightest act of violence.¹

The Vaudois, however, in virtue of the Instructions of 18th July (1797), which authorized them to hold religious meetings wherever they thought fit, demanded permission to erect a place of worship at St. John. But Napoleon had quitted Italy;² the effervescence of the former days had subsided; the throne seemed again to be firmer, and the good-will which Charles Emmanuel had promised to the Vaudois, was withdrawn from them in the same proportion. They were told that the parish of St. John, having at a former period been deprived of its place of worship, had no right to erect one.³ But new armaments were soon formed in France, the destination of which was kept secret;⁴ there seemed again to be danger for Piedmont, and the interest felt for the valleys suddenly revived. The commune of Le Pomaret took advantage of it, to some modifications. The authority granted to the Vaudois, to practise medicine amongst those of their own religion, is there repealed. The obligation to have a Catholic majority in the communal councils is maintained. As to the places of worship, permission is given to repair and enlarge them, but not to increase their number. Another document also bears the date of 25th August, 1797, which seems to have been a sort of preparatory study for these, entitled, Parere intorno ad una rappresentanza de religionarii delle valli, in qua espongono varii aggravii. This paper consists of 22 folio pages. (Same source, Nos. 511 and 618.)

¹ Monastier, II. 189, 190. The author does not give the date of this occurrence. In his narrative it seems to be referred to the year 1797; but although I abstain from placing it in a different part of the history, I believe that it would more correctly be referred to the year 1799, when other similar occurrences took place, especially at La Tour, where the Count Rorengo was compelled to throw his parchments, with his own hands, into a bonfire kindled in the centre of the public square, and to join a ring of revolutionary dancers around the tree of liberty. It was at this period that the great garden, situated in front of the count's residence, was destroyed, and that the public square, which now occupies that spot, was laid out.

² To go to Rastadt. He set out on 17th November, 1797.

³ Extract of one of the letters of M. P. Appia to the Count of Nieperg, dated from La Tour, 2d December, 1799. (Communicated.)

⁴ For the expedition to Egypt; from September, 1797, to February, 1798.

ask permission to enlarge and inclose its Protestant burying-place. This was granted.¹ It seems a small favour enough; but small as it was, it was withdrawn, as soon as the government believed itself sufficiently strong to venture upon so doing.² This versatility contributed to weaken it. Charles Emmanuel made an undignified abdication of the crown of his fathers, and retired to Cagliari.³ I defer to next chapter an account of the measures taken by the provisional government, which was then established in Piedmont. Its authority was not of long duration.⁴ A new coalition was formed against France;⁵ and six months had scarcely elapsed, when a Russian army invaded Piedmont, under the command of Suwarow.⁶ Napoleon was no longer there; Milan,⁷ Turin,⁸ and Alexandria⁹ fell into the hands of the allies. The republics of Genoa and Naples soon ceased to exist.¹⁰ The French army, victorious at the Trebbia¹ and at Novi,¹² fell back exhausted by its victories before

¹ By decree of the senate of Turin, of date 16th February, 1793.

² By a new decree of the senate of Turin, dated 11th April, 1793.

³ The abdication is dated 20 Frimaire, an VII. (10th December, 1793). In the first article the King of Sardinia declares that he renounces all power, and orders his subjects to obey the provisional government to be established by the French general (Suchet). The heir-presumptive to the throne adds at the bottom of this abdication, Io garantisco che non porterò impedimento alcuno all' esecuzione del presente atto. Vittorio Emanuele. (He ascended the throne in 1814, under the name of Victor Emmanuel IV.)

⁴ Before the invasion of which we are now to speak, the provisional government retired to Pignerol, then to Fenestrelle, where its retreat was covered by the Vaudois, who repulsed the Austrians at the defile of Le Malanage. Fenestrelle remained in the hands of the French during the whole time of the Austro-Russian occupation.

⁵ In consequence of the treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between England and Russia, signed 5th January, 1799. (A simple treaty of alliance had already been concluded between the two powers on 18th December, 1793.)

⁶ Pronounced Suwarof.

⁷ On 20th June.

⁸ On 22d July.

⁹ Surrendered on 24th May.

¹⁰ The Parthenopean Republic was established after the occupation of Naples by Championnet (23d January, 1799). We read in the life of this general that the population of Naples, and especially the clergy, saw with dissatisfaction the occupation of that city by the French army. On the day on which the pretended miracle of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius—the patron saint of the Neapolitans—is annually performed, the usual prodigy did not take place at the usual time. "It is a sign of the Divine wrath against the French occupation," said the monks. The people began to manifest hostile intentions, and things wore a threatening aspect. The general was apprised. "Go and tell the bishop," said he to one of his aides-de-camp, "that I make him responsible for the miracle's taking place. If in ten minutes the miracle is not wrought, his excellency will be immediately shot." It is needless to add that the liquefaction of the pretended blood of St. Januarius took place in a few moments after this message was brought to the prelate. General Championnet was a Protestant.

¹¹ The battle of the Trebbia took place from the 17th to the 19th of June, 1799. The Austrians pretend to have gained it.

¹² On 15th August.

superior forces.¹ At Carmagnole, the native population rose against the garrison, and the bravery of the Vaudois contributed much to repress the popular movement."²

However, the French were compelled to fall back. The Cossacks had entered Pignerol. The French sick and wounded, the honourable but wretched remains of the army of Verona, were conveyed away before them. "These poor creatures," says a contemporary,³ "arrived at La Tour, crowded together in a number of carts. They came from Cavour. They alighted from their carts in the great square. Bread, cheese, and wine were brought to them. Many of them suffered dreadfully. There were some whose wounds had not been dressed for more than fifteen days, because the Cossacks pursued so hard after them. M. Fissour, the surgeon, dressed many of them. But just when they were going to lodgings, a false alarm of the approach of the Cossacks, who were said to be at Les Blonats, threw them into consternation. The carts which had brought them, had gone away back to Cavour, and most of them had difficulty in dragging themselves along. Some of the people accompanied them as far as Bobi, where they arrived without money, without medicines, and without linen."

To the humanity of the pastor of Bobi, the venerable Emmanuel Rostan, and the self-denying kindness of his parishioners, these wounded Frenchmen were indebted for their being enabled to return to their native land. The following is an official declaration of this fact, in the order of the day of the commander-in-chief of the French army :⁴—

¹ At Novi the French lost 10,000 men. The Austro-Russians had 12,000 killed and 7000 wounded. But their army consisted of 70,000 men, and that of the French only of 45,000. General Joubert, who commanded it, fell.

² See the reflections of Monastier (II. 191) on this subject. A contemporary thus represents this event: "The general administration of Piedmont had taken refuge in Pignerol. . . . Four or five hundred Vaudois were despatched to that city, who supposed they would not have had to go any farther; but they were caused to march on to Noun, where they found themselves surrounded by 2000 French, who forced them to march upon Carmagnole. . . ."—(Letter to the Count de Nieperg, above quoted.)

³ Mémoires de Paul Appia (on the events which occurred from 1799 to 1816). The author of these Mémoires was appointed a member of the general council and juge du paix at La Tour. His writings are the principal source from which I have drawn for the year 1799. They were communicated to me by the venerable M. Appia, pastor of the French church at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, to whose memory I cannot sufficiently testify my grateful and respectful attachment.

⁴ General Suchet. He himself sent this order of the day to the minister, M. Rostan, with a letter which concluded thus: "The general-in-chief, citizen pastor, thinks that, in such circumstances, he can give no more sensible testimony of his satisfaction than by commending such conduct to the admiration of his army." Both documents are dated from the camp of La Pietra, 3 Frimaire, 1799 (24th

"Three hundred sick and wounded arrived at Bobi, in a state of the most absolute destitution, and ready to perish for want of assistance. The worthy old man Rostan and his spouse displayed upon this occasion, that noble simplicity which belongs to republicans. They had only a calf and twenty-five loaves, but these were immediately distributed amongst the sick. The generosity of this venerable old man did not stop here; he added the little wine which he had, and a few shirts, which were employed in dressing the wounds of the wounded. Towards the close of the day (it was rather some days after),¹ an alarm arose of being surprised; for the enemy were no more than four miles from Bobi. On the appearance of danger, the solicitude of citizen Rostan was awakened anew. He called upon his compatriots of the whole valley, to carry upon their shoulders" (beyond the Piedmontese frontiers),² "the 300 sick or wounded French. And this they speedily did, traversing the Col la Croix, which is one of the longest and most difficult passes of the Alps, and was still covered with snow. After ten hours of most fatiguing march they arrived at the first village of France, where the wounded were set down, who forgot their sufferings to bless their liberators; and the brave inhabitants of the valley of Lucerna, who had exhibited a courage beyond all praise, returned to their own homes. May such conduct and such devotedness be useful as an example, and find many imitators!"

This conduct, however, was alleged against the Vaudois as a crime, by their Piedmontese enemies,³ and Suwarow addressed to November, 1800). A letter from chef du bataillon Presseeq, local commandant at head-quarters, accompanied this communication. "I am very proud, citizen pastor," he said, "to have received from my general the honourable commission to transmit to you the accompanying packet." He then thanks him for having saved the lives of so many of their brethren in arms. "It was not in my power," he says, "to inform the general any sooner of this noble conduct, as it was only in the month of Brumaire last that I myself heard of it, and that by pure accident," &c. Rostan afterwards received a letter from the chancellor of the order of the Legion of Honour (the Baron De Lacépède), announcing that the decoration of that order was sent to him. I will state, in a subsequent part of this history, why he never received it. The following are the first lines of Suchet's order of the day:—"The general-in-chief, having been informed of the acts of humanity and republicanism performed towards the French, by the inhabitants of the valley of Lucerna, and especially by the worthy old man [respectable vieillard] Rostan, Protestant minister, ordains that the particulars of their praise-worthy conduct should be submitted to the grateful consideration of his army." Then follows the narrative of facts.

¹ This parenthesis is in Suchet's order. The Austro-Russians arrived at La Tour on the 3d of June and it was on the 4th of June (1799) that the wounded French were transported from Bobi to France.

² This parenthesis is not in the order of the day.

³ See Monastier, II. 192. This author has thought it his duty to take notice at them a threatening proclamation. "People," said he, "to what party do you think to attach yourselves? Deluded men, you protect the French, the disturbers, the enemies of public tranquillity. They have declared themselves the enemies of the God-man! and the ancient attachment of your forefathers to the doctrines of Christianity . . . procured for you the protection of England. The French have declared themselves the enemies of that power; and is not that power, which is your benefactress, now our ally? &c."¹ . . . The Russian troops arrived at Pignerol. "The inhabitants of the valley of Lucerna," says Appia in his memoirs, "foreseeing that they would ere long receive a visit from them, deemed it proper to appoint deputies, who should go to meet them and treat with them."² I was one of this number, and on the 3d of June, 1799, at daybreak, having been apprised that the troops of the allies were making their appearance in great numbers on the side of Lucerna, I rose from my bed; but before I was dressed, the Cossacks were already scouring the streets of La Tour, uttering frightful hurrahs. They were followed by plunderers seeking to spoil us. My colleagues were absent; Peter Volle was defending his own house from robbery. James Vertu had lost the power of speech by the shock, and could not accompany me. I retraced my steps in much perturbation concerning what I had to do, for I the bottom of this page that Maraуда, in his work Tableau du Piémont, claims for himself the honour of this generous action, performed, as he says, by his orders. The following contemporary anecdote will show the value of this assertion. "In 1801," says Appia in his memoirs, "happening to be at Turin, I paid a visit to M. Maraуда, who was then occupied in writing his Tableau du Piémont. 'You will intend to insert in it,' said I, 'the noble action of Rostan?' 'What is it?' said he. I told him. He was at that time ignorant of this fact; and when his work was published I was extremely surprised to see that he appropriated it, making a letter be addressed to himself, in which it was said that, under his orders, the soldiers of his corps had saved these Frenchmen. But in 1799 that corps did not exist. Maraуда was then in the valley of St. Martin, having taken with him the horse of John Bonjour, of La Tour, which he never thought fit to pay, and which the Austro-Russians took from him at Pral when he was endeavouring to make his way through the pass, to retire to Abrisès." It was because of the uncertainty thrown upon the noble action of the pastor of Bobi, by this claim of Maraуда, that the intention of decorating the venerable Rostan was not carried into effect. Maraуда himself asked the cross of honour, but his letter remained unanswered. I cannot judge of him in his military character (although the memoirs of Appia contain also this note—"Maraуда acted as a double spy in 1792 and 1793"), but as a historian he is of no authority. His name would not even have been found in these pages but for the note of M. Monastier.

¹ This proclamation, which is not dated, is printed in two columns, the one in Italian and the other in French. Hahn gives it entire at p. 207 of vol. ii. of his work, History of the Sects of the Middle Ages.

² These deputies were—John Daniel Peyrot, James Vertu, Peter Volle of St. John, former captain of the Vaudois militia; the advocate Plochtu, although a Catholic; and Paul Appia, the author of the memoirs.

hesitated to present myself alone before 400 or 500 infuriated men, who might not be able to understand what I said. 'M. Appia, take care!' said a Catholic whom I met, 'for you have still your tricolor cockade.' I thanked him for the warning, and immediately substituted for my perilous cockade a little piece of white paper. Then raising my hands towards heaven, I prayed God to help me, and in the hope of being useful to my country, I proceeded towards the Cossacks. They had just slaughtered eight of Zimmerman's hussars. My heart trembled as if it had been suspended by a thread. They commenced plundering, and I saw them enter the shop of the brothers Long. The danger increased my courage. He is well protected whom God protects, and so committing myself into his hands, I advanced without fear towards the officer who appeared to me to be of highest rank. He asked me in German, 'Who are you, and what do you want?' I replied in the same language, that I was a magistrate of the place, and that I desired to know what he demanded of the inhabitants of La Tour. 'That they lay down their arms, and that they deliver up all the French to us.' 'No one is armed—the French are fled or slain.' 'Your name?' 'Appia.' 'Will you guarantee with your head the truth of what you say?' 'Yes, sir.' 'In that case I will cause a retreat to be sounded.' But before parting from him, I wished to be informed where his general might be found. 'There is no general,' he replied. 'Your commandant, then.' 'He is at St. John.' 'Give me a safe-conduct to go to him.' He reflected for a moment, and then said, 'You have no need of one.' He then caused a retreat to be sounded, and I went to seek my brother deputies. The two first whom I saw durst not come out, because they had heard the first officer, who made his appearance, say that the whole place was to be given up to fire and sword. I encouraged them to better hopes, and we set out on our way to St. John.

"There was fighting there, for we heard the sound of musketry. Each shot went to my heart. Arriving at Les Blonats, we were surrounded by three patrols of Croats. But we could not make them comprehend us at all. At this moment an officer made his appearance on the bridge; we waved a white handkerchief in the air; he replied to us in the same manner, and caused us to be brought to him. Having explained to him the object of our mission, he told us to go and meet him again at Lucerna, in presence of Colonel Woisach. We went thither accordingly, and were very graciously received by that officer. The first thing which I asked of him was that he would restore to liberty Peter Volle's eldest daughter, who had been taken by the soldiers. This he immediately granted. Emboldened by my success, I asked the same favour for thirty prisoners whom we had seen in the covered market-place, but he refused. After this he said to us, 'Gentlemen, return to your houses, and tell the people to be quiet, and to resume their labours without fear.' I asked him to give me this order in writing. 'Go and write it,' said he, 'and I will sign it.' We went to the priest's house, where we wrote the order; but the colonel had already mounted his horse—we made haste to carry it to him, and he signed it on the pommel of his saddle. I then asked him for authority to establish patrols to secure us from pillage. 'Go,' he replied; 'all that you do will be approved.' And he added this authority on the note which he had signed. He spoke to us partly in Latin and partly in German. We left him very much satisfied with the result of our mission."

The author then relates that he favoured the escape of a company of French soldiers,¹ giving them guides to conduct them to Angrogna, and thence to the French territory, thus enabling them to avoid falling into the hands of their enemies.

He immediately caused a special guard to be established in each Vaudois commune.² But considering that the favour which he had obtained for the repose of the Vaudois still depended only on an inferior officer, he resolved to seek the sanction of it from the commander-in-chief. Having re-assembled his fellow-deputies, he set out with them for Pignerol. "On our arrival at Briqueras," says he, "we fell into the midst of some hundreds of Cossacks, who burned with desire to plunder us. One of them had even stretched out his hand to the bridle of my horse, but an Austrian officer caused them to let us go." At Pignerol Count Zuccato introduced the deputies to Count Denison, who commanded the advanced guard of the Austro-Russian troops. "Gentlemen," said that officer, "you come from a rebel valley; you must be placed under arrest." And he caused them to be conducted back to their hotel by a hussar, charged to keep a sharp watch over them. "This hussar," adds our author, "spoke Dutch very well. We entered into conversation. He had lived in Amsterdam, and was connected with a number of persons of my acquaintance. In a short time we were quite good friends. The inn was filled with Austrian officers, amongst whom were some wounded. They had been repulsed at

¹ Belonging to the 33d demi-brigade of the line, which General Carpentier had sent to Zimmerman from Briançon.

² The Catholics, says he, and those who hoped for pillage, could not comprehend how arms were immediately put again into the hands of a population who had just been disarmed. Accordingly they said of the Vaudois, "If the devil should come, he would presently be their friend."

Le Malanage by our people of the communities of Prarusting, Angrogna, and St. Germain, who had been posted there to cover the retreat of the provisional government. These officers regarded us with a very evil eye. There arrived, in course of the day, 10,000 or 12,000 Austro-Russians, who bivouacked in the public squares of Pignerol. These troops were destined to march against the valley of Lucerna. This distressful thought prevented me from obtaining any repose during the night. At break of day a burst of music was heard. It was a Russian regiment at prayer. A moment after there was a loud beating with the butt-end of a musket at the door of the hotel, and then at that of our chamber. It was an aid-de-camp, who came to conduct us to Prince Bagration.

"The Prince was lodged in the house of the Count de Pavia, one of our bitterest enemies. The fate of our country was perhaps to depend upon the chances of a single interview. But no; it depended upon God, and God protected us; for this Russian prince proved an angel of goodness, whose memory will always be blessed among the Vaudois. He heard with patience all that I said to him of the situation of our valleys, and I concluded by saying that I brought to him the submission of the inhabitants. 'That is good!' said he; 'have you it in writing?' 'No, my lord.' 'Well, go and write it and sign it.' When we had brought it to him we petitioned for the release of the thirty-three unhappy prisoners whom we had seen at Lucerna. 'I grant you this,' he most kindly replied. Having then gone out of doors, we saw in the square a crowd of 500 or 600 men, provided with sacks, ropes, and great baskets. 'What do these people want?' said the prince. 'To ask arms from you,' said I. 'For what purpose?' 'To ravage and plunder our valleys.' 'Let this rabble be driven off!' said he to a colonel; and a regiment of Croats very soon dispersed them.

"An officer of Nice was in the square of St. Donatus, seated at a table, where volunteers were being enrolled, and there he cried to the crowd—'Ki veul piè parti per ender contra i Barbets?'" (Who will enlist to march against the Vaudois?) "But as soon as he heard Bagration's order, he also disappeared."

The deputies then proceeded to the mayor's house, whither the orders of the prince were to be forwarded to them, along with passports. But before they were put into their hands they were made to sign a declaration, by which they became responsible, with their heads, for the tranquillity of the valleys. These worthy patriots did not hesitate to sign it. Having returned to the valleys, they learned that a horde of some hundreds of robbers had invaded the hill of Prarusting, in order to plunder it, and were already destroying by fire the quarter of Les Gay.¹ The Vaudois deputies immediately sent off a messenger to inform the prince. Bagration lost no time in putting an end to this robber-violence, and a few days afterwards he sent an express to La Tour, to ask the same deputies to return to Pignerol. "Gentlemen," said he, when he saw them, "I have been so satisfied with the candid and faithful manner in which you have acted, that I could not think to quit this city without having the pleasure of seeing you again. But this is not the only reason which has made me desire your presence; to-morrow you will be called upon to make your submission to the marshal."

Next day they set out with Count Zuccato to go to Turin, to the presence of Suwarow. "Some officers who recognized the count, said to him, 'Whence come you, Zuccato?' 'From an expedition which has ended in nothing.' 'What expedition?' 'We were to have marched to-day against the valley of Lucerna, but that country has submitted; here are the deputies.'"²

After a few hours' rest they were conducted to the palace of the marshal, who lodged in the palace of the Prince de la Cisterne; but not being able to receive them that day, he invited them to dinner next day, at eight o'clock in the morning. "Whilst we were awaiting the hour of dinner, we were introduced into the hall of the staff, where we found Colonel Contsnikow,³ and the young Prince of Gorciakow.⁴ . . . These gentlemen spoke French with a readiness which astonished me. . . . Having been introduced into the dining-room, we saw a little old man enter in a white Keyserlitz vest, white small clothes, and a little leather cap on his head; his stockings and boots loose, and coming down about his heels. . . . This was the marshal. The count took me by the hand and presented me. I was about to repeat to him orally the formal submission which had already been made in writing; but he said, 'This is not necessary; I know all.' Then he embraced me, pronouncing these words, 'Pace, amicizia, e fratellanza!'"⁵ . . . I could not

¹ The loss sustained in this quarter was estimated at 25,000 francs.

² Before entering Turin, the count recommended the postilion to go round the city, in order to enter it by the gate of the Po, for the French still occupied the citadel, and fired on all carriages or cavalcades which entered by the Porto Nuovo. "Bah!" said the postilion (to avoid half-an-hour's ride), "they will not fire just now." "If you have no fear, then, neither have I," said Zuccato; "it is not my trade." "And the carriage dashed on at the gallop." But a wheel soon came off, and at the same moment a bullet passed over the heads of the travellers. "I am persuaded," said Appia, "that the artilleryman believed it was he who had overturned us." But this accident was followed by no bad consequences.

³ Pronounced Consnicoff.

⁴ Pronounced Gortshakoff.

⁵ Peace, friendship, and fraternity. "The true salutation of a Jacobin!" adds the author. (P. 41 of the MS.)

help remembering that this man who received us so well, was the same cruel general who had caused the suburb of Praga, at Warsaw, to be destroyed by fire and sword; and I trembled when I thought that we might have had the same fate.

"After this a servant came, bringing him a large glass of brandy, which he drunk off at a draught. A moment after the same servant brought him a plate, on which were a dozen large radishes, with salt and oil. He crunched them with his fleshless gums as easily as if he had still had young teeth. Then he approached me, put three of them into my left hand, and caused a glass of brandy to be handed to me. When we had finished our radish, he said to us, 'Gentlemen, what religion are you of? Do you say thou or you to the good God?' When we had told him our religion, he turned to an old Danish general and said to him, 'Pray for these gentlemen.' The general clasped his hands and commenced a prayer with much unction. But it seemed that Suwarow did not approve of it, for, laying his hand upon his arm, he interrupted him, and began himself to recite one to him, which the Danish general repeated, sentence by sentence, and without varying a word. The spectators of this singular scene had much difficulty in restraining themselves from laughter. When it was over the marshal said to us, 'Now, let us take our places at table.'"

After dinner he informed the Vaudois deputies that they were to go to pay their respects to the president of the supreme council.¹ Count Zuccato introduced them. "Your excellency!" said he, "here are three Vaudois deputies." . . . But the president did not give him time to say any more. Rising in a rage like that of a madman, he said, "These fellows are from a rebel valley; their hearts are rotten!" "You may judge how we felt," writes Appia. "The president came and planted himself right opposite to us; and, in our perplexity, not knowing what complaints he could have against us, we knew not what to answer to his coarse inculpation. But the good Count Zuccato did not allow himself to be browbeaten, and firmly answered, 'These gentlemen are respectable persons, to whom their country is much indebted. Moreover, they are under the immediate protection of Marshal Suwarow.' At this formidable name the president stood for a moment disconcerted—his lips trembled, and all his features spoke his rage that the expedition against the valleys had come to nought."² It was said that he had suggested it; he was therefore doubly irritated. However, when he was informed how we had been received by the marshal, he excused himself three times over, and concluded by inviting us to dinner, to make us, as he said, forget his stupidity." It may readily be understood that the Vaudois were not anxious to accept such an invitation. They hastened to return to the valleys, to give an account of the result of their mission, by a circular which was sent to all the communes.

¹ This was Count Thaun, de Saint-André, Marquis de Revel. The council met in the palace of the Place de St. Charles.

² It was known at Turin that an expedition had set out against the valleys. The Vaudois who dwelt in that capital were in consternation. I happened to

Not very long after this, thirty or forty Cossacks, commanded by a lieutenant, were sent and stationed at La Tour. "The gluttony of these troops is unparalleled," says the author of the memoirs just quoted.¹ "These soldiers often brought in from the country green walnuts, and grapes scarcely formed; all which they put into their pot, with the provisions which were given them, and added candle-ends for seasoning. I saw them make this admirable porridge in their quarters, but they never chose to lodge in a house. Their suspicion was extreme. They lay indiscriminately amongst their horses. In the morning, at break of day, they turned towards the east and performed their devotions with a multitude of signs of the cross. The reverence which they showed to their superiors is incredible.² They would even approach them on their knees to kiss their boots, after having been beaten with the knout. They were enthusiasts in their admiration of Suwarow. One evening, having invited their lieutenant, whose name was Kitow,³ to supper, along with the interpreter, who was a Bohemian, I asked him a question about the marshal. Immediately Kitow rose, drew his sabre, took it between his teeth, took a pistol in each hand, and raising them above his head, cried with a tremendous voice, notwithstanding the sabre which he was biting, 'O Suvarof! Suvarof!' My wife and children were in mortal fear of him."

I omit many details, amongst which are some relative to a rash enterprise of Marauda, which had well-nigh entailed ruin upon his country. Having raised in France an irregular troop of some hunmeet Malanot in the Rue des Ambassadeurs; "O heavens!" said he, "how are you here?" "I come from La Tour." "Do the Vaudois valleys still subsist?" &c. . . . (Paul Appia's Memoirs.)

¹ These details are of no great historic value; but they are so characteristic of the scene which we have been contemplating, that I could not think of suppressing them.

² "When their colonel (Stadion) sent me a letter, the Cossack to whom it was intrusted brought it to me immediately, and whatever was the hour of the night when it arrived, he caused me to rise that he might put it into my hands, and that I might sign a receipt for it. I wrote my name in the register of the post in great Greek capitals, and then they were able to read it, &c. . . ." (Same memoirs.)

³ Pronounced Kitoff.

dreds of men, he came by the Col la Croix to attack the Cossacks quartered at La Tour. He was repulsed; but he was a Vaudois; it was believed that there was some understanding between his compatriots and him; they were accused of treason; and the deputies, who had guaranteed with their heads the tranquillity of the valleys, had well-nigh lost their lives. Some of them were arrested; others fled.¹ The Divine protection still furnished them, upon this occasion, with the means of justifying themselves, and their anxieties were allayed.

The malevolence of their enemies was not so readily appeased. Whilst the Count de Denison still commanded at Pignerol, he wrote one day to the representatives of the valleys, and to Appia personally, that revolutionary conferences were held at La Tour. Appia hastened to present himself before the commandant, to persuade him of the contrary. He found him much irritated. "I am better informed than you think," said Denison to him; "I know the members of your club"—and he named them.² "I can assure you," replied the deputy, "that not only have you been basely deceived concerning the formation of this pretended club, but that amongst the persons who have been named there are not two, perhaps, who have met with one another for a year past." "Whence then come these accusations?" said the count. "It would rather be for me to ask you that question," replied Appia. "Let that pass," said the count; "but what is the reason of this hatred of which you are the objects? for there is not a day but some priest comes to besiege my gate, to stir me up against you."³

"Prince Bagration had already told me the same thing," observes Appia in his memoirs. "And when General Wukassovich arrived at Pignerol, in 1799, a canon of that city exerted himself to irritate him against the Vandois by the falsest accusations. We made haste," says Appia, "to draw up a defence of our conduct since the 3d of June, and to carry it to him. He was able to satisfy himself of the accuracy of the statements. But he then added—'I have here, in the prisons, one of your mountaineers, who attempted to kill one of my sergeants by a pistol shot.' I was acquainted with the case. 'General!' said I, 'the man you speak of is no

¹ In connection with this, Appia relates the particulars of his escape to France; but they are so purely personal, that I cannot give them a place here.

² Lauzaroth, reader and precentor at Bobi; Peyrot, pastor at Rora; Frache of La Tour; Brezzi, &c.

³ The deputy having explained to the commandant that this hatred was occasioned by difference of religion, Denison exclaimed, "Good God! is that possible? We live on the best terms with the Kalmucks, and yet they are idolaters!" "Yes," said Appia, "but you are not Catholics!" (Paul Appia's Memoirs.)

Vaudois; he is a Catholic of Lucernette.' Having acknowledged the correctness of our representations, Wukassovich sent us away, saying, 'Go, and keep yourselves quiet. My conduct will be regulated according to your moderation.' One winter day," proceeds the narrator—"it was in December, 1799—Colonel Papius came to my house, accompanied by a number of officers. He said to me, 'We are informed, sir, that the Vaudois wish to poison us, or to deliver us to the French.' I was struck dumb for a moment. My indignation could not be expressed. But God gave calmness. I caused my three children to be brought, of whom the eldest was only nine years of age, and I said to the colonel, 'These, sir, are my children; they are dearer to me than my life; take them for hostages; and if you receive a single scratch from a Vaudois, do with them what you think proper.'" The words of a noble-minded citizen who knew his compatriots well, and showed himself most worthy to represent them! The officers went away re-assured, and left him his children; but this incident of modern history is also worthy of the noblest days of ancient Italy.

I will go no farther: facts accumulate and carry me beyond my limits. Notwithstanding all my efforts to abridge, I feel as if the plan of this work were giving way under the pressure of the multiplied events which must be included in it. I hope the dryness of the following pages, in which the necessity of extreme conciseness permits me to insert nothing but what belongs to the subject of the chapter, may be compensated by the more animated details of these.

Napoleon returned from Egypt;¹ he dissolved the directory,² organized the senate,³ received the title of First Consul,⁴ re-constituted the tribunals,⁵ the administration,⁶ and the army.⁷ It required his powerful hand to reconstruct, in so short a time, the France that was to be, from the ruins of the France that had been. On the 6th of May, 1800, he set out from Paris to put himself at the head of the army of the Alps. Ten days afterwards he led them across the snows of the St. Bernard. Scarcely had one week elapsed till Suza, Yvrée, and La Brunette were already in his hands. On the 2d of June he was at Milan.

The whole of the allied troops opposed to him were assembled in the plain of Alexandria. He marched thither, and defeated them at Montébello;⁸ but it seemed as if victory was to desert

¹ From 24th August to 16th October, 1799.

² On 10th November.

³ On 24th December.

⁴ On 13th December.

⁵ On 17th March, 1800.

⁶ On 17th February, 1800.

⁷ From 10th November, 1799, to 27th April, 1800.

⁸ On 9th June. He made 6000 Austrians prisoners.

his hitherto victorious army,¹ at Marengo. "It was three o'clock in the afternoon; all the generals regarded the battle as lost. In the belief that the French army was routed, Zach manœuvred to cut off its retreat. 'Soldiers!' exclaimed Napoleon, 'we must sleep upon the field of battle!' At the same moment, he gave orders to advance. The artillery was unmasked, and kept up a terrible fire for ten minutes; the enemy paused in astonishment; the drums beat for a charge at the same moment along the whole line; and that impulse which communicates itself like flame to the hearts of brave men, carried them on at the voice of their general. Desaix arrived with his division, calm and intrepid; and the enemy who thought to cut off our retreat, found his own left turned. At this moment, Bonaparte ordered the cavalry to pass through the intervals at gallop. This bold manœuvre decided the victory. The Austrians gave way everywhere. The ardour of our troops increased; they seized upon Marengo. . . . The battle was won."²

The whole of Piedmont and of Lombardy thus fell again under the influence of France, and the Cisalpine Republic was immediately proclaimed. "This event," says M. Monastier,³ "in which, moreover, the Vaudois had no part, made their position such as it had never been before, and such as they had never ventured to hope that it would become. In one day, and as if by enchantment, they saw all the prohibitive laws abolished, under which they had so long groaned. The barrier which separated them from other citizens was broken down. A field was opened up to their unfettered activity, in which their enlightenment and their industry could be rendered available. From having been despised pariahs, they passed to the enjoyment of the same political rank with their haughtiest persecutors. And, what was more precious to them than all the rest, they were now to enjoy without impediment, that religious liberty for which they had struggled during three centuries."

In the following chapter, we shall see them in this new position.

¹ The capture of Nice (29th May), of Novara (30th May), of Turbigo (31st May), of Pavia (3d June), of Lodi (4th June), of Cremona (5th June), and of Placenza (7th June), preceded the battle of Marengo.

² An extract from a writing of Marshal Lannes, quoted in the history of Napoleon, by Hugo, pp. 154-158. The battle of Marengo took place on the 14th of June. An armistice was signed on the 15th; and the treaty of Alexandria, which gave up Piedmont and Lombardy to France, was concluded on the 16th of June, 1800. Next day, the 17th, Napoleon was on his way back to Milan.

³ II., 120.

CHAPTER XXII.

STATE OF THE VAUDOIS UNDER THE DOMINION OF FRANCE.¹

(A.D. 1799 TO A.D. 1814.)

The two periods of French dominion in Piedmont—Ridiculous proclamation of the provisional government of 1798—The new organization and political arrangements—Changes favourable to the Vaudois and to liberty—Addresses of Paul Appia to his Vaudois brethren—The English subsidies withdrawn from the Vaudois—Distress of the pastors—Peyrani chosen moderator—Napoleon at Milan—Interview of Peyrani with the emperor—New ecclesiastical arrangements—Congratulatory address of the Vaudois to Napoleon—Official installation of pastors under the new French law—Earthquake of 1808—Downfall of Napoleon, and of the French empire.

PIEDMONT was united to France on the 2d of February, 1799; it escaped from the dominion of that country in the month of June of the same year, but fell under it again after the victory of Marengo, in June, 1800. This chapter, therefore, includes two periods, in which the authority of France extended over the Vaudois valleys; the first of which contains the first six months of 1799, and the second commences a year afterwards, and continues to the restoration of the old powers, in 1814. The intermediate year (from June, 1799, to June, 1800) presents to our view the invasion by the Austro-Russian troops, of which we have spoken separately, in order not to interrupt the exhibition of the events now before us, by an event of a different kind.

Charles Emmanuel IV. retired to Cagliari on 9th December, 1798; on the same day, a provisional government was appointed;² and next day there appeared, with the signature of Eymar,³ and under the eyes of Jonbert,⁴ a proclamation in which it was said—“People! . . . the dawn of reason has appeared on your horizon, along with the French army. . . . The names of a Jonbert, an Eymar, a Grouchy, will be the eternal objects of tenderness and admiration to all grateful hearts.” The bombastic vanity of

¹ AUTHORITIES.—The same as in the preceding chapter. Also, Raccolta delle leggi, providenze e manifesti, emanati dai governi francese e provvisorio, e dalla municipalità di Torino, &c. . . . 2 vols. 4to, the first of 320, and the second of 240 pages.—Fortunes of the Vaudois during and since the French Revolution . . . by John Vater (in German), Berlin, 1820.—Synodal Acts of the Vaudois Church.—Consistorial Archives, 1800–1814.—Private documents.

² Composed of thirteen members.

³ Signing: Vu, au nom de gouvernement français.

⁴ Commander-in-chief of the French army then in Italy.

such a document, extorts a smile of contempt. But more serious measures succeeded these declamatory sentences.

All the old administrative authorities were provisionally maintained. All titles of nobility gave place to the common designation of citizen.¹ Various decrees were soon issued for the organization of the municipalities,² and of national guards,³ and for the regulation of the public finances.⁴ All temporal power was taken from the church.⁵ The civil law ceased to maintain the irrevocability of ecclesiastical vows;⁶ and finally, the new government, "considering that difference of religion ought not to introduce, amongst the citizens of a free people, any difference of rights or of duties," decreed that for the future, Protestants should enjoy the same prerogatives with Catholics.⁷ Torture and the Inquisition were abolished;⁸ the right of asylum in churches was suppressed,⁹ and unlimited freedom of the press established.¹⁰ At the same time, it was resolved that the magnificent chapel of the Superga, built upon a hill at the gates of Turin, should, like the Pantheon at Paris, be "destined to receive, under the name of the Temple of Gratitude, the remains of citizens who had deserved well of their country," without distinction of religion.¹¹ The College of Nobles, the Tribunal of Apanages, and the orders of the Nonciata and St. Maurice disappeared by one stroke.¹² Piedmont was united to France,¹³ and the national guards of the valley of Lucerna were assembled at La Tour,¹⁴ to take the oath of fidelity to the constitution, around the tree of liberty.

The commandant of Pignerol attended upon this occasion.¹⁵ Paul Appia, the author of the memoirs so often quoted in the preceding chapter, having been elected by his fellow-citizens a municipal officer, delivered a fervent oration. "Citizens and brethren," said he, "we are now enrolled under the standard of liberty; arms are not given you to make you quit your homes, but that you may defend them—that you may watch over the public tranquillity—

¹ Decree of 10th December, 1793.

² On 15th December.

³ On 18th December.

⁴ On 21st December. By this decree the intendancies were abolished, and in their stead a council of the public finances was established in each province.

⁵ Decree of 19th December, 1793.

⁶ Same decree.

⁷ Decree of 31st December, 1793.

⁸ Torture, by decree of 17th December, 1793; and the Inquisition, by that of 25th January, 1799.

⁹ By decree of 6th January, 1799. This right of asylum was of use only to criminals, whose impunity it favoured.

¹⁰ On 17th January.

¹¹ Decree of 6th January.

¹² By decree of 1st and 10th February, 1799.

¹³ By decree of 2d February, 1799.

¹⁴ On 20th January, 1799.

¹⁵ General Niboyet.

that you may rid the country of any one who would assail the life or property of citizens. . . . I invite you to banish from this time forth, as brethren, all hatreds and party spirit. . . . Thus will those infamous informers disappear, who dishonour and trouble society. . . . When he must accuse any one, the true republican is not afraid to put his own name, like the Scythian, on the arrow which he shoots. . . . Citizens! consider seriously the greatness of the promises which you have just made. You have sworn to be obedient to the laws—to respect your superiors, and to obey them, and to banish despotism under whatsoever form it may present itself. Let this henceforth be the motto for all of you alike, To live freemen, or to die! Hurrah for the Republic! [Vive la République!]¹

“O Vaudois! O my dear countrymen!” exclaimed he at a later period,² “who has more reason than we to cherish this liberty? We shall no more see those unhappy times, when soldiers and executioners were the logicians whom kings sent against us; when superstition and fanaticism brooded over schemes of vengeance, and sharpened poignards to stab our brethren. But let us draw a curtain over the past. Instructed in the holy religion which teaches us to pardon, let us invite all our compatriots, of whatsoever way of thinking, to unite with us, that all may form one and the same family, and all may labour together for the prosperity of the country, so that it may always be said, These mountains are inhabited by a virtuous people, the enemies of luxury and of all the passions which corrupt the hearts of men.”³

After having attended to the military and administrative organization of the country, the provisional government appointed a commission, “for the purpose of collecting in the national archives and libraries, all the documents which might be deemed useful for the composition of a national history.”⁴ It appointed also a com-

¹ These extracts are considerably abridged. The address was printed entire at Pignerol, by Scott, under the title, Discours prononcé aux quinze compagnies de garde nationale de la vallée de Luserne . . . ce 1er pluviôse, an VII. de la République française, et le 1er de la liberté piémontaise, par Paul Appia, officier municipal. (Hahn quotes some larger fragments of it. Geschichte der Waldenser, &c., pp. 204–206.)

² In 1808, being then juge de paix at La Tour.

³ Mémoire historico-statistique sur les Vaudois . . . ou réponses aux questions qui ont été adressées à Paul Appia, membre du conseil général et juge de paix à La Tour, par M. Alexandre Lamoth, préfet du Pô, par ordre de Son Excellence M. le ministre de l'intérieur, en 1808. MS. of 26 folio pages, communicated by M. Appia of Frankfort. (Quoted by Hahn, p. 206.)

⁴ By decree of 26th February, 1799. This project has been partly realized in our days, by the commission of the Monumenta patriæ.

mission of sciences and arts, of which the moderator of the Vaudois churches (Peter Geymet) was nominated a member.¹ The Archbishop of Turin himself recommended order and forbearance,² notwithstanding the abolition of the ecclesiastical tithes.³ By a decree of the 3d of April, 1799, Piedmont was divided into departments; and the valleys were included in the department of the Po, called at first that of the Eridan. Its administration was confided to a central commission, of which likewise Geymet was nominated a member.⁴

But the coalition formed against France had already re-animated the hopes of the partizans of the ancient regime. The Austro-Russian armies approached Piedmont. A decree was published, prohibiting under pain of death, the cry, *Vive le roi!*⁵ The defenders of liberty had not learned even to respect the liberty of sympathies. It was to render themselves unworthy of exciting them; it was to compromise the dignity of their fall, now soon to take place.

The allies speedily entered Turin.⁶ The provisional government removed its seat to Pignerol; but the Austrians and Russians followed hard after it, and it took refuge in the fort of Fenestrelle. Perhaps, even this might have fallen into the hands of the enemy, had it not been for the bravery of the Vaudois, who exposed their lives to arrest the Austro-Russian forces, at the defile of Malanage.

The re-actionary Piedmontese, and the special enemies of the Vaudois, endeavoured to organize an expedition for the purpose of wasting the Vaudois valleys by fire and sword. Twelve thousand men had already arrived at Pignerol for this object; and we have seen, in the preceding chapter, how Providence permitted this calamity to be warded off by the patriotism and prudence of the men who became answerable with their heads, for the tranquillity of these countries.

“After the battle of Marengo,” says Appia in his memoirs,⁷ “Piedmont was inundated with French troops, whom it was necessary to supply with provisions, notwithstanding their great price, for the sack of wheat was then sold as high as five louis, and other things in proportion. Our communes were burdened with

¹ This commission was instituted by decree of 27th February, 1799. It was at first composed of fifteen members; and by decree of 29th December, ten more were added to them. It was this last decree which nominated Geymet.

² Mandatory of 14th March, 1799.

³ By decree of 31st March.

⁴ By decree of 3d April, signed Musset, commissaire du gouvernement.

⁵ By decree of 14th May.

⁶ Towards the end of May. But the citadel did not surrender till the 20th of June.

⁷ P. 57.

an exaction every ten days, which much exceeded their feeble resources. It consisted of money, hay, wood, straw, wine, and provisions. Not being able to meet this demand, the communes sent a deputation to Turin, to General Chabrand, in order to obtain exemption from it; and in consideration of the services which we had rendered, he discharged the Vaudois from that extraordinary tax."

Napoleon passed seven days in Milan,¹ occupied in re-organizing the Cisalpine Republic,² and in opening relations with the court of Rome.³ In the midst of these great affairs, however, the Vaudois church was completely forgotten. "The financial position of the pastors," says M. Monastier,⁴ "became in these circumstances extremely critical. The royal subsidy from England, which formed the greater part of their slender stipends, had been withdrawn from them, on their becoming subject to France. The English national subsidy continued to come to them, but irregularly.⁵ The share of each minister amounted to about 500 fraucs. This was their whole salary, certainly insufficient for the wants of a family. The devoted attachment of their parishioners caused them to make an effort to supplement it. In more than one locality, the elders of the church went from house to house, begging the bread of which the pastor stood in want. On hearing of such great necessities, the executive commission of Piedmont adopted measures, which were well intended, but not very politic."

It began by reducing the number of Catholic parishes in the Vaudois valleys from twenty-eight to thirteen.⁶ Then, "considering that notwithstanding the oppression to which the Vaudois have been subjected for so many centuries, . . . they have always shown themselves warmly attached to the Piedmontese nation

¹ From 17th to 24th June, 1800.

² Which afterwards took the name of the Italian Republic, and of which he was named president on 26th January, 1802.

³ Rome then belonged to the King of Naples. Pius VI., carried away from his metropolis and transported to Valence in 1798, had died in that city in course of the same year. A conclave of thirty-five cardinals had been assembled for some months in Venice, to appoint a successor. A skilful policy directed the choice of Cardinal Chiaramonti, Bishop of Imola, who in his diocese (then united to the Cisalpine Republic), had delivered a homily full of moderation and almost of sympathy for liberal ideas. He was elected under the name of Pius VII. It was with him that Napoleon concluded the concordat (15th July, 1801) which regulated the re-establishment of the Catholic religion in France.—But Pius VII. likewise wished at a future period to re-establish the Jesuits and to resist Napoleon, whom he excommunicated (1809); he in his turn was carried away from the Vatican (6th July, same year) and did not re-enter his dominions till the Restoration (1814). He died in 1829.

⁴ II., 194.

⁵ Also the subsidy granted by the Walloon churches, for the Latin school.

⁶ Decree of 27 Brumaire, year IX. (18th November, 1800).

—that, in the disastrous campaign of the year VII. (1799), they covered a part of the French army,¹ and that they no longer receive the English subsidy, destined to the support of their pastors”—the executive commission decreed that the whole revenues of the suppressed Catholic parishes should be paid over to them; that the hospital of Pignerol, destined till then to facilitate the carrying off of their children, and the catholicization of the necessitous members of their church, should also, with all its revenues, be placed under the management of the Vaudois Table; and, finally, that the Vaudois should be declared worthy of national gratitude.² Shortly afterwards, the valley of Lucerna received the name of Val-Pelis, from the name of the torrent which flows through it; and that of St. Martin was called Val-Balsille, in commemoration of the heroic defence made by Arnaud and his valiant troop of mountaineers, at the time of the glorious return of the Vaudois to their native country, in 1689 and 1690. Each of the thirteen actual Vaudois pastors was, moreover, confirmed in the post which he occupied, and called to take the oath of fidelity to the constitution.³

During this interval, however, the moderator of the Vaudois churches had been appointed sub-prefect at Pignerol.⁴ He convoked the synod of these churches, in order to demit his office of moderator, for his discharge of the duties of which he received the thanks of the meeting of synod.⁵ John Rodolph Peyrani was elected in his stead. “The meeting,” it is said, “being deeply impressed with a sense of the benefits which have been so largely bestowed upon the Vaudois by the republican government, expresses its gratitude for them, and vows an inviolable attachment to the sacred cause of liberty.”⁶ And afterwards, “considering that irreligion

¹ By arresting the Austro-Russian forces at Le Malanage, and thus favouring the retreat of the provisional government to Fenestrelle.

² Decree of 28 Brumaire, in the year IX. (19th November, 1800). The provisions of this decree were renewed by that of 13 Nivôse, in the year IX. (3d January, 1801). The latter decree suppressed, moreover, the Catholic parish of Prarusting, with reservation of the revenues to the priest who then served the cure, but appointing that after the death of that ecclesiastic, the revenues of his parish should also pass to the Vaudois churches.—The Catholics of St. John petitioned against the suppression of their parish, which had been united to that of Lucerna; and the executive commission re-established it, assigning to the priest of it, pro tempore, the church, the parsonage house, and the meadow attached to it, with a yearly allowance of 800 livres, to be taken from the national exchequer. (Decree of 14 Germinal, in the year X.—4th April, 1801.)—The donation of this national property to the Vaudois was ratified by the decrees of 11 and 22 Germinal, in the year X. (12th and 23d April, 1801).

³ Decree of 18 Germinal, in the year X. (8th April, 1802).

⁴ In May, 1801.

⁵ Synod of 1st, 2d, and 3d June, 1801, § i.

⁶ Same Synod, § ii.

is the product of this age, which calls itself philosophical, and not being able to conceal from themselves that the vices which are the consequences of it, make progress daily, the meeting, strongly persuaded and convinced that religion is the firmest bond of society, and that it alone can make man happy, enlarge his ideas, perfect his reason, and destroy or weaken vice, resolved that a day of extraordinary fasting and humiliation shall be kept, according to the ancient custom of the Vaudois church."¹ It was in this synod that the ancient evangelical churches of the French Alps enjoyed the privilege of being admitted to form thenceforth part of the same body with those of the valleys of Piedmont.²

Meanwhile, Charles Emmanuel IV. had abdicated his eventual rights to the throne of Sardinia, in favour of his brother, Victor Emmanuel.³ Napoleon had been named President of the Italian Republic,⁴ then Emperor of the French,⁵ and finally, King of Italy.⁶ When he went to Milan, to place the iron crown upon his head, he received at Turin a deputation of the Vaudois Table.⁷ "Are you one of the Protestant clergy of this country?" said he to Peyrani, who was the speaker of the deputation. "Yes, sire; and moderator of the Vaudois church." "Are you schismatics from the Church of Rome?" "Not schismatics, but separate." Then the emperor, suddenly changing the conversation, as if something had just occurred to his recollection, said to him, "You have had

¹ Minute of Synod of 1801, § xiii.

² Ibid, § iii.—These churches were represented by Pastor Monnet.—They were those of St. Véran, Fonsillarde, Molines, Arvieux, La Chalp, and Brunissard.

³ In 1802.—Charles Emmanuel IV. died at Rome in 1819; and his brother, who in 1814 took the title of Victor Emmanuel IV., abdicated in 1821, in favour of a third brother, named Charles Felix.

⁴ On 26th January, 1802.

⁵ He was crowned on 2d December, 1804.

⁶ Crowned, 26th May, 1805, at Milan.

⁷ In June, 1805.—All the historians who have spoken of this interview place it in the year 1797. It cannot have taken place at that date, for the King of Sardinia did not abdicate till 1798; and the Vaudois never made a spontaneous submission to a foreign power, whilst the sceptre of their legitimate sovereign was still extended over them. Moreover, I find no occasion in 1797, nor in the following years till 1805, upon which Bonaparte could have received a Vaudois deputation at Turin. Again, it appears that Peyrani said to him, "Sire, I am moderator of the Vaudois church." Now, a style proper only to crowned heads could not have been used to Napoleon in 1797, as he was not crowned till 1804. Nor could Peyrani have called himself moderator in 1797, as he was not appointed to that office till 1801. Finally, a letter addressed by Peyrani to M. de Portalis in May, 1805, contains the following: "A Vaudois deputation having had the honour to be presented to his imperial and royal majesty on his passage at Turin, and having informed him of the circumstances of the churches which they represented, received orders from him to apply to your excellency, to ask their organization," &c. . . . This agrees exactly with the particulars of the interview, which must have taken place in June, 1805.

brave men among you!" "Yes, sire; Arnaud, the pastor and colonel who conducted our ancestors back to their own country." "Your mountains are the best defenders you can have. Cæsar had difficulty in passing through your defiles. Is Arnaud's Return accurate?" "Yes, sire; but we believe that our people were aided by Providence." "How long have you formed an independent church?" "From the days of Claude, Bishop of Turin, about the year 820." "What stipend have your clergy?" "We have no fixed stipend."¹ "Had you not a pension from England?" "Yes, sire; the kings of Great Britain have always been our protectors and benefactors, till recently." "How is that?" "The royal pension has been suppressed, since we became subjects of your majesty." "Are you organized?"² "No, sire." "Present a memorial; send it to Paris, and you will obtain this organization immediately."³

The moderator having returned to the valleys, lost no time in convoking the mayors and pastors of all the Vaudois communes to a public meeting, to be held in the open air, at St. John, in the square of Les Blonats.⁴ Each pastor and each mayor was asked to append his signature to the letter of convocation, to attest his knowledge of it, and to give his consent to the proposed conference.⁵ When the meeting was assembled, Peyrani submitted to it—(1) The draft of a petition to the minister of worship,⁶ to ask of him an ecclesiastical organization, in accordance with the new law. (2) A plan of organization by which the Vaudois parishes were grouped into five consistorial parishes, to preserve to them the right of having a synod of their own.⁷ In this document are to be found these sentences:—

"Down to the time when Piedmont was finally united to France,

¹ Even the revenues granted to the Vaudois by the executive commission (18th November, 1800, and 3d January, 1801) were suspended by the sequestration of the national domains.—Decree of 4 Germinal, in the year X. (25th March, 1805).

² To understand this question, and more especially the answer to it, it must be borne in mind that an organic law for the Protestant churches of France, had been passed on the 18 Germinal, in the year X. (24th April, 1802); and that some years elapsed before the new organization was everywhere established.

³ These particulars are related by Gilly, Waldensian Researches, pp. 80, 82;—Blair, History of the Waldenses, vol. ii.;—Sims, Oeuvres de Peyrani; Hahn, Geschichte der Wald., p. 12;—Achard, Sketch of the History and present Situation of the Waldenses;—Monastier, II., 189, &c.—See the Bibliography.

⁴ The letter of convocation is dated 26th May (it is signed by all the members of the Table); the day of meeting was fixed for 30th May, 1805.

⁵ It bears the signatures only of eight pastors and eight mayors.

⁶ M. Portalis.—This petition was accompanied by a topographical description of the Vaudois churches, according to the terms of the law of organization.

⁷ In accordance with art. XIII. of the law of 18 Germinal, year X. (Titre II. sect. 1.)

we enjoyed the privilege of assembling in synod, to frame regulations for ourselves. Having learned from the concordat the form of organization which the Protestant churches of the empire must assume—which we resemble, although we were never reformed—we regret to perceive that the number of our parishes will with difficulty admit of the five consistorial churches requisite to form the district of a synod. However, my lord, upon account of isolation, we venture to solicit a slight exception to the rule,”¹ &c. . . .

The assembly adopted these papers, and also (3) a memorial intended to be presented to the minister of the interior, and the finance minister. In this memorial, after having recounted the principal facts of their eventful history, the Vaudois stated, that the resources which they derived from England had been cut off, since the incorporation of Piedmont with France; that the bursaries established at Geneva, Lausanne, and Basle, in favour of students from the valleys, had been suspended; that the revenues of the national domains granted to them by the decree of 28 Brumaire, in the year IX., had also been taken from them by the sequestration of these domains.² In consequence of all this, they asked that the government should provide in a regular manner for the maintenance of their pastors, and that the sequestered domains should again be placed at their disposal, that their revenues might be entirely devoted to the purposes of public instruction in the valleys.³

All these papers having been addressed to M. Mestrezat, president of the consistory of Paris, to be by him presented to the different ministers concerned, it was replied that the number of the Vaudois parishes would not admit of more than three consistorial churches—that it was difficult to allow them to retain the national domains—and that the stipends of the pastors (determined by the amount of the population) could not, in the valleys, be higher than the third class. "However," it was added, "the prefect of the Po (M. La Villa) is well inclined towards you; and the minister will ask from him more exact information concerning the Vaudois valleys."¹

¹ It was proposed to form five consistorial churches, in the following manner:—I. Bobi, Villar, and Rora. II. La Tour, St. John, and Angrogna. III. St. Germain, Pramol, and Pomaret. IV. Ville Sèche, Maneille, Macel, Pral, and Rodoret. V. Prarusting, Rocheplate, Pignerol, and the localities of the plain in which there were scattered Protestants.

² In consequence of a decree which suspended all sale or donation of these domains, until new inquiries were made into the subject. (Decree of 4 Germinal, in the year XIII.—25th March, 1805.)—“These revenues amounted,” says the memorial, “to an annual sum of 10,000 francs, including the interest due by a number of creditors in different communes, of which, however, nothing could ever be obtained.” (Words of the memorial.)

³ This paper is signed by all the pastors of the valleys without exception—by the mayors of all the Vaudois communes, also without exception—and by Paul Appia and John Daniel Peyrot, with this title, deputy of Val-Petis.—In all, twenty-eight signatures.

It will be seen from this, that this business threatened to become protracted. Napoleon, having been crowned at Milan on 26th May, proceeded thereafter to Genoa, in order to effect the annexation of that country to France. He returned to Turin.² The moderator, having obtained a new audience, presented a congratulatory address, and reminded him of the necessities of the church. "It is to you, sire," said he—"it is to the prodigies of valour and heroism, to the power of genius which presides over the destinies of the world—that this small body of people which has escaped from the ravages of time and the rage of intolerance, owes the blessing of its political existence, and the assurance that its altars will henceforth be protected."³ . . . Therefore, the name of your majesty is often mentioned in our prayers. . . . Exposed for centuries to all the storms of fanaticism, . . . the Protestants of our valleys have, at different periods, been spoiled of their goods, . . . or banished from the land which was red with the blood of their martyrs. . . . England came to the help of our wandering families and desolated churches. . . . Our sanctuaries were rebuilt; the caves and rocks again resounded with our hymns, and a royal subsidy conveyed to us annually the fruit of the piety of the British court. . . . The new political institutions which have been given us have caused an abatement of this interest taken in us by Great Britain, and the royal subsidy has been suppressed. . . . Our valleys have served as an asylum for the remains of the army of Verona. . . . But a painful feeling mingles with the delight which the arrival of your majesty creates in our mountains. A report has been spread that you are about to deprive us of the national domains. . . . Be pleased, sire, to confirm them to us by an imperial decree, . . . which will engrave for ever on our hearts an eternal, admiring, and grateful recollection of your august mightiness."⁴

¹ Lettre of M. Mestrezat, dated from Paris, 1 Messidor, year XIII. (20th June, 1805).—The letter of the minister demanding information is of 29 Prairial (18th June).
About the end of June, 1805.

³ I give mere extracts from this address, and these of the best parts; for it abounds in such phrases as this: "with the same hands with which you have flung the thunderbolt . . . you have raised up the standards of philosophy and of a religion which commends itself to all . . . which makes men happy without staining the earth with blood." "A philosophical government, the friend of men, rises on the ruins of a superstitious court," &c. . . .

⁴ This document is not dated.—A letter of 4 Messidor, of the year XII. (24th June, 1804), addressed by the prefect of the Po to the sub-prefect of Pignerol,

No sooner had Napoleon returned to Paris than he demanded information concerning the nature and value of the national domains which had been assigned to the Vaudois by the executive commission;¹ and without even awaiting the arrival of that information, he continued to the Vaudois pastors the endowment which they had thus received,² without prejudice to the stipend allowed them by the state.³ At the same time he signed the imperial decree⁴ said, "The minister of the interior has just transmitted a duplicate of the decree of 15 Germinal last (5th April, 1804), by which the government has fixed the stipend to be allowed to the pastors," &c. . . . This relates to the pastors of France in general. All that was done at this time was to inquire into the circumstances of the Vaudois parishes.

¹ By decrees of 28 Brumaire, 13 Nivôse, 11 and 22 Germinal, of the year IX. (19th November, 1800; 3d January, 12th and 23d April, 1801.)—The minister demanded from the prefect of Turin, a statement of the domains granted to the Vaudois, by letter of 17 Thermidor, of the year XIII. (6th August, 1805).—The prefect wrote to the same purpose to M. Geymet, 29 Thermidor (18th August); the sub-prefect to the pastors, 4 Fructidor (22d August). And the information demanded was prepared on 5 Fructidor (23d August) by the officers of the Vaudois Table, and sent off on the 6th, in a report which showed the nature, origin, extent, value, management, and revenue of these domains, as well as the amount of the subsidies, previously received from England and Holland.

² By imperial decree of 25 Thermidor of the year XIII. (13th August, 1805).—It is evident that Napoleon did not await the arrival of the information demanded in order to make up his mind; as that information was not returned until the 24th of August, and it was on the 13th that the national domains in question were confirmed to the Vaudois.—Afterwards, a prefectorial decree of 25th January, 1806, appointed—(1) That the three presidents of the consistorial churches of the valleys, should provisionally manage these domains on behalf of the Vaudois. (2) That all the pastors of the valleys, assembled under the presidency of the sub-prefect of Pignerol, should nominate by an absolute majority of votes, an agent and a treasurer, selected from amongst themselves—these should be joined with the three presidents; and that their duties should be gratuitously discharged. (Then follow articles of detail.) (6) That each of the three presidents should discharge the duties of principal manager, during four months of the year. (8) That all the Vaudois pastors should assemble once a-year, under the presidency of the sub-prefect, to audit and attest the accounts.—The imperial decree of 5th May, 1806, considering the places of worship and presbytères or parsonages as public edifices, laid upon the communes the burden of building and repairing them as might be required.

³ As pastors of the third class. Decree of 25th July, 1805.—The rent yielded by the national domains was appropriated entirely to the purposes of primary and academic education.

⁴ I have not seen this decree, but the following is an extract of a letter of the minister of worship, Portalis, dated from Paris, 19 Thermidor, in the year XIII., by which he announced its promulgation to the prefect of the department of the Po:—

"Monsieur le Prefet,—I have the honour to acquaint you that by a decree of the 6th current, his majesty has granted three consistorial churches to the Vaudois of your department: the first is established at La Tour, the second at Prarostino, and the third at Ville Seche, without prejudice, however, to the external rites of the Catholic religion. By the same decree, Messrs. Peter Bert, Emmanuel Rostan, Peter Gril, and Paul Solomon Bonjour, are confirmed as pastors of the church of La Tour; Messrs. David Mondon, Paul Goante, and Joshua Meille, are confirmed of 6 Thermidor; in the year XIII. (25th July, 1805), by which their churches were organized in three consistorial churches—one at La Tour, another at Prarusting, and the third at Ville Sèche.¹ All the actual pastors were confirmed and officially installed in their respective parishes, by the prefect of the Po, as the organ of the government.² It must have been very gratifying to them to see associated with him the former moderator of their churches, M. Geymet, who retained the office of sub-prefect of Pignerol, during the whole time that the authority of France subsisted in Piedmont.

The following is the account given of this ceremony by a contemporary:³—"I was lately present at the institution of three consistorial churches accorded to the Vaudois of the valleys of Pignerol. The prefect⁴ had announced that he would be at La as pastors of that of Prarostino; and Messrs. Alexander Rostan, John Daniel Olivet, David Monnet, Daniel Combe, Ferdinand Peyani, and Solomon Peyrani, are confirmed as pastors of the Vaudois church of Ville Sèche," &c.

¹ The following table shows the parishes attached to each of these consistorial churches, with their population at that time:—

Consistorial Churches.	Parishes	Total Population.	Protestant Population.	President of the Consistorial Churches
I. LA TOUR.....	Bobì.....	1,594	1,570	{ Peter Bert, pastor at La Tour.
	Villar.....	2,260	1,930
	La Tour.....	2,200	1,700
	Rora.....	540	500
II. PRARUSTING {	Angrogna.....	2,100	1,750	{ Joshua Meille, pastor at St. John.
	Prarusting.....	1,420	1,400
	Envers-Portes....	600	400
	St. John.....	1,700	1,600
	Pignerol and Turin	140,000	400
III. VILLE-SECHE {	St. Germain.....	810	700	{ Peyrani, pastor at Le Pomaret.
	Pramol.....	980	900
	Envers-Pinache...	480	400
	Pomaret.....	600	550
	Val Balsille*.....	4,600	3,100

² The following are the papers relating to this occasion. Decree of 6 Thermidor, of the year XIII. (25th July, 1805); the Vaudois pastors are to receive their stipend from the imperial treasurer (at Paris).† An ordinance of the same date, confirming them in the posts which they occupy. A letter of the minister of worship to the prefect of the Po, of date 19 Thermidor (5th August), to proceed to their installation. Despatch of the prefect of the Po, to the sub-prefect of Pignerol, announcing that these things had all been carried into effect. Letter of the sub-prefect to the pastors, apprising them of these things (16th August, 1805).

³ In the Courrier de Turin, No. of 17 Vendémiaire, of the year XIV. (9th October, 1805).—This article is signed G. A.

⁴ M. Loysel.

* Including VILLE-SECHE, Les Clots, Faet, Rioclaret, Mancille, Macel, Rodoret, and Pral. (Le Périér was almost entirely Catholic.)

† According to new Instructions of the minister of worship, dated 1 Frimaire, of the year XIV. (22d November, 1805), and transmitted by the sub-prefect to the Vaudois pastors (21st March, 1806), their stipend was to be paid, on orders sent from Paris, at the office of the Receiver of Finances at Pignerol.

Tour, on Sunday the 15th current (7th October, 1805), in order to instal the pastors confirmed by his majesty, and to take from them the oath prescribed for ministers of all religious denominations. The inhabitants of the three valleys repaired in great numbers to La Tour. At nine o'clock precisely, the firing of salutes in the commune of St. John announced the approach of the prefect, and in a few moments he arrived, accompanied by the sub-prefect of our arrondissement, and alighted at the beautiful residence of M. Peyrot,¹ member of the general council. Before coming to the bridge of Angrogna, the prefect was met by the deputation of pastors and received their expressions of respect; and on arriving at the bridge, he found there the mayors of the valleys, the municipal council of La Tour, and almost all the officials of the neighbouring communes. M. Appia,² another member of the general council of our department, delivered an address in name of his compatriots, in which he expressed their affection for his majesty, and their gratitude to the wise magistrate, to whom we owe in great part the boon of our organization. A numerous body of the national guard was under arms, and lined both sides of the path along which the cortege defiled. More firing announced the entry of the prefect into the chief place of the commune. At half-past ten o'clock, the cortege arrived at the place of worship, where the prefect, arrayed in his official robes, was received by the pastors of La Tour, who accompanied him to the place prepared for him. The ceremony was immediately commenced by the usual prayers, followed by a sermon, which demonstrated at once the excellency of evangelical doctrine and the eloquence of the pastor.³ The prefect then caused the organic law of the Reformed churches to be read to those present, and likewise the imperial decrees relative to the Vaudois; after which he delivered the following address:—

“Liberty of conscience is the most sacred of the rights of man, and the violence which has so often been done to it, can only be regarded as the effect of a barbaric ignorance. Religion will always be respected by enlightened governments. This means of communication between God and men, should unite men in common sentiments of gratitude to their Creator—give them new strength for the practice of the social virtues which it demands of them, and procure for them the happiness of a peaceful life. True Christians should never depart from those principles of gentleness which are enjoined in the gospel. Happy inhabitants of the valleys! these are the principles which you profess. May your hearts ever remain true to them! Ministers of the gospel! his majesty the emperor and king confides to you the honourable duty of cherishing by your instructions and your example, the purity of morals subsisting amongst this good people! I shall now receive your oath to this effect, and that of fidelity to his majesty."

¹ Known by the name of M. Peyrot of Holland.

² The author of the memoirs which I have so often quoted.

This sermon was preached by M. Bert, pastor at La Tour.

The following were the words of this oath:—"I swear and promise to God, upon the holy gospels, that I will be always obedient to the laws of the empire, and faithful to the emperor. I promise also that I will be a member of no council, and will be a party to no league, either at home or abroad, contrary to the public tranquillity; and if in my church or elsewhere I become aware of any conspiracy to the prejudice of the state, I will make it known to the government."¹

The ceremony was then concluded like the ordinary worship of Protestants. It awakened in us, adds the writer from whom this account of it is taken, feelings not easily expressed. "Victims of a long persecution, we were accustomed to regard governments with respect, because our doctrine lays it upon us as a duty; but we could not have the same sympathy for oppressors, as for magistrates of known impartiality." The Vaudois had heretofore, in fact, known little but the severity of the laws of their country—they now began to know their justice.

Before returning to the principal town of his department, the prefect spent part of a day in the house where he had alighted on his arrival, in the company of the pastors whom he had just installed; and amongst the ministers with whom he particularly conversed, says the writer from whom we have borrowed this narrative, "distinguished attention was shown to M. Emmanuel Rostan, pastor of Bobi; for it was to his care and generosity, and the care and generosity of his worthy spouse, that 300 wounded Frenchmen owed their safety in the unfortunate retreat of the year VII. This fact is well known; and is of itself sufficient to justify all that the government has done in favour of the Vaudois."

Nothing of particular interest in a historic point of view, presents itself during the remainder of the time that the Vaudois were under the dominion of France. The regular course of government and impartial administration of the laws afford no remarkable incident to the historian.

¹ Extracted from the minute of this ceremony, drawn up by the prefect and signed by all the pastors.—It commences thus: "This fourteenth day of the month of Vendémiaire, in the year XIV." (6th October, 1805)—a day before the date given in the narration above quoted.—According to the Art de vérifier les dates, the 6th of October, 1805, or 14 of Vendémiaire, of the year XIV., was in reality a Sabbath. The error is therefore in the Courrier de Turin.

The pastors of the valleys were entitled, and even bound, to meet together once every year;¹ and although this meeting did not bear the name of a synod, they were able to discuss to good purpose the affairs of their church; for the management of the national domains with which they had been endowed, which was the legal object of their meeting, implied a consideration of these affairs. It was in the first of these meetings that the resolution was adopted of building at St. John the place of worship which is now to be seen there. Its erection took place from 1806 to 1808, and the government itself took part in it. Down to the end of the eighteenth century, the Vaudois had been prohibited from the exercise of their religion in this commune, and it was to them a subject of enthusiastic feeling and a point of general interest to be able to commence it there. They seemed thus to take a protest against the past, and to assure themselves of their own emancipation.

At the same period, an awful phenomenon, which had already been witnessed in the Vaudois valleys in 1611 and in 1755, recurred to fill them with alarm. "I was at my desk," writes a merchant of Pignerol, "when my little boy, who was beside me, suddenly rose, saying that he was afraid; my dog howled with all his might; at the same moment I felt as if there were something cold under my feet, and the whole house began to shake."² This was upon the 2d of April, 1808, at a quarter before six o'clock in the evening.³ It was the commencement of an earthquake, very remarkable, especially for its duration. This first shock, of which the valley of Lucerna was the centre, was felt at Turin, Genoa, Lyons, Grenoble, and Geneva. "But as the weather was very serene, although cold, the greater part of the inhabitants and of the cattle were out of doors; and by a special—I might almost say a miraculous—favour of Divine providence, no one lost his life. If this shock had taken place half-an-hour sooner, more than 100 persons would have been crushed in the church of Lucerna alone, the arched roof of which fell in. It became necessary to prop all the houses of La Tour, the walls of many of which were rent; and the inhabitants constructed sheds as hastily as possible in the fields and gardens, into which they retired,¹ and in which they were compelled to spend many weeks. The whole people lived in tents; some individuals in old wine casks or under other slight coverings hastily converted into dwellings upon the emergency. These localities, where all was lately so peaceful, presented the resemblance of a camp, and confusion everywhere prevailed. There was no agriculture, no commerce, no industry of any kind. Fear had so seized upon the hearts of all, that they thought only of the means of saving their lives."²

¹ Decree of the prefect of the Po, 26th January, 1806, § viii.

² Vaudois Correspondence or collection of letters from some of the inhabitants of the valleys of Pignerol, on the earthquake of 1808.—New edition, corrected and enlarged.—8vo, Paris, 1803; of viii. and 70 pages.

³ Report of M. Vassali-Eandi to the Academy of Sciences of Turin.—Sitting of 2d May, 1808. Turin, 8vo, 133 pages.

This shock was the most severe; but it was followed by a multitude of others, almost without interruption, to the 15th of April. "For some days at first, the earth was not for a moment still. In the course of one single night we counted thirty-two shocks. That which was experienced on the 2d of April, at nine o'clock in the evening, almost equalled the first. Every body was in the utmost consternation."³ "Other shocks took place on the same day at a quarter past nine o'clock, at ten o'clock, at eleven o'clock, and at midnight, and then again at two o'clock and at three o'clock in the morning."⁴ "Within the space of two years, we felt from 15,000 to 16,000 shocks, of greater or less severity. Some of them, it is true, were very slight and might be compared to the rumbling of waggons heavily loaded, or to discharges of large cannons."⁵

Three professors were sent by the Academy of Sciences of Turin,⁶ to make observations on this event. "M. Vassali, professor of natural philosophy, fitted up an electrical apparatus in a gallery. A golden thread of fifty feet in length, was fastened to a pole planted in a field, and terminated in a crystal bottle, which contained the electrometer. We saw at the moment of a slight shock that the electrometer was affected, so that its diverging threads touched both the sides of the bottle.⁷ In the interval which elapsed between two shocks, the electricity of the ground was not very observable and always positive. At the moment of the shock, it became so strong, that it could not be measured by the electrometer. Twenty minutes afterwards, the threads of that instrument, placed in contact with the permanent electrical apparatus, still remained divergent 30°. The hygrometer always indicated 20° to 28° of dryness, on a scale which contained 30°. The barometer underwent all sorts of variations between one shock and another. The thermometer often fell after a smart shock, and ¹ Report of M. Appia, who was employed by M. Vassali-Eandi, to take a note of all the phases of the phenomenon.

² Monastier, II., 197.

³ Mémoire by M. Appia, appended to his Report.

⁴ Vaudois Correspondence, p. 36.

⁵ Unpublished letter of M. Appia.

⁶ Messrs. Vassali-Eandi, Bason, and Carena.

⁷ Letter above quoted.

afterwards rose again gradually to its former temperature.”¹ “It was very singular that the most violent shocks were ordinarily announced, a few seconds before, by the disquiet of animals. Dogs barked, horses neighed, and horned cattle exhibited the most unwonted agitation in their stalls.”² “The cocks crowed incessantly, at all hours, from the time of the first shocks.”³

Persons in the open air could trace the direction of the shocks, by the movements which they caused in the tops of the trees. In general, the motion was propagated from north-east to south-west.⁴ “The shocks were preceded by a cold wind, which sometimes came from the mountain and sometimes from the plain. A sudden increase of the Pélis, which issues from two lakes lying deep among the mountains, preceded the first shock. Elsewhere, in a dry piece of ground, a spring all at once broke out. The earth was rent in the vicinity of Pompara, and there issued from it a prodigious quantity of gas. The water in the wells was generally muddy and whitish. Even the wines in the cellars underwent alteration; some were spoiled and some became acid. Healthy and robust persons suffered more than children and old men. A paralytic recovered the use of his limbs, and a person afflicted with the gout suffered much less after the earthquake.”⁵ Some persons remarked that they ate with more appetite.⁶ Others were attacked by paralysis, of which there was a renewal at each shock.⁷ There were also a number of persons who found relief from rheumatic affections; which was probably an effect of the electricity circulating around.⁸

“Our worthy prefect came up in person from Turin to visit us amidst our calamities. He expressed the liveliest interest in all the sufferers, visited without fear the most shattered houses, and gave much in alms. On his return to Turin, he instituted a subscription, which brought in 50,000 francs. He then addressed himself to the emperor, who granted half a million for the mitigation of these great misfortunes.”⁹

“One evening,” adds the same writer, “we were much terrified,

¹ Extracted from the Report of M. Vassali-Eandi, and from the Vaudois Correspondence.

² Memoir of Appia.

³ Vaudois Correspondence, p. 21.

⁴ In the valley of Lucerna, the order of propagation was—Lucerna, La Tour, St. John, Rora, Lucernette, Briqueras, and St. Segont. The shocks were almost insensible at Villar and Bobi. In the valley of the Cluson, the centre of the disturbance seems to have been St. Germain, from which it spread to Pramol, Pomaret, Pérouse, and Fignerol.

⁵ Extracted from the Vaudois Correspondence, pp. 36, 16, 17, 18, 59, 61.

⁶ Report of M. Appia.

⁷ Vaudois Correspondence, p. 18.

⁸ Report above quoted.

⁹ Memoir of M. Appia.

and thought our last hour was come. The weather was cloudy. Suddenly a great globe of fire rising above the summit of the mountain of Vandalin, made us suppose that some sudden volcanic eruption had taken place. Happily this globe of fire, after having risen to a great height, was dissipated without noise. It is the only meteor which has been remarked for two years."¹

It thus appears that Napoleon opened his hand generously to accord to the Vaudois valleys assistance proportioned to their wants and worthy at once of his glory and his power. His empire had indeed acquired gigantic magnitude. A third coalition formed against France had been broken at Austerlitz.² England, indefatigable in a contest in which others fought for her, prepared new triumphs for this new Cæsar, by fomenting new coalitions.³ Victorious in all these wars, in which all the kings of Europe were leagued against him, he might at last almost be said to have all sceptres in his hand.⁴ The extreme elevation to which he had attained, removed him above vulgar considerations, which perhaps would have been of more use to him. He thought to confine within the polar circle, that giant of the North, who alone could be a counterpoise to his vast power. But repulsed by the burning of Moscow, and pursued in his turn, as it were, by rebel frosts, he saw his armies vanquished without having fought.⁵

¹ The Vaudois Correspondence, on the contrary, says (p. 38), "A number of meteors have been remarked. On the 4th of April, some travellers coming from Lanure, saw, towards the north, a mass of fire of a globular form which descended without detonation. On the 12th, the lightning broke at Carmagnole, about eight o'clock in the evening, and having overturned a carriage, joined another mass of fire which issued from the earth, at the distance of thirty or forty paces. Then proceeded from it such a flood of light, that for some seconds, its brightness could not be endured by the eye. During the night of the 15th of April, four men who were on patrol near La Tour, suddenly saw a very bright light which issued from the peak of Vandalin; and in the time of the various storms which took place during that same month, sheets of fire often issued from the earth, whilst the lightnings ploughed the heavens." I have not thought it right to suppress these details, although foreign to the history, (1) because of their precision and rarity—(2) because the event to which they relate was limited to the valleys, and (3) because of the very interest which they may excite.

² 2d December, 1805.

³ This was the period when Napoleon thought of making a descent upon England; in a battle upon land, the strife could not have been doubtful.—The Academy of Sciences perhaps deprived him of this victory (which would have changed the balance of the world) in rejecting, as impossible, the invention of Fulton, now so triumphantly successful.—Steam was applied to the propelling of vessels in 1807. [The British reader has here before him, unmodified, the expressions of opinion and sentiment contained in the original.]

⁴ The third coalition took place from 1805 to 1806; the fourth from 1806 to 1807; the fifth from 1809 to 1810.—Almost all the states of Europe, except Russia and England, were then under the power of Napoleon.

⁵ From September to December, 1812.

In consequence of this disaster, the allies entered Paris on 31st March, 1814. On 4th April, Napoleon abdicated in favour of his son; on the 11th, he abdicated unconditionally, and on the 20th, he set out for the island of Elba. On the 3d of May, Louis XVIII. arrived in the capital of France; and on the 16th, Victor Emmanuel IV. took possession of Piedmont.¹ The Congress of Vienna was opened, and the Genoese dominions were annexed to those of the King of Sardinia.

We shall see in the following chapter how this monarch treated the Vaudois, but we may here premise, that instead of seeking to restore the cause of legitimacy by benefactions, he only proved his descent from the ancient sovereigns of the country by his adherence to all their prejudices and all their tyrannic practices, whilst he did not exhibit their greatness and courage. But it is God who casts down and who raises up again. In a future which even then was near, he had in store new glory for the throne of Savoy and new blessings for the Vaudois of Piedmont.

CHAPTER XXIII.

STATE OF THE VAUDOIS SINCE THE RESTORATION.²

(A.D. 1814 TO A.D. 1842.)

The restoration of the house of Savoy in 1814—Victor Emmanuel IV. lands at Genoa—Deputation of the Vaudois—Their petition—Revival of old edicts unfavourable to the Vaudois—Servile subjection of the king to the priesthood—His benevolent dispositions counteracted by their influence—Deputations—Restrictions and mitigations of them—Friendly interposition of the British ambassador—The Congress of Vienna—Enforcement of observance of festivals of the Church of Rome—Napoleon leaves Elba—The loyalty of the Vaudois suspected—Friendship shown by Count Crotti—Conduct of the Piedmontese government, with regard to persons who had held office under the French government—Case of M. Geymet—The ecclesiastical domains restored to the Church of Rome—Question as to the rents for the time during which the Vaudois had enjoyed them—Poverty of the Vaudois pastors—Edict of 1816, affording some relief to the Vaudois—Social progress, increasing liberality of the government, and improvement of the condition of the Vaudois.

In a strictly historical point of view, the epoch of the restoration should extend, in the case of the Vaudois, from the time when they

¹ His brother, Charles Emmanuel IV., had abdicated in his favour in 1802.

² AUTHORITIES.—Official documents. Duplicates of Documents.—Memoir on the fortunes of the Vaudois since the French Revolution (in German, by Professor were again brought under the exceptional legislation of the seventeenth century, in 1814, to the commencement of the constitutional regime, which proclaimed their civil and political emancipation in 1848; nor can this period be confidently regarded as closing even then, if some of the arbitrary laws of the past are still to be enforced for the future. There is room to hope that it will not be so when we consider the liberty that is established, the progress of enlightenment, the charity that is manifested, and the improvements already effected by the wise government which directs the affairs of the kingdom of Sardinia. We shall, therefore, confine this chapter to the last repressive measures adopted against the Vaudois by the application of the old laws; not deeming it right to extend the dishonoured name of the Restoration to the last years of the reign of Charles Albert, in which the new order of things was introduced, and which are memorable for the most important changes.

In April, 1814, Victor Emmanuel IV. recovered the sceptre of Piedmont. He had been king since 1802, but had not hitherto reigned. An English fleet went for him to Sardinia, to bring him from exile to the throne of his ancestors. The Vaudois thought it proper to send a deputation to Genoa, to receive him on his landing, and to recommend to his favourable regard the interests of their valleys. The pastors and mayors of all the Vaudois communes assembled upon this occasion at Rocheplate, on the 4th May,

VATER of Halle; included in a series of materials for modern ecclesiastical history, published in the New Theological Annals of Halle—No. for May, 1821, p. 316. In the same journal, No. for May, 1822, p. 216: Sketch of the actual state of the Vaudois of Piedmont.—Die Waidenser in unsren Tugen, von D. E. T. Mayerhoff, Berlin, 1834.—SIMS, Memoirs relative to the Vaudois (London, 1814; in English).—Reports of the Labours of the Vaudois Committee, established in London, in consequence of the great interest which was excited in England by the Narrative of a Journey to the Valleys, by Dr. W. GILLY.—The Valdo and Vigilantius of this author.—Monastier; the last two chapters of his work.—BRIDGE, A brief Narrative of a Visit to the Vaudois, &c.—Circulars and Reports of the Vaudois committee, established at London in 1821.—Other works in English: ACLAND, PLENDERLEATH, JACKSON, BRACEBRIDGE, &c. (See the Bibliography).—Statement of the Grievances of the Vaudois, 1843, pp. 40, 8vo. Published by the London committee.—The complete emancipation of the Vaudois, by Count Ferdinand de Pozzo, 1829. (In Italian).—Testimonies in favour of the Vaudois (in English; London, 1826).—The Crown and the Tiara; considerations on the present state of the Vaudois. London, 1842.—State and Grievances of the Vaudois in 1843.—Both in English.—Also numerous articles in journals. Monthly Review, June, 1814; Quarterly Review, 1843; Edinburgh Review, British Magazine, Augsburg Gazette (December, 1842); Archives du Christianisme; Archives Wesleyennes, Le Semeur, &c. (These various sources are more particularly indicated in the latter part of the catalogue placed at the end of this volume).—Finally, the Memoirs of P. Appia, 1st, Biographical; 2d, On the actual state of the Vaudois, considered in a historical and statistical point of view. (This second memoir is dated 14th February, 1815, and forms a manuscript of 13 folio pages.)

1814. They appointed M. Peyrani and M. Appia as their deputies. We are indebted to the latter for an account of the embassy:—

“We set out from Pignerol,” says he, “on the 6th of May, and arrived at Genoa on the 9th. An hour after our arrival the canons of all the forts, and those of the English ships of war, announced that the king had just entered the harbour. We concluded that we must, without loss of a moment, obtain an audience of General Bentinck, the commander of the British forces. Not succeeding in getting ourselves presented to him, we intrusted our petition to his banker, and to the Rev. Mr. Wennock, the chaplain of the British troops, who displayed a warm interest in our behalf. The petition bore, in effect, that we prayed his majesty to treat us as his other subjects. We were well assured that it had been put into the hands of the general, and by him recommended to the favourable regard of Victor Emmanuel. But the latter paid so little attention to the recommendation of the representative of the great and generous nation which had restored to him his throne, that, even before his arrival at Turin, he issued an edict which revived the old intolerant and exclusive laws enacted against us.”¹

By this edict the injunction to cease from all labour on the days of Catholic festivals, the prohibition to acquire lands out of the territory of the valleys, the disqualification for any civil office, the obligation to have a Catholic majority in the councils of the communes, and many other vexatious restrictions were imposed anew upon the Vaudois. The sovereign who was now called to re-organize everything in the administration of his dominions, to restore the lustre of his crown, and to cast the glory of the emperor's usurpation into the shade by the virtues of hereditary legitimacy, instead of acting as became the father of his people, showed himself to be only a menial slave of Popery. A few days after the publication of this edict, which flung the Vaudois back to the system of government practised in the time of Philibert, Victor Emmanuel IV. signed two ordinances, the one against freemasons, and the other against keepers of inns and eating-houses who should serve their customers with flesh on Fridays or Saturdays.²

The Vaudois, dreading, with good reason, the consequences of so strange a return to severe measures, which appeared as an anachronism amidst the enlightenment of the age, hazarded a new attempt to obtain some amelioration of their circumstances. The laws against them, which had been restored to force, were so antiquated that not a few of them had already fallen into desuetude in the end of the previous century. They hoped, moreover, that if the king were reminded of the expressions of good-will in the letter once written by his father in favour of the Vaudois,¹ he would consent to fulfil some of the promises which it contained. A Vaudois deputation accordingly set out for Turin,² and was admitted to an audience of the king on 28th May, 1814. "I will grant to the Vaudois all that I can," replied the monarch.³ His intentions were certainly good; but the Catholic clergy, masters of the sovereign and enemies of the Vaudois, soon succeeded in rendering the latter as much the objects of suspicion to the restored government as they had proved themselves, to that which had fallen, worthy of protection and regard.

¹ Mémoires de Paul Appia, sur ce qui s'est passé dans les Vallées de 1799 à 1816. The edict in question was dated 21st May, 1814.

² Making them incur, in that case, a fine of twelve crowns of gold. (Appia's Memoirs.)

"Notwithstanding the pleasant reception which we met with," writes one of the deputies, "our petition was depellita (torn in pieces), which, indeed, might have been expected from the way in which things go." Let us gratefully acknowledge Victor Emmanuel's wish to grant to the Vaudois all that he could, but let us remember, for the honour of the throne, that he could do nothing at all.

Orders were speedily issued, to those who had become tenants of the national domains granted to the Vaudois by the executive committee and by Napoleon, not to remove anything more of the produce of the woods or of the vineyards, and to bear in mind that these domains must presently be restored, undiminished in value, to the government.⁴ The next step was to close the place of

¹ Biglietto regio of Victor Amadeus III. to the Duke of Aosta, dated 4th June, 1794.

² Composed of two pastors, Bert and Peyrani, and two laymen, Brezzi and Vertu. The petition which they presented to the king will be found in BERT, Valdesi, p. 455.

³ Victor Emmanuel IV. conversed familiarly with the deputies. He showed them an old patched dress which he had brought with him into Sardinia, and said to them, "See, it was my wife who put on this piece." But this simplicity of manners only indicated a corresponding simplicity of mind, which the clergy always knew how to turn to their own account. The king might be seen following processions barefooted, with a taper in his hand, and descending to the functions of an agent of police, by personally pointing out for apprehension the passers-by who did not uncover themselves before the procession. (These particulars are extracted from the Memoirs of Appia, and from divers letters written by the deputies.)

⁴ This order is dated 30th September, 1814. The accounts relative to the management of these domains were adjusted by the moderator of the valleys, in presence of the intendant of Pignerol, in July, 1815.

worship which the Vaudois had erected at St. John, and they were obliged to conduct their religious services in the old church of Le Chiabas, built within the confines of Angrogna, although it had been long abandoned, and was in a very ruinous condition.¹

The only benefit which the Vaudois derived from this second deputation, was the issue of royal letters-patent confirming the privileges which they had enjoyed before 1794, and maintaining all the restrictions which existed at that period.² But their deprivation of the resources on which the stipend of their pastors depended, and the new impediments thrown in the way of the exercise of their religion, reduced them to the absolute necessity of making another appeal to their sovereign. This third deputation had for its object to petition for leave to use the place of worship at St. John—for the right to retain the properties purchased beyond the limits, under the French government—and that a compensation might be given for the national domains, in order to the maintenance of the pastors.³ The king refused to give an immediate reply; but whilst postponing it, he manifested a favourable inclination.

“Our pastoral deputation,” wrote M. Bert,⁴ “was presented on Friday last⁵ at the British embassy.⁶ Nothing could be more encouraging than the reception there. His excellency seemed to take the most lively interest in our affairs, and promised to use all his influence with the king. He also expressed his surprise at the return to the old edicts. Our deputies put into his hands a draft of a petition to his majesty, in which are contained our requests relative to the pastors, to the place of worship at St. John, and to the purchasers of lands beyond the limits. The ambassador asked for our good M. G——,⁷ who had written to him to offer his services

¹ The letter of the minister of the interior (Count Vêdon) to the intendant of Pignerol, on this subject, is dated 3d October, 1814. That of the intendant (Count Crotti) to the moderator, on the same subject, is dated 25th November. The minister demanded the suppression of all the places of worship erected without the valleys. “I think,” adds Count Crotti, at the bottom of the letter, “that it will be sufficient to close the place of worship at St. John, which is the only one so situated, and that you should meet somewhere else.” We shall find other subsequent examples of the same kindness and moderation, by which worthy magistrates, without being deficient in the discharge of their duties, contrived to mitigate the severity of their sovereign’s procedure.

² These letters-patent are dated 30th September, 1814.

³ This deputation must have been received at Turin from the 2d to the 4th of December, 1814.

⁴ In a private letter dated from Sainte-Marguerite, 6th December, 1814.

⁵ This must have been 2d December, 1814.

⁶ At Turin.

⁷ The person here meant is M. Geymet, formerly moderator of the Vaudois churches, and afterwards sub-prefect of Pignerol. On the fall of the French empire, all the Vaudois who filled any situation under the government, received their dismissal. Before being sub-prefect, M. Geymet was pastor of La Tour; and M.

in the capacity of chaplain; we have reason to hope that he will not only be accepted but that there will be a subscription to enable him to reside in the capital. We are assured that the report is true that General the Baron de Neyperg will be the Austrian ambassador at Turin. Our gloomy sky brightens up a little. You are, of course, aware of the order intimated to us for the closing of the place of worship at St. John. This intimation has been sent to us by the intendant, with mitigations of his own. Service has already been recommenced at Le Chiabas."

But the enemies of the Vaudois ceased not to pursue them with all sorts of accusations. "We have compared at the intendance," M. Bert goes on to say,¹ "and our adversaries seem manifestly to dread the consequences of their false accusations. The reception which we have met with has contributed, in some measure, to encourage us."

Meanwhile the congress of Vienna had commenced its sittings.² "It is credibly asserted," says M. Monastier,³ "that a friend of the Vaudois had prepared a plan for having their emancipation imposed upon the King of Sardinia, as a compensation for the territorial advantages which he obtained. An application to the congress, on the part of the valleys, was to have given occasion for introducing it. A memorial was drawn up; but at the moment when it should have been sent away, the Vaudois table, trusting in the generosity of the monarch, and fearing to give him cause of displeasure, deemed it better that it should be suppressed. Victor Emmanuel, in fact, had dwelt in Pignerol; he had visited all their valleys, he had commanded their troops, and their confidence in him was so great that they declined to employ means which might possibly have displeased him."

He was less tenderly considerate as to them. A manifesto was published on 4th January, 1815, restoring to force all the ancient laws.⁴ The Vaudois renewed their representations, but in vain.⁵ The government persisted in the course which it had chosen, and Bert, the author of this letter, was at first his assistant, and afterwards succeeded him there. He published an interesting little work on the Vaudois, entitled Le livre de famille. Pp. 105, 12mo. Geneva, 1830.

¹ It was upon a citation, dated 17th November, 1814.

² It was opened on 1st November, 1814, and concluded on 10th June, 1815. The acts of the congress consist of 121 articles. It established the different states of Europe as they exist at the present day.

³ Monastier, II. 203.

⁴ Manifesto del reggio governo, della provincia di Pinerolo. (Printed.)

⁵ Mémoire sur l'état actuel des Vaudois . . . (14th February, 1815), par Paul Joseph Appia. (MS. communicated to me.)

caused the principal provisions of the ancient edicts to be posted up in the valleys.¹

I. Every one was enjoined religiously to observe the Catholic festivals.

II. All work, capable of attracting the attention of others, was forbidden on these days.

III. The sale of provisions was to be tolerated on condition that the shop-fronts were kept closed, and that all traffic should be discontinued during mass, vespers, and the catechetical instructions of the prior. An exception was allowed in favour of medicinal substances.²

IV. Keepers of inns, coffee-houses, eating-houses, &c., were forbidden to serve any person during these same hours; all under penalty of fine and imprisonment. Every kind of amusement was also forbidden.³

The publication of these various enactments, which had long been forgotten, caused a certain fermentation in the district, and most of all amongst the most worldly class of the population. The ancient edicts, however, which had been in general terms restored to force, contained regulations far more vexatious still, and it was a sort of concession on the part of the government not to go beyond the requirements above-mentioned. This the vice-judge, Cerrutto, represented to those under his administration, by a letter intended to be read in public, in order better to inform the people of the spirit of the preceding proclamation.⁴ "I am accused," says he, "of an undue severity; however, the edicts to which I have referred having been restored to force by that of 21st May, 1814, I have thought it my duty to publish their provisions anew, in order to prevent the numerous contraventions of them, against which I would every day have been called to proceed if I had allowed them to remain forgotten, as they have been. I have

¹ Aviso al publico, dated from Lucerna, 4th March, 1815, and signed Cerrutto, substitute for the vice-judge Perrotti.

² There were discussions on the point, whether sugar, bought in the shop of an apothecary, during these privileged hours, should be considered as a medicine or an article of food.

³ This document contains nine articles. The last reiterates the provisions of the edicts of 25th June, 1626, and 20th June, 1730, which make the Protestants responsible for the presence of a Catholic in their places of worship, &c. . . . Speriamo che dipendentemente a quanto sopra, tutti gli abitanti sudetti e chiunque altro, si faranno un dovere di mettersi in regola, per così evitare il dispiacere che proveranno di procedere contro i contraventori. (Dato Torre, Valle di Lucerna, li 4 marzo 1815).

⁴ This letter is dated from Torre, val Lucerna, li 9 marzo 1815, and signed Cerrutto, vice-giudice del mandamento.

therefore republished their terms only out of a regard for the interests of those under my administration, and not from any voluntary severity." He proceeds to say that the observance of them will not only be productive of respect for the Catholic festivals, but also of a more becoming sanctification of the Sundays which Protestants themselves profess to respect.¹ He then fixes the meaning of the edict of 1626, enjoining the Vaudois to uncover at the passing of the holy sacrament, or to retire out of the way;² and of that of 1730, granting the privilege of working upon festival days to those who should obtain an authorization from the judge. This was to intimate that he would not refuse it, and so much the more plainly, as he concluded his letter by saying, "I can truly say that I am proud of the good treatment which I have upon all occasions received from the Vaudois, and I would be very ungrateful if I did not esteem myself bound to render them reciprocal offices of kindness, so far as a regard to justice will permit."³

But whilst these inferior affairs were thus going on, great events took place in the world. Napoleon quitted the island of Elba.⁴ Whilst the legitimate sovereigns were imposed upon their peoples by foreign armies, this glorious captive, coming alone and unarmed, caused royalty, although surrounded with battalions, to flee before him. This wonderful man had re-entered Paris, who had shed, more than any one, the blood of the people, but whom they always welcomed with enthusiasm; who made himself a king when kings were falling before the revolutionary gale, and who founded, on the ruins of their thrones, the greatest empire which had existed since the fall of Rome; who forged his sword of the chains broken by the revolution, and who, in opposition to all the potentates assembled in the congress of Vienna, dared to conceive, in his place of captivity, and to carry into execution, the incredible project of re-conquering the French throne by his mere presence.

Europe was startled by this news. The congress of Vienna was

¹ The following are the more severe terms of the letter: . . . per levare lo scandaloso abuso dai protestanti che dai giorni di domenica (festa per loro da tutti i tempi sempre stata in uso d'osservarsi con molta vigore), si fanno lecito di travagliare pubblicamente . . . &c.

² These latter words are a mitigation, introduced by the judge himself, in his interpretation of the law.

³ Io posso con tutta verità gloriami ed attestare pubblicamente, d'essere sempre stato dai Protestanti trattato con ogni riguardo, e che dovrei ben essere taciato da ingrato se non fosse corrispondente, &c.

⁴ He set out from it on 26th February, 1815, landed at the Gulf of Juan on 1st March, and entered the Tuileries on the 20th, Louis XVIII. having abandoned it the evening before.

dissolved; Napoleon, placed under the ban of the allied states, saw all the kings whom he had vanquished marching against him at the head of their armies. He himself, in two months' time, had raised more than 400,000 men. A final conflict was about to take place. All Europe was in breathless expectation; the nations were filled with alarm.

When we consider the liberties which Napoleon had granted to the Vaudois, and the oppression to which they had again been subjected by Victor Emmanuel IV., it may be thought likely that they would show themselves favourable to the return of the emperor. There was a sufficient number of courtiers eager to make the most of these suspicions. Victor Emmanuel had placed himself in a state of entire subjection to the clergy; to please the priests was the way of paying court to such kings, and the priests made no secret of the joy with which they heard accusations against the Vaudois. Nothing more was needed to change suspicions into certainty. But Count Crotti, a generous and influential man who had lived amongst them,¹ and who had recently been promoted to the rank of intendant of the king's armies, became security for them. It was in the following measured and appropriate terms that the moderator of the Vaudois churches gave intimation to the pastors of this fact, and of the course of conduct which they ought to pursue.

"His majesty, to whom we have been represented as rejoicing in the return of Napoleon, having had a private conversation on that subject with a nobleman, to whom we are already under great obligations, that nobleman disabused the king's mind, and has sent me word that he has himself been so good as to become security to his majesty for our fidelity and attachment to his service. I think it my duty, gentlemen and my much-honoured brethren, to acquaint you with these circumstances, entreating you all in general, and every one in particular, to make it appear by the wisdom of your conduct, in these difficult and dangerous times, that you are the descendants of those ancient Vaudois, who, although sometimes ill-treated, always forgot the wrongs which had been done them by their superiors, to hasten to their aid, and whom nothing could turn aside from their duty. I have a well-founded hope that, before midsummer, all will be arranged as we could wish, and that his majesty, convinced that several attempts have been made to take advantage of his religion in things relative to us, and seeing the wisdom of our conduct, and our attachment to his august person, . . . will give us no equivocal proofs of his attachment and his paternal regard."¹

¹ As intendant of the province of Pignerol. He visited the Vaudois valleys several times.

This hope was far from being realized; but the fidelity of the Vaudois was not shaken, and their good conduct was an incessant protest against the perfidious insinuations of their adversaries. Their pastors, deprived of fixed salaries, had now no other resource than the voluntary contributions of their parishioners; for the English subsidy was not restored to them till the end of 1814, and even then not to its former amount.² All who had occupied any situation under the French government were deprived of it, however insignificant it might be. They patiently submitted to this proof of dislike, which, from the prejudices of the new regime, they might have anticipated, but which they had done nothing to deserve. "Mr. Peter Geymet," says Monastier, "had won the respect and attachment of all who were under his jurisdiction during the thirteen years that he filled the office of sub-prefect of Pignerol. In that chief place of the prefecture, a city entirely Roman Catholic, he left an unimpeached reputation for probity at a time when the high functionaries in general had so little of it. At the restoration, Geymet retired to La Tour, at once so poor and so humble that, although a few days before he had been the first magistrate of the valleys, he did not disdain to accept the humble place of master of the Latin school, the salary of which did not exceed 700 francs, and to which he devoted his last remains of strength until the approach of his death, which took place in 1822."³

The government had announced its intention⁴ of withdrawing from the Vaudois the lands of which they had been put in possession by the French administration,⁵ in order to restore them to the Catholic parishes, which had been suppressed at the same period, but which were now re-established. But the priests demanded also that the Vaudois should be made to pay a sum equivalent to the revenues of these lands for all the time that they had enjoyed them.

¹ This letter is signed by John Rodolph Peyrani, and dated from Le Pomaret, 12th April, 1815.

² This diminution continued till 1827, when the venerable Dr. Gilly obtained the re-establishment of the subsidies on their old footing, and the payment of the arrears. These arrears were formed into a capital fund, to provide for the maintenance of two new pastors, those of Macel and Rodoret.

³ Monastier, II. 199. The author of the Israel of the Alps was himself one of the pupils of M. Geymet.

⁴ By an order of 30th September, 1814.

⁵ By the decrees of 28 Brumaire, 13 Nivose, 11 and 22 Germinal, of the year IX., and by the imperial decree of 25 Thermidor, of the year XIII.

Count Crotti, the intendant of the province of Pignerol, assembled the parties interested,¹ and asked them to discuss the matter before him. Although conducted with outward moderation, the debate exhibited great pertinacity, each party being strong in their own views; and there appeared no likelihood of any conclusion being reached, when the youngest of the priests, who, therefore, spoke after his brethren, expressed an opinion different from theirs. "The ministers," said he, "have managed these affairs not only lawfully—for they had received these powers from the authority then recognized by all Piedmont—but also faithfully, as is proved by the accounts which they have now submitted to us; they have preserved our properties intact and in perfect condition, and we ought to exact nothing more." "This equitable priest," adds Monastier, "supported his opinion with so much freedom and truth that it prevailed, and the difference was thus terminated to the great satisfaction of the worthy intendant, who had undertaken to settle it in the name of the king."²

Shortly afterwards the Vaudois addressed a petition to their sovereign, to declare to him the state of suffering and want to which their pastors were reduced.³ "Our stipends," say they, "were formerly derived from two subsidies from England, the one called royal, the other national. They amounted annually to almost 400 Piedmontese livres for each pastor. The royal subsidy having been interrupted in 1793 and 1794, the pastors obtained from the synod of 1795 an act, appointing that this deficiency should be made up by the communes, to be repaid to them if the said subsidy should be restored. In this manner our stipends were kept up to their full amount till 1800. At this period the executive commission, having taken our case into consideration without our having requested it, assigned us an annual payment from the rents of the national domains, under the name of compensation for the subsidies which we had lost. Since the return of our legitimate sovereign we have been obliged to give up all this, and the accounts were audited, in presence of the regent of the intendancy at Pignerol, in July, 1815." They accordingly requested that the communes in which they ministered should be taxed for their support, or that his majesty would provide for it by some other means.

The report of the minister was not favourable to the request of

¹ In July, 1815.

² Monastier, II. 205.

³ These are the words of the petition. According to the deplorable custom of the old Vaudois chancery, this petition is not dated, but its date is determined by that of the parere of the minister, which is of 17th February, 1816. This parere consists of six folio pages. (Archives of the Court.)

the Vandois. The British ambassador made representations on their behalf, which at first seemed not to have been attended to,¹ but which, at last, brought the government to wiser and more humane views. These views were brought forward in a council of the ministers, held on 23d February, 1816,² when the provisions were agreed upon of the edict which was published four days after. By this edict Victor Emmanuel appointed—

(1.) That provision should be made for the maintenance of the Vaudois pastors in a manner to be afterwards determined.³

(2.) That the lands which had been purchased by the Vaudois, beyond their ancient limits, should be retained by their proprietors.

(3.) That the Protestants should be permitted to exercise civil professions, such as those of engineer, architect, surgeon, &c.⁴

¹ It is said, in a note addressed by the minister of the interior to the minister of foreign affairs (no doubt in order to be communicated to the British ambassador), “that the Vaudois wished to make a merit of the loss of the English subsidies, per il loro attaccamento alla causa della libert ; il che vuol dire per la ribellione al loro legittimo sovrano,” &c. . . . (Archives of the Court, No. 665.) But I have seen nothing resembling this in the petition of the Vandois; and these words must have been ventured upon mere hear-say. Thus, it was attempted not only to do the Vaudois injury in their own country, but even to hurt them in the opinion of strangers.

At the end of the decision of the council, which was submitted to the king for his approval, we read: S. M. approva le determinazioni del congresso, con che l’assegno per la sussistenza de’ pastori de’ Valdesi, non ricada in nessuna parte a peso de’ catholici domiciliati in quelle valli. (Archives of the Court, No. 666.)

³ There was assigned to them a sum of about 500 francs, which was at first paid by the royal treasurer of Pignerol. A royal ordinance, of 14th December, 1818 (BERT, Valdesi, p. 261), decided that this sum should be taken from the produce of the additional centimes, gathered at the rate of a marc per franc on the land-tax of the valleys. Thence resulted fluctuations. In 1839, for example, the diminution was one-tenth; and it was at this time that the subsidies were fixed at 6432 francs for all the valleys; to wit, 248 francs 55 cents. half-yearly to each pastor, except those of Macel and Rodoret, parishes established after 1816. The following table, borrowed from the budget of 1841, will give some idea of the general resources of the Vaudois church at this period:—

Source of the Funds.	Destination of the Funds.				Total of funds received.
	Worship.	Instruction.	Relief of the Poor.	Hospital.
	Francs. Cents.	Francs. Cents.	Francs. Cents.	Francs. Cents.	Francs. Cents.
England.....	14,256 76	6,610 34	—	3,765 18	24,632 24
Holland.....	1,756 80	5,795 00	1,603 00	3,000 00	12,159 80
Prussia.....	(Proceeds of collection placed in Bank)			3,777 53	3,777 53
Valleys.....	—	5,800 00*	2,400 00†	2,318 00‡	16,950 00
Government	6,432 00	Derived from the taxes paid by the Vaudois,
	22,415 56	18,205 34	4,008 00	12,860 71	57,519 61

⁴ Edict of 27th February, 1816, registered in office of the controller-general of the senate, and at the court of accounts, 1st March, 1816.

* For the schools.

† Collections made in the places of worship.

‡ Rents belonging to the hospital itself. These three sums are mere approximations.

Shortly afterwards, Victor Emmanuel, being now completely disabused of the prejudices which their enemies had sought to excite in his mind against the inhabitants of the valleys, consented to their resuming religious services in the place of worship at St. John, constructed in 1807, and closed in 1814.¹ At this period also a general census was taken of the Vaudois population.² Europe was tranquillized; Napoleon, having been vanquished at Waterloo,³ had died in St. Helena,⁴ after having added to the glory of his active life the austere dignity of exile. Social progress, which for a little while had been interrupted by these great commotions, had resumed its course, slow but steadily onward. Acts of oppression became more rare, the laws more regular: the hitherto unequal reign of a civilization which seemed to tremble for its existence became more tranquil as it widened its sphere. Perhaps, also, enlightenment as it became more diffused, lost something of its power. At all events, the surface of society became more level and uniform.

The Vaudois took no part in the political events of 1821, which led to the abdication of Victor Emmanuel IV. in favour of his brother, Charles Felix; but they appointed a deputation of courtesy to the new king, which was not received. He thought proper to acquaint them with the cause of this unkindness. "Tell them," he exclaimed, "that they only need to be Catholics."⁵ It was to acknowledge them as possessing many good qualities.

But the popular movement of 1821 had placed more power again in the hands of those who were inclined to use it for repression. The Protestants resident in Pignerol, received orders to remove from it within twenty-four hours,⁶ and it was only as a favour that they were permitted to remain.⁷ Opposition was made to their having a school in Turin;⁸ and if one of them happened to die beyond the limits of the valleys, his heirs had to pay

¹ This permission was granted, on condition that a wall should be built before the church, to conceal it from view. Instead of the wall, an inclosure of boards was allowed; and this having fallen into ruins, a simple porch was accepted as a substitute for it, hiding the entrance door of the building.

² On 6th Feb., 1816.—The following are the results:—Catholics, 4075; Protestants, 16,975; whole population, 21,050. According to a table published in the Echo of the Vallées, on 3d May, 1849, the Protestant population was at that period 20,650.

³ 18th June, 1815.

⁴ He died on 4th May, 1821.

⁵ Monastier, II., 209. These words recall a saying of Louis XIV. to Lesdiguières: "If you were not a Huguenot, I would make you a marshal of France." "Sire," was the reply, "it is enough that you deem me worthy of it." The noble delicacy of this reply needs no commentary, and could nowhere be called to remembrance in fitter connection than here.

⁶ BERT, Valdesi, p. 265.

⁷ On the representations of the ambassadors of Prussia and England.

⁸ BERT, Valdesi, p. 324.

500 francs to save his remains from the indignity of being thrown into a waste place for burial, and to obtain the right of removing them to an inclosed cemetery.¹

In 1828, a confidential circular was addressed to the notaries of the provinces of Saluces and Pignerol, to prevent them from receiving any deed which had for its object to convey into the hands of a Vandois any lands situated beyond the ancient limits.² Mixed marriages were also interdicted with more severity than before,³ and marriages contracted within too near degrees.⁴ The canons of Popery were again in the ascendant; reaction had for the moment triumphed over progress, the past over the future.

In 1833, it was prohibited, under pain of five or six years' imprisonment, to introduce into Piedmont, books, engravings, or any thing whatever, contrary to the principles of the Catholic religion, to morality, or to monarchy.⁵ After this, the governor of Pignerol received secret instructions, to keep watch over the too liberal tendencies of certain inhabitants of the valleys.⁶ But the governor at that time was a distinguished author,⁷ whose generosity of mind served the cause of the government better than excessive severity would have done. Having called before him the persons who had been particularly pointed out to him, he endeavoured, in the first place, to convince them of his sincere desire for their welfare, and in this character alone he gave them those counsels which had been suggested to him by a less benevolent solicitude.

¹ BERT, Valdesi, p. 326.

² This circular is dated 26th Nov., 1828. A decision of the Chamber of Accounts, 26th July, 1837, repeated this prohibition. The circular of 16th August, 1837, communicated it to the notaries.

³ Letters of the commandant of Pignerol of 6th February, and of 20th March, 1833. Report of the governor of Pignerol on this subject in 1843, &c.

⁴ Circular of the prefect of Pignerol to the moderator and ministers of the Vaudois church, to prohibit them from celebrating marriages between cousins-german. (The latter term is not precise.) The document is dated 15th July, 1835.

⁵ This prohibition is of date 20th May, 1833.

⁶ These instructions are of date, 12th November, 1834. In other instructions, dated 17th January, 1835, the following words occur:—"I ought to speak to you on this occasion of a historic work concerning the Vaudois, which has lately been published in Paris. . . . There may be observed in it, amongst other things, a very marked tendency to make Christianity serve as an instrument for promoting the chimera of the political perfectibility of men," &c. . . . This work was put into the Index, and its author obliged to leave his native country. By a royal ordinance of 16th August, 1840, he was enabled to return for three months; afterwards the proscription which had been pronounced against him was entirely removed; and at last permission to search the state archives in order to prepare the history which he had undertaken was granted to him, as if to compensate him in some sort for the severity of his previous treatment.

⁷ Albert Votta, a distinguished dramatic author. The King of Prussia bestowed on him the order of the Eagle, for the humane and impartial character of his administration in regard to the Vaudois.—(BERT, Valdesi, p. 269, note 2.)

The danger of an extension of the influence of the Vaudois, or even of their possessions, seemed especially to occupy the thoughts of their adversaries.¹ Numerous attempts at proselytism were also made at this period.² In 1841, a special intimation was addressed to the Protestants who possessed lands beyond the old limits, that they would have to dispose of them within a fixed time.³ The persons affected by this intimation addressed a petition to the government: and by a decision of the senate of Turin, they were authorized to retain those properties which had been acquired before the 17th of April, 1831, the period when Charles Albert had ascended the throne. A new petition was presented, in name of the proprietors whom the edict of dispossession still affected. They represented that the ancient limits were become too narrow for the increase of the population, and asked to be permitted to retain the lands which they had purchased beyond them. But no regard was paid to this petition, and the minister of the interior held by the decision of the senate.⁴

¹ It was, above all things, the influence of the Bible, which the Vaudois carried with them, which was feared. In 1826, a quantity of Bibles having been sent from Geneva to the Vaudois valleys, the Piedmontese government did not permit them to reach the hands of the pastors except on condition that these words should be written on each volume—Forbidden to be given, sold, or lent to Catholics.—(Methodist Magazine for the year 1833, p. 23.—See also BERT, Valdesi, p. 280.)

² Amongst the persons carried off from their friends, or induced to leave them in order to retire into Catholic establishments, was, in the year 1841, a young blind girl, the last descendant of the great Arnaud. "The greatest advantages are offered to a Vaudois who changes his religion; and if a Roman Catholic becomes a Protestant, he is condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Every religious journal, sent from abroad and addressed to a Vaudois, is retained at the post-office. Any Vaudois who may be convicted of lending his Bible to a Roman Catholic, is to be punished with imprisonment."—(Archives du Christianisme, second series, t. IX., p. 45.—See also BERT, Valdesi, pp. 235 and 293.)

At the same period, a pontifical bull, approved by a royal ordinance, authorized the establishment of a permanent mission in the valleys. "The bull bears that this establishment shall be composed at least of eight monks, having a superior and a steward, with a prebend of 16,000 francs a-year. Their vocation is to be that of missionary preachers, wherever they shall be required by the bishops, and especially amongst the Protestants of the valleys."—(Letters from the Vaudois valleys, of 18th November, 1848.) This establishment was placed under the patronage of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus. It took the name of the Priory of the Sacred Religion, and was erected at the gates of La Tour. "During the building of this convent and of its great church, the people of the valleys, full of uneasiness and anxiety, could not think without emotion of the intentions which it indicated." (Monastier, II., p. 215.) Hitherto, however, the monks resident there have shown much reserve and moderation. The dedication of this building took place on 23d September, 1844. I will speak of it farther on, because of some circumstances which then took place, reassuring for the Vaudois, and of the very different character which this ceremony thence received.

³ Two years for lands of two journals, and four for larger properties.

⁴ The petition is of date, 10th January, 1842, and the reply of 23d February.

The Vaudois Table presented another petition, and was in consequence permitted to draw up a special statistical report on the population of the valleys, to show that it was confined within insufficient limits. On its representations, supported by proofs and reasons, the proprietors of the lands purchased beyond the limits, since 1831, were individually authorized to retain them, but upon a special petition and permission in the case of each.¹

Since that time, the wise and liberal courses which the government of Charles Albert has pursued, always keeping pace with the progress of civilization and of the wants of his people, have caused the quiet disappearance of the vestiges of an antiquated system. To the generous views and perseverance of this illustrious monarch it is to be ascribed, that his reign afterwards became capable of being quoted as an example confirmatory of the great truth that reforms prevent revolutions.

At this period, proposals of emigration were made to the Vaudois, which they did not accept.—(BERT, Valdesi, 296, 297.) And the government itself gave secret instructions to its agents, on the subject of the mixed marriages and purchases of the Vaudois, that they should be left in peace, in spite of the solicitations of the Catholic party to the contrary effect.—(Echo des Vallées, second year, p. 142, quotation of M. Bert's work.)

¹ These various instigations were in great part owing to representations made by the British government to the court of Turin. Lord Aberdeen, amongst others took a warm interest in the Vaudois.—(See Report of the Vaudois Committee, for the year 1843, published by Murray in 1845, p. 16, paragraph 3.) Mr. Allen also exerted himself much in their favour.—(BERT, Valdesi, p. 261.)

CHAPTER XXIV.

RELIGIOUS REVIVAL, AND FOUNDATION OF VARIOUS INSTITUTIONS IN THE VAUDOIS VALLEYS.¹

(A.D. 1824 TO A.D. 1847.)

FELIX NEFF—THE HOSPITAL—THE COLLEGE—THE DISCIPLINE
—THE SCHOOLS—BECKWITH.

Circumstances providentially conspiring to preserve the unity of the Vaudois body—Felix Neff—Temporary separation of some zealous Christians from the general body of the Vaudois church—Revival of religion throughout the whole of that church—New and valuable institutions—Kindness of Christian friends—Vaudois hospital—Count de Waldburg Truchsess—General Beckwith—Schools founded by his exertions—Dr. Gilly—Code of Discipline—Confession of Faith—The Protestant congregation at Turin formally admitted as a Vaudois parish—Establishment of two new parishes, Macel and Rodoret—Other ecclesiastical arrangements—Collections for religious and charitable purposes—Bianqui's legacy.

WHEN society, in any country, undergoes a process of regeneration, it rarely happens but that all the elements of social existence are involved in it. Life cannot be transformed without a reaction on the sources of life, whence the religious sentiment proceeds; and this again cannot be elevated or lowered without a modification of everything that belongs to humanity. The corrupting breath of the eighteenth century had withered and dried up, so to speak, all the developments and manifestations of religion which it could reach: but religion was therefore only to start forth in new life, more independent, more spontaneous, and more evangelical.

¹ AUTHORITIES.—Acts of Synods of the Vaudois church, and Reports of the Table to these meetings.—Labours of the Vaudois Committee formed in London.—Sketch of the History and Present Situation of the Vaudois, by HUGH ACLAND: London, 1825 (in English).—JACKSON, Remarks on the Vaudois of Piedmont (same language): London, 1826.—On the Church Government of the Vaudois Churches of Piedmont, in German, by WEISS, Secretary to the Synod of Zurich, 1844 (of viii. and 76 pages).—A Tale of the Vaudois, &c. . . . by S. WEBB: London, 1842, 251 pages.—HENDERSON, The Vaudois, comprising Observations . . . in the Summer of 1844: London, 1845; viii. and 262 pages.—BAIRD, Sketch of Protestantism in Italy; Boston, 1845. (Treats of the Vaudois in the third part, Chaps. II.—VII.)—MAITLAND, Facts and Documents, . . . concerning the Waldenses and Albigenses; London, 1832.—WILLIAM SIME, History of the Waldenses from the Earliest Period . . . till the Present Time; Edinburgh, 1839, 3 vols. See vol. III.—TH. MAYERHOFF, Die Waldenser in unseren Tagen . . . with the Statistics of their Churches; Berlin, 1834.—SANTA ROSA, Histoire de la Révolution Piémontaise (of 1821); Paris, 1822.—PELLEGRIN, Exposé Historique de l'état des Vaudois dans les vallées du Piémont; Haarlem, 1824.—Notice sur l'état actuel des Eglises Vaudoises Protestantes des vallées du Piémont, suivie des ordonnances intolérantes rendues contre ces Chrétiens réformés, de leur pétition au roi de Sardaigne, et du tableau statistique des communes Vaudoises; Paris, 1822. Without author's name. Attributed to Charles Coquerel.—Mémoire Historico-Statistique sur les Vaudois . . . by Paul Appia. A manuscript communicated to me.—A Proposal to Establish Schools for the Education of the Female Children of the Waldenses, &c. A manuscript communicated to me. (It was proposed in this paper to found in the valleys

The unity of the Vaudois church had been providentially maintained by the very trials to which it had been subjected. Faith had been strengthened by persecutions; the spirit of a few martyrs had become that of a whole people. The orders issued in 1698 and in 1730, that all persons of foreign birth who had settled as inhabitants of the valleys should quit them, whilst they grievously afflicted the hearts of many, preserved more pure the Vaudois nationality: and the prohibition of mixed marriages prevented that small people from being absorbed or invaded by the greater numbers who surrounded them on all sides. Were not alliances with strangers very nearly the destruction of the people of Israel?

By the narrow limits within which the Vaudois were confined, they were preserved from the danger of being scattered far from the abodes of their religion, and perhaps of becoming infidel when they had forgotten it. The time approached when these barriers were to be removed. It could no longer be by mere external agencies that the unity of the body should be maintained in the Vaudois church. It was necessary that they should be succeeded by a living internal force: and God provided it.

A young officer of artillery exclaimed in a moment of distress, "O God! grant me the knowledge of thy truth, and be pleased to manifest thyself to my heart!" and thereafter, he resumed his studies and devoted himself to the ministry of the gospel. This youth was Felix Neff. Conducted by Providence to the midst of those deep retreats in which the Vaudois church had dwelt in the French Alps, he consecrated all his energies to the evangelization of their rude inhabitants, and gave his very life in this cause.

118 girls' schools, viz.—15 large schools, with salary of 250 francs; and 103 small ones, with salary of 75 francs. They were to have been maintained by voluntary contributions of five shillings. The project was not carried into effect, but the paper is interesting.)—I Valdesi, ossia i Christiani Cattolici seconda la chiesa primitiva . . . cenni storici, da A. Bert: Torino, 1849. This is one of the most important works which have hitherto been written on the modern history of the Vaudois.—Very interesting details on this subject will also be found in the Echo des Vallées. (This journal, ably conducted by Professor Meille, was established at La Tour in 1848. It is the first periodical publication which has appeared in the Vaudois valleys).—The foreign journals, which have treated of the affairs of the Vaudois at this period, may also be consulted with advantage. Likewise contemporary notes and letters.

"The dreadful and sublime aspect of this wilderness," he wrote from Dormilhouse,¹ "which served as a retreat for the truth, when almost all the world lay in darkness—the thought of all the martyrs who watered it with their blood—the deep caverns into which they went to read the holy Scriptures in secret, and to worship God in spirit and in truth—everything elevates the soul and inspires sentiments which it is difficult to express. But the inhabitants, morally and physically degenerate, remind the Christian that sin and death are the only things truly hereditary amongst the children of Adam."—"The work of an evangelist in the Alps," he says at another time,² "much resembles that of a missionary amongst savages; for the little civilization which he finds, is rather an obstacle to him than an assistance. Of all the valleys which I visit, that of Freyssinières is, in this respect, in the most backward state. Here everything is to be originated—education, house-building, agriculture."

But the generous pastor did not allow himself to be discouraged. At Dormilhouse the inhabitants were not accustomed to water their meadows; Neff said to them, "You do with these waters as you do with the waters of salvation: God sends you both the one and the other in abundance, and your meadows like your hearts, languish in drought." He taught them how to make their lands more productive: but his great desire was the quickening of their souls. "During these eight days," he writes, after the Passion week of 1825, "I have not had thirty hours of repose: no distinction has been made of day and night: before, after, and between the public services, there have been nothing but prayers and pious conversations."

In the following year, he visited the Vaudois valleys of Piedmont. "I shall not attempt," he says, "to describe the impression made upon me by the magnificent scene which presented itself to my view. The beauty of the vegetation in these valleys, strikingly contrasts with the aridity of the French Alps. The admiration excited by the rocks and glaciers which surround you, by these rich valleys which extend beneath your feet, and by the vast plains of Italy in the distance, raises the heart to the Lord. But the Vaudois have greatly degenerated, and many of them, without having made an outward change of religion, have departed farther from the faith of their fathers, than if they had become Catholics."³

This severe judgment did not prevent the most fervent charity.

¹ In January, 1824.

² March, 1825.

³ These last words are from a letter written from Geneva, 15th May, 1828, to the brethren of the Vaudois valleys of Piedmont.

Meetings for prayer were formed without the official circle of the church. Religious life thus began to separate itself from the habitual forms, under which the want of it is too often disguised. But the worldly raised an outcry: and these private meetings were denounced to the intendant of Pignerol, who addressed himself on this subject to the moderator. The moderator replied that they were according to evangelical right, and this reply put an end to the prosecutions which had been commenced: the intendant, however, recommended the members of these meetings to conduct them as quietly as possible, because they were contrary to the law of September, 1821.¹

Along with religious life, revived the zeal for good works which it produces. The Vaudois (those chiefly who attended the new meetings) sent the offering of their sympathies and their poverty to the missionaries who hazarded their lives for the propagation of the gospel. But human weakness always shows itself somehow in all things which take place among men. Upright in their hearts and rejoicing in the change of life to which Providence had called them—feeling also very strongly what a void was sometimes covered by the official forms of worship in the case of those who attended with indifference—a number of these Vaudois brethren did not hesitate to say that they had changed their religion. The Catholic party were delighted to hear it, supposing that they beheld a symptom of dissolution and of death in a phenomenon which was entirely one of regeneration and of life. The Vaudois, on the contrary, attached to the worship of their fathers, were grieved by these intestine divisions, embittered by ignorance and often fomented by pride. The special pastor of the little flock, which had withdrawn itself from the general fold, wrote a pamphlet entitled The Vaudois convicted of Heresy.² On both sides, charity had much need to vindicate her forgotten rights. But by the very commotion which arose from this want of moderation, many hidden chords were moved, a profound impression was produced, and a religious revival more durable and more general was the result. At the present day, the clergy of the Vaudois church are themselves to be found at the head of this movement: and the sectaries,³ if they still exist, appear as friends and not as dissenters.

¹ Methodist Magazine for the year 1833, p. 24.

² Published at Pignerol in 1836. With permission of the Episcopal grand-vicar. An 8vo pamphlet of fifty-eight pages. It was on 22d May, 1831, that the author of this work was elected as pastor of the Free church, and on the 15th May, that that body detached itself from the ancient Vaudois church.

³ There were, after this date, some who, without ceasing to take part in the religious meetings of their countrymen, and fully recognizing the integrity of the morals and doctrine of the pastors, withdrew themselves from the Vaudois communion for the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and awaited the uncertain visit

The solicitude of Christian souls, having thus been awakened for the spiritual welfare of the Vaudois, was at the same time more strongly drawn to their temporal wants. They were entitled to have physicians of their own religion, but the greater part of their sick had not the means necessary to follow out a course of medical treatment. The idea of erecting an hospital in the valleys, entered the minds of some generous persons.¹ "When its establishment," says M. Bert,² "was proposed to the synod,³ the execution of the project was regarded as almost impossible. Very soon after, everything concurred in the most wonderful manner to its success, although it required means far above our ability. His majesty, our august sovereign, was pleased to authorize the foundation of the hospital,⁴ and their excellencies, the representatives of the Protestant powers at Turin, opened up to us everywhere, by their recommendations, advantageous methods of attaining this object. We are, in particular, under the greatest obligations to his excellency the Count de Waldburg Truchsess.⁵ As soon as he knew that we were authorized to purchase the site designed for this institution, he sent us the sum necessary for that purpose; this being only part of a gift of 12,000 francs, which was made to the Vaudois, and placed at his disposal for our behoof by his majesty Alexander I., Emperor of Russia. This imperial gift was also an effect of the kind intercession of M. de Truchsess. We afterwards thought it necessary to appoint a deputy, to gather in the collections which were announced to us from abroad.⁶ . . . He set out in May, 1824; of some passing separatist pastor, of whom they often knew neither the morals, nor the living doctrine, to receive the communion from his hand, in a little chamber of their own. I know not how long this continued to be the case. But such details are too minute and inconsiderable to find a place amongst the great facts of history.

¹ The first manifest germ of it which I know of, appears in a correspondence, carried on at this period, between Madame Geymet and a Genevese professor (M. Chenevières).

² Report read to the synod held at La Tour, 16-18th September, 1823, by M. Bert, moderator (who was then succeeded by M. Rostaing, after having received the thanks of the meeting for his singularly able discharge of the duties of his office, as well as for his report).

³ Held at St. Germain, 26-28th August, 1823.

⁴ By royal letters-patent of 6th January, 1824.

⁵ Ambassador of Prussia, and the constant protector of the Vaudois. His remains repose amongst them, in the burying ground of La Tour, where they were deposited on 18th August, 1844, according to a wish which he had expressed. M. Amadeus Bert, son of the moderator whose report I have here quoted, delivered a funeral discourse of much talent, over the worthy ambassador. He has published the epitaph engraved on the tomb of Count de Truchsess, in I Valdesi, p. 482.

⁶ This deputy bore with him, besides his commission:—

I. A copy of the plan of the hospital (adopted by the synod of 1823), authentic—and went to Switzerland, Berlin, Paris, and England, from which he returned in 1826.¹ The Protestant colonies of Genoa, Turin, and Rome, likewise gave us proofs of their charity and their Christian sympathies.² But these partial succours would not have sufficed without the assistance of the governments to which it became the duty of our collector-deputy to address himself. Before his going to Switzerland the evangelical cantons of that country had already transmitted to his excellency the Count de Truchsess a very considerable sum, which was handed over as from them to our banker at Turin,³ as well as the amount of a collection made in Geneva; and after the departure of our deputy, these same governments permitted committees, voluntarily organized in each canton, to gather in the offerings which might be brought to them on our behalf. Similar committees were successively formed in a number of other countries.⁴ Our excellent compatriot, M. Paul Appia, pastor of the French church at Frankfort-on-the-Maine,⁵ travelled into the Low Countries,⁶ where his pious discourses inflamed still more a charity already ardent and well known. He produced the same effect in Paris, where the most eminent pastors of the church interested themselves in the cause which he advocated.⁷
VOL. II.

ated by the ministers plenipotentiary of Prussia, England, and the Netherlands, at the court of Turin, on the 16th, 20th, and 22d of May, 1824.

II. A copy of the decree of the intendant of Pignerol (caccia) dated, 10th January, 1824, and authorizing the projected institution, in virtue of the letters-patent of 6th January. This document was also authenticated.

III. Three letters of recommendation addressed by the ambassadors of Prussia, England, and the Netherlands, to all the legations of these powers in the different capitals of Europe; dated 22d, 24th, and 29th April, 1824.

IV. Similar letters from various bankers of Turin, Geneva, and Basle, addressed to their correspondents in the principal commercial towns of Europe.

This deputy everywhere met with a warm and generous reception.—I abstain from entering into further particulars concerning the manner in which he executed his commission.

¹ Holland, Sweden, and Denmark, contributed also much to this institution.

² Two collections were set on foot in Rome, in favour of the Vaudois hospital, one by the Rev. Mr. Hobard, an American bishop of the Anglican communion, and the other by Mr. Plenderleath, of Bristol, who had been present at the synod of 1823, in which the establishment of the hospital was proposed. Mr. Plenderleath published an English translation of the Romance poem La Nobla Leycezon, with a remarkable preface, on the state of the Vaudois (Bristol, 1825).

³ Joseph Malan, the present proprietor of the manufactory of Pra-la-Fera, at the entrance of the valley of La Tour. This is the most considerable manufacturing establishment in the valleys.

⁴ In Württemberg, Prussia, Holland, England, &c. The lists of their members would have been given here, if space had permitted.

⁵ It is to him that I am indebted for the various communications, so often quoted with his name, in the pages of the Israel of the Alps. He himself published a Notice sur les Vaudois.

⁶ In the autumn of 1825.

⁷ M. Ch. Coquerel had already published a Notice sur les Vaudois du Piémont,

At last, at the end of two years, we had the satisfaction of seeing our hospital founded, thanks to the charity of great and small, who vied with each other in contributing to this institution according to their ability. The kings of Great Britain, Prussia, and the Netherlands, did not disdain to place their august names on the list of subscribers. So many multiplied favours make us say with admiration and gratitude, 'This is the Lord's doing: it is marvellous in our eyes' (Ps. cxviii. 23). How much reason have we to bless the Lord? How much reason also to redouble our efforts to show ourselves worthy of such kindness? O, may we never give cause to think that we are undeserving of it!"¹

The accounts connected with this institution were afterwards submitted to the synod.² The regulations of the hospital were also approved.³ This institution was erected in the valley of Luan 8vo pamphlet of thirty-two pages, Paris, 1822.—Numerous publications in prose and verse appeared from 1824 to 1825, on the subject of the hospital. Some of them are noticed in the Bibliography.

¹ I ought to mention also a Vaudois, M. Pellegrin, then in Holland, who wrote an Abrégé de l'histoire des Vaudois, the sale of which, along with some gifts collected by the author, produced the sum of 2750 francs, 70 cents., in favour of the hospital.

² The following is an abstract of them:—

Sums received:—	Francs.	Cents.
From the Emperor of Russia.....	12,000	00
From various collections	69,670	92
Donations by individuals	1,397	10
Interest of these sums added to the capital (from 1823 to 1827)	21,207	21
Donations subsequently received	8,245	65
Collections in Sweden	29,812	00
	142,332	83

Outlay.—Purchase of the site; purchase of the furniture; expenses of the collector; building. (The exact sums are not set down under these heads; but the accounts having been presented to the synod, were found correct, within a trifle.)

Sums placed at interest, arising chiefly from collections made in the following countries, and from the gifts of their respective sovereigns:—

	Francs.	Francs.
In Prussia; capital	80,660	Interest 4083
In England.....	72,620	„ 3731
In Holland	57,000	„ 2950
	213,280	10,764

To this revenue of nearly 11,000 francs, destined to the support of the hospital at La Tour and the dispensary of Le Pomaret, must be added the rents of a very considerable estate, purchased in the valleys themselves, with the amount of the first sums indicated in this note, and serving for the endowment of the institution. (The revenues of the hospital in 1845 amounted to 14,070 francs.)

³ The following are the principal regulations:—

1. The institution to be governed by a committee of seven members, all serving gratuitously.
2. The treasurer to give security.
5. The committee to meet for business every three months.

cerna,¹ and a few years after, means were found for adding a supplementary one in that of St. Martin.²

At the same period, the Rev. Dr. Gilly, having drawn the attention of the English public to the Vaudois valleys, by his narrative of his journey thither in 1823,³ may be said to have become the founder of the college of the Holy Trinity, which was soon afterwards established at La Tour.⁴ A branch of this institution was

6. The committee to nominate all the officials of the hospital, and to manage its affairs, under the superintendence of the Table.

8. The Table, as representing the synod, to have the principal management and inspection of the hospital. The examination of the accounts submitted by the committee, to take place every two years at least.

9. The hospital to receive patients, in proportion to its means.

10. Not to admit those who are declared incurable, or those afflicted with shameful diseases.

11. If any patient, whilst in the hospital, shall be declared incurable, he cannot remain more than one year from the date of that declaration.

15. The papers demanded in order to the admission of a patient, shall be transmitted to the committee by the consistory of the parish in which he resides; these being, (1) a certificate of poverty, (2) one of good life and behaviour, (3) one by the medical attendant, stating the disease, (4) an extract of baptism.

16. When one or more vacant places shall be asked for at the same time by a greater number of patients, the most necessitous shall be preferred; and in case of the claims seeming equal, the most aged shall be admitted first.

(These regulations consist in all of nineteen articles. Experience has caused some of them to be slightly modified.)

¹ Between St. Marguerite and Les Copiers, above La Tour, in a healthy, airy, and quiet situation.

² At Le Pomaret.—In 1845, the hospital of La Tour had fourteen beds and that of Pomaret nine.

³ Narrative of an excursion to the mountains of Piedmont, and researches among the Vaudois or Waldenses, Protestant inhabitants of the Cottian Alps. London, 1824-25.—Dr. Gilly is one of the most copious and interesting of all the modern authors, who have taken up the subject of the Vaudois.—He himself owes his reputation and part of his fortune, as well as of his domestic happiness, to the works by which he directed to the Vaudois an attention and sympathies which ere long turned to himself. Having soon afterwards returned to the valleys, accompanied with his family, in 1828 or 1829, he published his new work, Waldensian Researches, during a second visit to the Waldenses of the Valleys of Piedmont. London, 1830.

⁴ The immediate possibility of this institution was owing to a single and anonymous donation of £5000 sterling, intrusted to the care and management of Dr. Gilly, and no doubt a result of the interest which the works of that eminent writer had excited in favour of the Vaudois.—The college of La Tour has four professors and a rector, who also acts as a professor; a sixth professor conducts the Latin school of Le Pomaret. "The salary of the masters in both institutions is 1500 francs annually. But two only of these salaries are perfectly secured; three others are only partially so, and one not at all. One gift of 2500 francs granted by the last minister, is all the assistance that public instruction amongst the Vaudois has ever received from the government." (Echo des Vallées, t. I., No. of 3d May, 1849, p. 175, note.)

The permission to erect the college, granted by the minister of the interior, on 23th May, 1831, is coupled with this condition that not more than fifteen students ere long founded in the valley of St. Martin,¹ and General Beckwith was one of those who took part in its establishment.²

To General Beckwith, in particular, the valleys are indebted for the erection or enlargement of 100 schools, as well as for the means of maintaining in them a system of education in harmony with all this advancement.³ Perseveringly surmounting all local obstacles, shall be admitted into it.—(BERT, I Valdesi, p. 277.) But this limit was passed, without any opposition being made to the extension. To the friendship of General Beckwith, the college owes its lecture hall and part of the books of its library. The library has also been enriched by the Vaudois committee of London and by gifts from private individuals.

¹ At Le Pomaret, where the branch hospital was already erected.—There is also the tomb of Peyrani, the erection of which has been ascribed to M. Sims, but must be regarded as ultimately owing to Dr. Gilly.

² Major General Beckwith is an Englishman. He was born on 2d October, 1789. He entered the army in June 1804, and obtained the rank of a major, for his services in Spain, in August, 1814. He was appointed a lieutenant-colonel at the battle of Waterloo, where he lost a limb (18th June, 1815). He has been present in twenty battles. He came to the valleys for the first time, in September, 1827. Since that period he has returned to them every year, and for the last ten years has scarcely ever left them.

³ The ameliorations which have been introduced into public instruction strike those, especially, who have not had opportunity of marking their progress from day to day. "If a Vaudois, long absent," says a recent writer, "were to return now to his native country, he would be filled with admiration at these improvements. 'Who,' he would say, 'is the magician, who, in so short a time, has contrived to effect so great a change?' And then he would be told of one of the finest instances of self-devotion which our times have seen; of a man who, leaving his country, his family, his friends, and all that is delightful in a life of opulence and an honourable position in society, came to spend his days in the obscure retirement of our mountains; and there, amidst difficulties of every kind, created on the one hand by the jealousy of a despotic and suspicious government, and on the other hand by the apathy of a people who had long been crushed by oppression, and were at first rather hostile than favourable to his views, has succeeded by his prudence, his talents, and his sacrifices, in accomplishing a work which was deemed impossible, and even in interesting in it the Vaudois people themselves, who now tax themselves to a considerable amount in order to carry it on." (Echo des Vallées, t. I., No. xi. p. 175.)—General Beckwith has caused 100 schools to be built or enlarged, almost entirely at his own expense. To this work, his countrymen say he has devoted £10,000 of his own fortune. (Report of the Vaudois Committee of London, in 1845.)—There are now (1848) in the valleys, fifteen parochial schools, to six of which there is attached a salary of 600 francs; one with a salary of 540 francs; four with 500; two with 400; and two with 300. The greater part of these schools are open during ten months of the year.—There are 129 district schools.—One commune alone has fifteen of them (Ville Sèche); two have twelve (Pral and Prarusting); one has eleven (Pomaret); and two have ten (Angrogna and Villar). That which has fewest is Rora, which has only four. These schools are only open in winter, and only for three or four months.—Their teachers receive a payment of 35 francs, which raises the cost of these two classes of schools to more than 12,000 francs annually.—Of these 12,000 francs, 9500 at least are borne by the Vaudois themselves; the rest comes from the Walloon committee, whose zeal for the good of our church continually increases. The total number of scholars, in the end of 1848, was 4517.

this eminent man has succeeded, within the space of a few years, in giving an entirely new impulse to the cause of primary education in this region. His opinion is, that the future effects of a Christian work will be proportionate to the influence which in the present time it exercises over the young. The future, he says with the feeling of a father, is all in the hands of the young. And devoting himself entirely to the reformation undertaken by his mighty charity, this resolute benefactor of the valleys has, with rare disinterestedness and tenderness, adopted the Vaudois family. He receives in return a tribute of much gratitude.

But even the interest which he takes in the Vaudois is to be gratefully referred to the works of Dr. Gilly, which did so much to make them known; and to him, in like manner, is to be ascribed the origin of the committee formed in London in 1825, on their sole behalf. This committee has constantly taken part in all the improvements which, since that time, have been effected in the valleys.¹

There are, moreover, six schools for girls and six infant schools, open during ten months of the year. The salary of the schoolmistresses varies from 300 to 400 francs.—Four out of six of these girls' schools are maintained at the expense of the London Committee; the other two by voluntary subscriptions. General Beckwith has also founded at La Tour (by permission of the minister, granted, 4th September, 1827) a special establishment for giving a higher education to young females.—He has also provided means for the greater part of the Vaudois teachers going to prepare themselves for their office, in the best normal schools of Switzerland.—(BERT, Valdesi, p. 308, 309, &c.) In December, 1848, he received from the Sardinian government the decoration of the order of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus (Ibid., p. 313.)

¹ The first meeting of this committee took place at London, 26th May, 1825, in the house of Sir Henry Rose. The Bishop of London, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester were present.—Amongst the authors who were members of it were Messrs. Gilly, Acland, Inglis, Hamilton, Sims, Harrison, Bridge, and Lowther. Most of these authors had devoted their pens to the maintenance of the interests of the Vaudois. The following is a sketch of the labours of the committee:—

(1.) The restitution of the royal English subsidies, amounting to £277 sterling annually. The origin of this fund is to be traced to a residue of the collections made in 1655.—After the departure of seven pastors from the valleys, who went to serve the Vaudois colonies in Germany, in 1689, and with the addition of a part of the funds of the Savoy Hospital in London, the annual proceeds amounted, in 1703, to 1250 francs. Several vicissitudes took place with regard to the sending of it. From 1804 to 1807 the interest of these funds accumulated in the Exchequer. In 1807, the British minister ordered the payment of them to be relinquished, because the valleys were then in the power of France. In 1814, the money began to be sent again, but much reduced in amount. The Vaudois committee presented a petition to the Earl of Liverpool, on 11th March, 1826, having for its object the complete restitution of these funds; and this was obtained, except the interest from 1797 to 1804, which had been otherwise disposed of.

(2.) It contributed to the establishment of the hospital and its dispensary, to which it annually gives assistance to the amount of £150 sterling.

(3.) It contributed to the foundation of the college of La Tour, to which it gives

More complete provision being thus gradually made for the public services of religion and for education, it became the duty of the ecclesiastical body of the valleys to give greater efficacy both to the system of discipline and to the confession of faith. The articles of the Discipline were scattered throughout a great number of synodal acts. One of the members of the Table¹ undertook to collect and classify them. He devoted two years to this work, the results of which were afterwards reviewed by all the members of the Table, and finally by the whole synod. In the acts of the synod of 1833,² we read that "The meeting, in terms of the eleventh article of the synod of 1828, having discussed seriatim all the articles of the draft of the code of Regulations or Ecclesiastical Discipline for the £20 per annum. The library of this college has also been enriched through the care of the committee. Ten bursaries, of 100 francs each, have been founded there for students. The committee also charged itself with the maintenance of three young Vaudois, who studied in England, in order to become professors at La Tour.

(4.) It allows 1000 francs to the Latin school of Le Pomaret.

(5.) The committee has contributed to the establishment of five girls' schools in the valleys, to which it allows an annual sum of £52 sterling.

(6.) The stipends of the two new parishes established at Macel and Rodoret, on the restitution of £15,000 sterling, obtained by the committee. The sum of £277 sterling (6983 francs, 17 cents, reduced by discount to 6800 francs), which the valleys have regularly received every year since 1827, is thus divided (Report of 1845, p. 8):—

	francs.
For the widows of pastors	400
For pastors emeriti (retired from active duty)	200
Expenses of moderatorship	300
For Macel and Rodoret (pastors' stipends)	2000
For the other pastors (supplement of stipends)	3900 being 300 francs to each.

(7.) The building of a place of worship and pastor's house at Rodoret. The former pastor's house was destroyed (in 1842) by an avalanche, which buried under the ruins the pastor (M. Buffa), with his wife and child.

(8.) The committee has contributed to the establishment of a place of shelter for the Protestants of Turin.

(9.) It has also contributed to the publication of the Vaudois Liturgy (a large and beautiful 4to of 211 pages, from the press of Andrew Shortrede, Edinburgh, 1837), of the Gospel according to St. John, translated into the vernacular dialect of the valleys (London, 1832) by M. Bert, with the assistance of some of his colleagues; and of the New Testament in the Piedmontese idiom (London, 1833). The latter work has been placed in the Index. The author of this translation was, I believe, M. Caesar Geymet, and General Beckwith bore the principal part of the expense of the impression. The Bible Society of London, likewise, contributed to some of these publications.

¹ This was my venerable father, the late Mr. George Muston, then pastor at Bobi, and moderator-adjoint of the Vaudois churches. "More than any one else," says M. Bert, in his report to the synod of 1828, "he has contributed to the accomplishment of this work, by his zeal and activity." It was he also who proposed this draft, as appears from the eleventh article of the synod of 1828.

² Held at St. Germain, 3d to 5th December; article XXI.

valleys, adopts that code, and declares it to be in force from this day."¹

According to this official document, "the evangelical Vaudois church of the valleys of Piedmont is ONE; and it receives and professes for the only rule of its faith the doctrines contained in the Old and New Testaments. (§ i.)

"It regards the Confession of Faith published in these valleys in 1655² . . . as a true compendium and pure interpretation of the fundamental doctrines of the Bible." (§ ii.)

¹ It is divided into seven chapters, containing in all 269 articles, which received some modifications in the synod of 1839. The following is an outline of its contents:—Chap. I. OF THE CHURCH (23 articles).—II. OF SYNODS (containing articles 29-63).—III. OF THE TABLE (articles 68-89).—IV. OF THE PASTORS (articles 90-123). This chapter contains also the following sections:—B. Of Emeritation. "Emeritation is the power which the pastors have of retiring from the service of the Vaudois church with a retiring pension, which they enjoy during the rest of their life" (art. 124). "This pension is made up of contributions from the communes, contributions from the pastors, those of the Walloon committee (Holland), and funds taken before other distribution from the Royal English subsidy" (art. 123). C. Widowhood. Of the wives of pastors (article 134-138). D. Of the chaplain and professors or ecclesiastical rectors (art. 132-144). By the chaplain is meant the pastor supplying the Protestant chapel at Turin, in the service and under the protection of the Dutch, Prussian, and English legations.—V. OF THE CONSISTORIES (art. 145-170).—VI. OF THE CEREMONIES OF THE CHURCH. A. Of the Sacraments (art. 173-183). B. Confirmation of the Baptismal Vow (art. 186-189). C. Of Marriages (art. 190-209). D. Of Public Fasts (art. 210-12). E. Sanctification of the Sabbath (art. 213-215). F. Ex-communication (art. 216-220).—VII. OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION (art. 221-252). Students (art. 253-269). This relates to those who propose to devote themselves to the holy ministry.—I regret that want of space prevents me from quoting a greater number of the excellent regulations of this book of discipline.

² This article was added by the synod of 1839. But these words are not sufficient to determine the text of the Confession of Faith intended; for in 1655, there was no Confession of Faith published, neither official nor private, in the Vaudois valleys. I have reason to believe, however, that the Confession intended was that published by Léger in 1669. (Part I. chap. xvii. pp. 112-114.) It was adopted by the synod of 1839, upon these words of the moderator, "Pastors and deputies, are you resolved to be faithful to the faith of your fathers as expressed in this Confession?" (Private letter of the editor of the Echo des Vallées, dated from La Tour, 15th March, 1850.) The affirmative response cannot be doubted. A critical examination of history has since brought out the fact that this Confession of Faith did not emanate from the Vaudois church. (See in the Bibliography of the Israel of the Alps, Part I. § ii. No. 2), and that it did not accord with the ancient doctrine of the Vaudois (same Bibliography, Part III. chap. i. No. 12).

The synod of 1839 is not responsible for these errors, for the laws then in force prohibited the consideration of questions of doctrine in such meetings, and so the Confession of 1655 was neither made the subject of debate nor of examination. Each pastor might, no doubt, have previously made it known to his congregation, and might have devoted himself to serious study beforehand on a question of such importance, that it might never be suspected that, in the vote approving of this Confession of Faith, the synod was taken by surprise; but all this the Vaudois pastors were not even put in a condition to do. The committee, which was looked

"The Vaudois church ordains its own ministers." (§ iv.)

Its parishes are divided into two classes. (§ vii.)

The translations of pastors take place according to a fixed order. (§§ viii.—xvi.)

"Any appointment of a pastor, made" (by a parish) "in accordance with the established rules, cannot be annulled either by the Table or by the synod." (§ xviii.)

"The deputies to the synod are taken either from the parish which deposes them, or not, but they must be Vaudois." (§ xxiv.) —The election of these deputies is by ballot, and by universal suffrage. (§ xxv.)—This has always been the mode of election in the Vaudois church.

"The synods are held alternately in the valley of Lucerna and in that of Saint Martin. The place of meeting is always appointed by the previous synod." (§§ xli., xlii.)

The sitting is opened with prayer; provision is made for vacant parishes; the Table reads a report of its proceedings; the meeting names a committee to examine the accounts, after which it pro-upon as having performed this examination, had not even the right to take that first step, for it had been appointed to occupy itself with the subject of a system of discipline, and not with that of a Confession of Faith. Finally, its examination was ill performed; for the opinions which it advanced as to the origin and doctrines of this Confession are completely erroneous. The doctrine established by this disputed formulary is that of Predestination. It is followed by a protestation against fifteen heads of heterodoxy, which the confessionists are accused of establishing by this doctrine (Léger, Part I. ch. xvii. pp. 115, 116), such, for example, as "that in virtue of Predestination it matters little whether a man does good or ill" (art. 6), and that the salvation or damnation of each man being determined before his birth, "he contributes nothing more to it, do what he may, than a piece of wood or a stone (art. 5). "We hold," say they, "all these heads of doctrine to be heretical and damnable, and, with all our heart, we pronounce an ANATHEMA against any who may maintain them" (Léger, Part I. ch. xvii. p. 116). —This is the way in which Rome has been accustomed to reply to arguments, but it is not the language of the ancient Vaudois. "To know the Vaudois church aright," said the late venerable pastor Appia, "we must look upon it as it was before the Reformation. Its aspect then was not yet deformed by Calvinistic professions of faith. It was not a happy day for it, when the colossal but dialectic genius of Calvin drew it into its vortex, and when he imprinted upon it the marks of his vigorous but harsh chisel. I love rather to think of our Barbas, reciting their passages of the Bible in caverns or in the open air. . . . O! why could not the evangelical Christians of our valleys be left to remain in their humility the same that they were before the deluge of controversies, men of the Bible, of sacred songs, of prayer, and of self-sacrifice, poor in spirit! for to such belongs the kingdom of God." (Letter of M. Paul Appia, pastor at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, dated from that city, 4th March, 1842.)—See, on the same subject, in the Bibliography at the end of this volume, Part III. chap. i. No. 12.

¹ The passages in inverted commas, are exactly copied from the Discipline; those which are not in inverted commas have been subjected to changes of expression, so that they only give in an abridged form the meaning of the articles cited, as much as seemed appropriate to the purpose of this Work.

ceeds to the appointment of a new Table; and the new moderator takes the chair in the synod.¹ (§§ xliii–xliv.)

“The meeting cannot reconsider a resolution deliberately adopted in the synod, except upon the demand of two-thirds of the voters.” (§ lvii.)

An authenticated copy of the Acts of the Synod is transmitted to each pastor, and it is his duty to read it in public, and to preserve it in the archives of his parish. (§ lxviii.)

“The Table, appointed by the synod, is the administrative and permanent authority of the Vaudois church from one synod to another; it is composed of five members, of whom three are ecclesiastics² and two are laymen.” (§ lxix.)—“It keeps a record of all its proceedings.” (§ lxxxviii.)

“The members of the Table meet not at fixed times, but whenever the general interests of the church, or the particular interests of parishes, require it.” (§ lxxiii.)

It takes part, by one of its members deputed for the purpose, in the annual examinations of the students of the college and pupils of the Latin school; also in the meetings for competition for academic bursaries. (§ lxxxi., lxxxii.)—It makes pastoral visitations. “The object of the pastoral visitation is the examination of the accounts, registers, and records of each parish. Cognizance is taken of its religious and moral condition. If any disputes exist, an attempt is made to effect a reconciliation. This visitation is preceded by Divine service. The result of the inspection is engrossed in the records of the parish, and in those of the Table.” (§ lxxxvii.)

“When a pastor is sick, his parish is supplied, once a fortnight, by the other pastors in turn.” (§ ex.)

The flock in any parish, as well as its pastor, can appeal to the synod from any decision of the Table, which, however, in the meantime takes effect. (§ cxvii.)

“Each parish has a consistory, which is composed of the pastor, as many elders as there are districts [quartiers] in the parish, the deacon or treasurer, and the procurator of the poor.”³ (§ cxlv.)

“No one may fill the office of elder, who has not completed twenty-five years of age,—who is not known as a man of good morals,—who cannot deliver in person the written documents connected with his office,—who partakes in the assistance granted by the consistory to the poor of the commune,—who keeps a public-house,—

¹ The synods are to be held, as of course, once every five years, and more frequently if there is need.

² The moderator, the moderator-adjoint, and the secretary.

³ This latter office has not been established in all the parishes.

who does not reside within his district,—or who stands in the relationship of father, son, or brother, to any member of the consistory.” (§ cl.)

The election of an elder takes place by ballot, by the heads of families in the vacant district. Each voter's paper bears three names. If from all these papers three names are obtained, having the absolute majority of votes, these three names form what is called the rose of the district [la rose du quartier]. “Next Sabbath, the pastor presents to the consistory the minute of these proceedings, and from amongst the three candidates who form the rose, the consistory appoint the one whom they deem most fit to fill the office of elder.” (§ cli.)

“Each elder is required to watch over his district, to make known to the consistory the necessitous poor,—to visit and console the sick,—to reconcile persons who are at variance,—to repress scandals,—to assist the pastor in the distribution of the Lord's Supper,—to take part in the deliberations of the consistory, and to vote in it,” &c. (§ cliv.)

“The money allotted for the support of the poor can only be distributed by the deacon, on the written request of the pastor, founded upon a resolution of the consistory.” (§ clxi.) “The consistory shall annually inform the congregation, by a report with explanations, concerning the receipt and expenditure of the poor's money.” (§ clxx.)

There is a parochial school in each parish, called the great school, and there are also district schools. (§ ccxxi.)

“No one shall be appointed regent or teacher of the great school, who is not furnished with a certificate from the Table of his ability and moral character, and such certificate shall be available only for one year.” (§ ccxxiii.)

“The regent of a great school is required, besides his duties in the school, to perform the church service in the reading of the Holy Scriptures, and in conducting the singing; also in conducting the evening and morning prayers daily throughout the week, and to read the funeral service when the pastor shall be prevented from so doing.” (§ ccxxxiii.)

“The teacher of a district school is required, besides his duties in the school, to conduct prayer in his district every Sabbath about two o'clock in the afternoon, during the period of his teaching.” (§ ccxxxii.)

“Each consistory is required to draw up an annual report of the state of the schools of the parish, and to transmit it to the Table, in course of the month of March.” (§ ccxliii.)

“The choice of the academies in which a Vaudois student proposes to study for the holy ministry, in the service of his native country, must be approved by the Table.” (§ ccliv.)¹

The little Protestant congregation of Turin, which was founded as a ministerial charge in 1827,² under the name of the Chapel of the Protestant Legations, was annexed twenty-two years after, to the ecclesiastical body of the valleys. “The Vaudois residing in Turin, along with the great majority of the Swiss settled there, addressed to the administrative authority of the Vaudois church a petition for incorporation,³ to which that authority most gladly gave a favourable reply, the rights of the synod being reserved. In consequence of this resolution, a deputation of the Table proceeded to the capital, where, on Sabbath, 29th July (1849), after a fervent sermon by the moderator, from the words, Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty,⁴ the congregation of Turin was declared to be a parish of the Vaudois church, and was asked to constitute itself a parish accordingly, in terms of the regulations of that church, which was immediately done.”⁵

The number of parishes in the valleys was also augmented. From 1686 to 1829 there had been only thirteen. At that period, the interest of the arrears of the English royal subsidy, the payment of which to the Vaudois church was obtained by the London committee, and in particular by Dr. Gilly, enabled the church to provide stipends for two new pastors. But the rescripts of 1730 and 1740,⁶ which had been brought into force again by the Restoration, prohibited the Vaudois from increasing the number of their places of worship, and implicitly also from increasing that of their pastors. However, advantage was taken of the circumstance that there were no express words limiting the number of the latter; and as there were two places of worship in many parishes, a colleague, with the title of substitute, was given to the pastor who supplied them. Macel was thus detached from the parish of Maneille, and

¹ At the end of this Discipline are the words “Done and concluded at St. John, in the synodal assembly held there on 20th April, 1839.”

² On 27th June, 1827, the Prussian ambassador, the Count De Waldbourg Truchsess, wrote to the Table, to request the services of a Vaudois pastor as chaplain; and by a resolution of 6th July, 1827, M. Bonjour was appointed to that office, in which he was succeeded by M. A. Bert, in 1834.

³ 1st July, 1849.

⁴ 1 Cor. iii. 17.

⁵ Extracted from the ECHO OF THE VALLEYS, a monthly paper, specially devoted to the interests of the Vaudois family. Second year, No. for 6th Sept., 1849, p. 44.—This paper, established and ably conducted by the Rev. M. Meille, is the first journal ever published in the valleys.

⁶ The documents here referred to were mere instructions founded upon anterior edicts, which are quoted in them.

Rodoret from that of Pral. These two districts, each shut in by high mountains, were in reality too extensive to be adequately served by one pastor.

The introduction of lay members into the administrative body of the Vaudois church dates only from 1823. "Until that date," says M. Bert,¹ "the laity not being permitted to take any part in the affairs of the valleys, viewed with some measure of distrust the way in which they were conducted by a Table entirely ecclesiastical. On the other hand, the pastors, whom the very suspicious of the laity made to regard them with an unfavourable eye, thought it their duty and their interest to cherish amongst themselves an exclusive feeling, keeping the laity at a distance, in order to be independent of them. Thus, unhappily, from the want of a good understanding between them, they inflicted mutual injury upon one another." Since each valley has had its lay representative admitted to the deliberations of the Table, by the unanimous decision of the synod of 1823, the union has become more intimate between the pastors and their flocks; and the mutual confidence between those in whose hands the administrative power is vested and those amongst whom it is exercised, has become more firm, more thoroughly based upon grounds of knowledge, and therefore more powerful for the promotion of their common interests. The right management of affairs, instead of being impeded, has been much promoted; the records of the Table have been much more regularly kept; the wants of the valleys have been better known; benefactions have been more felt, and benefactors more appreciated.

Fraternal conferences of all the Vaudois pastors take place every year; in spring, in one of the two valleys; in autumn, in the other. The pastors of the same valley also hold meetings by themselves [colloques] in each other's houses. A school has been established for the special purpose of training young teachers for the work of teaching;² and the schoolmasters in actual employment have recently been called upon to attend a course of the Italian language, in preparation for which three professors of the college of the Trinity have been sent to Tuscany.³ The library of that college has been rapidly enriched, and the records of the valleys are henceforth to be deposited in it. Thus, everything concurs to give greater completeness to the measures of organization and improvement, which seem to secure the future prosperity of the Vaudois church.

¹ Report to the synod of 1823.

² Report of M. Bert to the synod of 1823. (Near the end.)

³ Before 1630, the national language of the Vaudois was the Italian. In this language Gilles commenced the writing of his history. The plague, which visited the valleys in 1630, having deprived the Vaudois church of fifteen pastors out of seventeen, it was found necessary to bring pastors from Geneva; and these making use of the French language in their preaching, it came gradually to predominate. Since 1843, an endeavour has been made to restore in the valleys the use of Italian.

Constantly receiving the most generous assistance from their brethren in religion in foreign countries, the Vaudois have in their turn acknowledged the obligation of contributing their mite out of their poverty, along with the riches of their prayers, to their benefactors in times of necessity. "Gentlemen," said the commissioners of the Walloon churches to those by whom they were appointed,¹ "when the news of the inundations which afflicted some of our provinces last winter came to the knowledge of our Vaudois brethren, it caused amongst them a general consternation and affliction, inso-much that the directors of their churches immediately appointed a day to be observed as a day of humiliation and prayer, which was kept with remarkable devotion on the 27th of March last. Shortly after, on the request of M. Van der Hoeven, the minister of his majesty our king at the court of Turin, a general collection was made in the valleys for the behoof of our countrymen who were ruined by the calamity. This collection, recommended by the thirteen Vaudois pastors, has amounted to the sum of 4301 francs and some sous—a prodigious sum for a people so poor, and this after a season by no means favourable, and an imperfect harvest. And since that time, our Vaudois correspondents, notwithstanding their wants, have had the delicacy of feeling to ask nothing from us. Touched by this considerateness, we recommend their interests all the more earnestly to your regard," &c. Collections and contributions at the same time multiplied in the valleys in favour of Bible societies, missions, and benevolent institutions of various kinds.²

But whilst the Vaudois in their own country remembered the foreigners who manifested so much interest in them, those of them also who were in foreign countries did not forget their native land. A Vaudois, named Bianquis, who died in London, where he had filled the situation of a domestic servant, left his little fortune to the parish of La Tour, to be employed in the education of a few poor children.³ He had been poor himself, and he knew the value of education. Now that its blessings are so abundantly offered to his countrymen, may the Vaudois youth have grace to profit by them, for "he that refuseth instruction," the Bible says, "despiseth his own soul."¹ Many generous strangers have provided, in different instances, for the education of young persons in our valleys, whom lively sympathies have led them to take under their charge. The silence in which such noble actions are concealed is the purest halo of glory around them. To betray the modesty in which they are performed would be to take away the bloom and freshness of their beauty.

¹ In a report presented to the meeting of pastors at Leyden, 13th August, 1825.

² The collection in favour of evangelical missions, which is annually made in the Vaudois church, yielded, for employment in 1848-49, a sum of 1203 francs 90 cents. (Note extracted from the Echo of the Valleys. T. i., p. 162.)

³ With the produce of what M. Bianquis left, a property at Les Braïdes was purchased. This small estate yields about 450 francs annually, a sum sufficient for six poor children, who thus receive from 75 to 80 francs annually to facilitate their education.

It now remains to show, in the following chapter, the wisely progressive course, directed by a constant increase of favourable feeling towards the Vaudois, which the Piedmontese government has pursued in order to their emancipation.

CHAPTER XXV.

CIVIL AND POLITICAL EMANCIPATION OF THE VAUDOIS DURING THE REIGN OF CHARLES ALBERT.²

(A.D. 1847 TO A.D. 1850.)

The political changes in the kingdom of Sardinia were begun before the revolutionary explosion of 1848—Change of tactics on the part of the Popish clergy, upon the change of policy by the government—Polemical pastorals and other controversial publications—Charles Albert visits the valleys in 1844.—His generous confidence in the Vaudois, and enthusiastic reception by them—Demonstrations of the gratitude of the Vaudois to General Beckwith—Amelioration of their political condition—The Marquis d'Azeglio—The Statute, or Constitutional Charter of the kingdom of Sardinia, 8th February, 1848—Admission of the Vaudois to all the civil privileges of their countrymen, 17th February, 1848—Great rejoicings—French Revolution of 1848—Consequent revolutions and wars in Italy—Defeat, abdication, and death of Charles Albert—Charles Emmanuel V. succeeds to the crown—Present state of the Vaudois.

AFTER the great political movements of 1848, it is not wonderful that from the shaken thrones there have at length fallen on the people of more than one country a few blessings of liberty; and, in this point of view, the civil and political emancipation of the Vaudois, of which we are now to speak, might have been regarded as merely an ordinary event, had it not been for the remarkable circumstance that the King of Sardinia had of his own accord engaged in the liberal course, now to be described, long before the revolutionary explosion of 1848. He had even emancipated the Vaudois, and given a constitution to his people, before the republic was proclaimed in France; and consequently without constraint, without external pressure, but under the influence solely of a generous heart and an exalted mind.

¹ Prov. xv. 32.

² AUTHORITIES.—I Valdesi cenni storici da A. Bert, Chapters XIII. and XIV.—Monastier, t. II., chap. xxvii.—L'Echo des Vallées Vaudoises.—Private Letters.—Official Documents.

We have already seen, in the end of the chapter which treats of the State of the Vaudois under the Restoration, that the rigour of the ancient edicts was softened by the personal acts of the sovereign. These edicts, formally maintained, fell into practical disuse—an indication of the growing strength of the government and the progress of new institutions.

“The Romish clergy,” says M. Monastier, “also changed their tactics in the prosecution of their old contest with the Vaudois church. Violence or oppression being no longer in accordance with the spirit of the age, they had recourse to a kind of means already often employed in previous times—viz., discussion; but giving it a milder form, that of pastoral letters. The Bishop of Pignerol, Monseigneur Bigex, was intrusted with the conduct of it. His mandatories, which were very well written, combined all the qualities requisite for success, if the number and arrangement of the arguments, and skilfulness in the presentation of them, could have compensated for the essential weakness of the cause. The appearance of the first of these pastorals¹ caused a general excitement among the Vaudois, whether by reason of the novelty of the thing, or through fear of its consequences. However, they were soon satisfied that, where the Spirit of God breathes, the spirit of Rome is not able to lead men’s minds astray. A number of pastors thought it their duty to reply to these mandatories. They did so by manuscript refutations of them, which, being often copied, circulated from family to family.² The seriousness of some of these, and the excellent selection of their arguments, was a contrast to the rather too flippant tone of some others. This war of the pen, briskly carried on for a time, came to an end without any other result than the noise which it made. It has been attempted anew, but without success, by the bishops who have succeeded Monseigneur Bigex—especially by Monseigneur Charvaz, in a considerable number of pastorals and other writings, ably composed, and in which erudition is with much ingenuity devoted to the advocacy of error. By these publications, printed and circulated in Piedmont and elsewhere, it was attempted to change the current of opinion."¹

¹ In 1818.

² Those of MM. Geymet, Peyrani, and Mondon, attracted particular attention.

But public opinion, on the contrary, seemed more and more to incline to the side of the Vaudois. Charles Albert himself felt its influence. "In his capacity of grand-master of the order of Saint Maurice and Saint Lazarus, he consented, in 1844, to attend at the dedication of the place of worship of the new congregation established in La Tour, under the patronage of the saints above named. Orders had already been given to prepare lodgings at La Tour for the troops of the line, which were to serve as the guard of his majesty. Gloomy apprehensions quickly arose in many hearts; but all at once it was intimated that the king had caused his troops to return, saying, 'I have no need of a guard amongst the Vaudois.' And, in fact, the squadrons of royal carabineers, which had been destined to serve as an escort for the sovereign, turned back again to Pignerol. The Marquises of Lucerna and Angrogna had suggested to Charles Albert that he should be received by the Vaudois troops themselves, and, although he came for a perfectly Catholic ceremony, this offer was agreed to.

"All the able-bodied men of the valley of Lucerna, of Angrogna, and of Prarusting, under arms, lined the path for the passage of the king, who, amidst solemn silence, went to the new Romish erection to worship. Meanwhile the Vaudois troops proceeded to the Lucerna road, and greeted Charles Albert on his return with enthusiastic shouts of joy. The king, touched by so cordial a reception, stationed himself in the entrance of the gate of the palace of Lucerna, and caused the Vaudois companies to defile before him in parade, according to their communes, and with their banners. He saluted each standard, and all could see the pleasant smile which played upon his lips when some ensign, not contented with inclining his banner before his sovereign, saluted him also afterwards with his hat. The officers of the Vaudois Table presented themselves before his majesty in their turn, and were highly gratified by the very favourable manner in which they were received. Charles Albert, devoting himself for the time entirely to the people of the valleys, refused to receive any other deputation. Before quitting the valleys, he sent to the syndic of La Tour very liberal alms for the poor of both communions; and when he set out again on his return to Turin, he could see a circle of bonfires, like a brilliant diadem, kindled on our mountains to express the gladness to which his visit had given birth."¹ "I shall never forget," said Charles Albert, "these testimonies of affection which have exhibited to me, in the heart of the Vaudois, the same devotedness to the throne of Savoy which in former times their ancestors signally displayed."² He caused a little monumental fountain to be erected at the entry of the town of La Tour, with this inscription:—"IL RE CARLO ALBERTO, AL POPOLO CHE L'ACCOGLIEVA CON TANTO AFFETTO. MDCCCXLV."³ Thus the opening of an institution hostile to the Vaudois church, instead of verifying the apprehensions which had arisen with regard to it, brought the Vaudois new assurance of prosperity under the high protection of the head of the state.

¹ Monastier, II., 207, 208. The principal publications of the bishop here referred to are—Recherches historiques sur l'origine des Vaudois . . . one vol. 8vo; Paris, 1836; and Guide du Catéchumène Vaudois . . . 3 vols. 18mo, 1840–1842. Some pamphlets, of which I refrain from giving the titles, were also published during his prelacy. "I believe they are more injurious," says a letter from the valleys, "to the dignity of the episcopate by which they have been sanctioned, than to the reputation of the Vaudois which they attempt to blacken."—(Letter of 5th September, 1846.)

"The decoration of the order of Saint Maurice and Saint Lazarus was afterwards bestowed upon General Beckwith, as the benefactor of the Vaudois.⁴ When we consider that it was the same man whom a bishop, in an article in a journal, had not scrupled to call the 'adventurer with the wooden leg,' and whom low intrigues had more than once almost succeeded in expelling from the country, upon account of the enlightenment which he was instrumental in producing, we feel that our institutions have indeed undergone a change."⁵ But, as he himself once said, addressing the Vaudois, "If there be but one man who knows what is right, it is enough to make it prevail over a whole nation; and if your humble ancestors, patient and persevering, preserved intact the true rule of faith, and transmitted it from age to age, they present in this an example which you have only to follow. . . . Unite yourselves again more closely together; act, as you have done from the commencement of all that has taken place, with good feeling, with moderation, forgetting past injuries, and be assured that you will be nobly recompensed. . . . Your church is well organized; public educa-

¹ Monastier, II., 215-217.

² La universal gioja in piu modi manifestata, i sensi di reverenza e di affetto, spiranti da quei volti, tutto ci manifestava che non mai vennero meno in quei petti, l'amore e la devozione al trono Sabaudi, per cui i loro Maggiori si resero, in difficili tempi, segnalati. Extract from the royal brevet of knight of the order of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus, accorded to the syndic of La Tour (M. Combe, a member of the Vaudois church), by Charles Albert, 11th October, 1844.

³ The King Charles Albert, to the people who welcomed him with so much affection, 1845.

⁴ In December, 1848.

⁵ L'Echo des Vallées, January, 1849, p. 116.

tion is doing its work amongst you; direct your attention particularly to your district schools; the welfare of your children depends in great part on their efficiency. In these nurseries are sown the first seeds of those great truths unknown to Socrates and to Plato, . . . of that theology which is capable of saving a world!"¹

Colonel Beckwith² enjoyed also, in these his beloved valleys, the "rare privilege of seeing that his works followed him, appreciated by all, and everywhere recompensed by the most delightful tributes which public respect and affection could offer. 'Let the name of Colonel Beckwith be blessed by all who pass this way,' says an inscription placed upon one of the numerous schools opened through his efforts and generosity. The whole country silently responds to the sentiment."³ In 1842, the schoolmasters of the two valleys, and the professors of the various important educational institutions patronized by this illustrious philanthropist, assembled to hold a festival together on the summit of La Vachère, a mountain centrally situated amongst their various stations. They began by singing hymns, and after fraternizing with one another in the expression of the Christian and patriotic hopes which were excited in their minds both by the love of the gospel and by the love of their country, they returned, each bearing a branch of the laurel of the Alps,⁴ in remembrance of that occasion. At the gates of La Tour, they took a flower from each branch, of which they formed a bouquet, and came in a body to present it to their venerable patron.⁵ These spontaneous expressions of affection and gratitude to their noble benefactor have been often repeated on the part of the Vaudois.⁶

Towards the end of 1847, the social and political reforms long contemplated by the Piedmontese government began to be carried

¹ Letter of Major-General Beckwith to the Moderator of the Vaudois church, dated from La Tour, 28th August, 1848. The object of this letter was, on the part of the general, to acknowledge to the representatives of the Vaudois church the public expression of gratitude to him for his numerous benefactions, which had been unanimously adopted by the synod, of 1st-4th August.—(Echo des Vallées, I., 60.)

² The title which is habitually given to him in the valleys.

³ La Réformation au dix-neuvième siècle. A journal quoted in the Echo des Vallées, I., 103.

⁴ Rhododendron ferrugineum. The Vaudois mountains produce a kind of rhododendron not described by botanists. Instead of having the leaves brown and rusty beneath, it has them smooth and olive-green. Perhaps it is only a variety, or an accidental variation. It is found on the mountain of Brouard; and was discovered by a young botanist of the valleys, M. Edward Rostan.

⁵ Letters written from the Vaudois valleys.—September, 1842.

⁶ The Agricultural Society (Congrès Agricole) of Piedmont expressed the public sentiment in returning thanks to General Beckwith, by a letter dated 25th August, 1847, for the interest taken by him in the valleys.—(BERT, p. 312.)

into effect. A reform in the courts of law, by the substitution of oral for written proceedings, the introduction of trial by jury, and the suppression of exceptional tribunals, afforded to all concerned new securities for impartiality. On the 22d of November, 1847, the organic law of the councils of communes and provinces was promulgated, containing no restriction on the election of the Vaudois inhabitants. The formation of national guards speedily followed this new step of progress.

The Marquis D'Azeglio, who was afterwards minister, then placed his name at the head of the signatures to a petition addressed to the sovereign for the civil emancipation of the Vaudois and the Jews.¹ In order to this, he also addressed a circular to all the bishops of the kingdom, to obtain their opinion on the measure in the first place,² and it is due to them to state that a number of them expressed themselves in favour of it.³ The generous marquis next addressed a petition in his own name to the king,⁴ which was followed in a few days by a petition from the Vaudois to the same effect.⁵

These endeavours were supported by the public feeling. At a patriotic banquet which was given at Pignerol on the 12th of December, the advocate Audifredi uttered the following words:—"At the foot of those mountains which look down upon us are 20,000 of our brethren deprived of their rights as citizens; yet are

¹ This petition bears more than 600 signatures, amongst which are those of 33 professors, 65 ecclesiastics, priests, curés and theologians, 80 advocates, 50 physicians, 14 notaries, besides artists, merchants, and citizens of all ranks, even former and actual ministers of state. (M. Bert has placed the list of these signatures at the commencement of his work, I Valdesi, &c.) The learned and excellent Barbaroux, the former keeper of the seals, was now no more; but if his signature was not at this petition, the Vaudois will never forget that his sympathies preceded it; and that so early as 1837, at the time of the promulgation of the Civil Code for the Sardinian Dominions, he had endeavoured to have it so framed as to suppress all exceptional legislation in respect to them. His representations at that time prevailed only to the extent of obtaining the law of 16th December, 1837, by which Vaudois in the army were permitted to be advanced in rank, according to their years of service and the claims which they had established.—(Dizionario di diritto amministrativo, vol. I., p. 56, § 29.—BERT, Valdesi, p. 278.)

² It is dated 16th November, 1847.—M. Bert has published it (I Valdesi, pp. 462-464).

³ M. Bert has published the replies of the Bishop of Biella (dated 26th November, 1847; I Valdesi, pp. 464-466)—of the Bishop of Pignerol (same date; same work, pp. 467-472)—of the Bishop of Ivrea (30th November, 1847; pp. 472-476)—and of the Bishop of Albenga (25th November, pp. 477-479).

⁴ Dated 23d December, 1847. Published by BERT, pp. 450-461.

⁵ Published by BERT, pp. 480, 481. This petition is not dated, according to the old but indefensible Vaudois practice—a practice which surely ought to be relinquished, as it is contrary to general usage, inconvenient, the cause of many inaccuracies in future times, and without any present advantage.

they educated, industrious, strong of arm and strong of heart, as much as any other Italians. It is for us to raise our voices in their favour; it is for us, their nearest brethren, to demand that their country shall be a mother to them, and not a stepmother; it is for us to be the first to shout aloud for the emancipation of the Vaudois!"¹ And the cry of enfranchisement and brotherhood—the viva for the emancipation of the Vaudois—was repeated with enthusiasm by the whole assembly. Two weeks afterwards a similar banquet took place at Turin. The pastor, chaplain to the Protestant legations, made a speech at this banquet to the same effect.² All Piedmont, and even Sardinia, was moved as by a common impulse in this direction of progress and patriotism.

But, above all, this was owing to the prospect of a representative constitution, which Charles Albert promised soon to give; and that monarch had the courage to carry his generous designs into effect in the same liberal reforms which the new pope³ had just accomplished in his own dominions. The statute, or constitutional charter of the Sardinian dominions, appeared at last on the 8th of February, 1848. This charter granted an elective chamber, with sufficiently liberal conditions of eligibility. The enthusiasm was general, and the Vaudois shared in it, although they were still only tolerated according to the old edicts. But the liberty of the press, which was now proclaimed, allowed public opinion to be heard in favour of their enfranchisement, and its greater unanimity to appear.⁴

A report soon spread in the capital that a decree was just about to be signed for this purpose. This was on 16th February, 1848, towards evening. Immediately a crowd of many thousands of persons assembled under the windows of the representative of the Vaudois valleys, M. Amadeus Bert, the pastor of the Vaudois congregation of Turin. They sung that patriotic hymn—

¹ This speech is given in Italian by Bert, in his Valdesi, p. 330.

² This speech was printed with the title, Discours lu au banquet donné par le commerce de Turin, le 29th Décembre, 1847, par Amédée Bert, pasteur Vaudois, chapelain des Légations Protestantes près S. M. Sarde. Turin, Pomba et comp. éd. 1848.

³ Pius IX., elected in 1846. He left Rome in 1848, after the proclamation of the republic. This republic having been destroyed by the armies of the French republic, which had given it birth, and which thought fit to restore Pius IX., this pope no longer displayed the same sentiments. An amnesty, obtained with great difficulty from his vindictive holiness, excepted so great a number of classes, that it was said of it, "The Papal amnesty excepts all the world, and pardons the rest."

⁴ See articles from the Gazetta Piemontese, the Risorgimento, and the Concordia, quoted by M. BERT, pp. 333, 336, 339, &c.

"Fratelli d'Italia, L'Italia s'è desta," &c.¹

and demonstrations of the liveliest sympathy were continued till a late hour in the evening. Next day the following edict appeared:—

"Taking into consideration the fidelity and good sentiments of the Vaudois people, our royal predecessors have, of their own accord, and by successive measures, in part abrogated and mitigated the laws which anciently limited their civil privileges; and we, following in the same course, have also granted them gradual extensions of privilege. The reasons of the ancient restrictions having now ceased, and the completion of the system gradually adopted in their favour having become possible, we have, of our own free will and accord, resolved to make the Vaudois partakers of every advantage compatible with the general principles of our legislation. We, therefore, by these presents, of our certain knowledge and royal authority, and by the advice of our council, have ordained, and do ordain as follows:—

"1. The Vaudois are admitted to the enjoyment of all the civil and political rights of our other subjects, and freely to attend our schools, both within and without the university, and to obtain academic degrees.

"2. No change, however, is made as to the exercise of their worship and their own schools.

"3. We repeal, by these presents, every law to the contrary, and command the senate and the chamber of accounts to register this decree, enjoining all and sundry to observe it and cause it to be observed, and willing that it be inserted in the collection of acts of the government."²

No sooner was this decree known in the Vaudois valleys than it excited an universal enthusiasm there. "At La Tour," says a letter of that period,³ "there was a general illumination on the 24th and 25th of February. That of the 24th was principally intended to be in honour of the constitution. In the morning almost all the inhabitants of the commune were assembled by sound of drum. Each company had its banner. They proceeded to the church of Les Copiers, where Divine service was conducted by the pastor, M. Meille,⁴ who delivered an extremely affecting extem-

¹ "Brothers of Italy, Italy has awaked," &c.

² Given at Turin, 17th February, 1848. Signed, CHARLES ALBERT, and countersigned, AVET, DE REVEL, DE COLLEGNO, BORELLI. (This edict is also contained in the Echo des Vallées, t. I., No. 8.)

³ Dated from La Tour, 5th March, 1848.

⁴ Author of the work mentioned in No. VI. of the first part of the Bibliography, poraneous discourse. A number of young people, who had practised the singing of hymns of thanksgiving together, now began to sing; and this music, with the religious service, the banners which filled the church, and the solemnity of all who were present, combined to deepen the emotion in every breast. During the whole day, companies of the national guard continued to defile through the town singing patriotic hymns, and especially that which begins:

‘ Con l’azzura cocarda sul petto,
Con Italici palpiti in cuore,’ &c.¹ . . .

and uttering at intervals repeated cries of ‘Viva l’Italia!’ ‘Viva la Costituzione!’ ‘Viva Carlo Alberto!’² These enthusiastic acclamations announced the commencement of a new and happy period.

“Next day, Friday, was also a festival day, specially set apart to celebrate the emancipation of the Vaudois. Persons had been sent to the mountains to inform the inhabitants of the more elevated districts of the cause of these rejoicings, and towards evening, whilst the illumination was taking place in the town, bonfires were kindled on all the surrounding peaks. More than 100 could be counted from La Tour. At Pignerol, also, so soon as the news came of the emancipation of the Vaudois, those of them who were settled there asked leave from the commandant to illuminate their dwellings, which was granted them. The same permission was offered to the Catholics who might wish to join in those manifestations; and in the evening the whole city was illuminated, without exception of any quarter. Similar rejoicings took place in the other Vaudois communities. The Catholics almost everywhere took part in them. At St. John, the brilliant illumination of the presbytère was particularly remarked; and the prior even caused some of his finest *baoudëttes*³ to be rung. After a fraternal repast, the national guards of the commune proceeded in a body to the house of the venerable Joshua Meille, the eldest of the Vaudois pastors, who lived in a retired spot in the country. His emotion was extreme.

at the end of this volume, and principal editor of the Echo des Vallées. This journal has lately ceased to appear.

¹ “ With the azure cockade on our breasts,
With Italian throbbings of heart,
Charles Albert, we come to thy feet,
To deposit the tribute of our love,” &c.

(The national colours of Piedmont are blue and white.)

² Cheers for Italy, for the Constitution, and for Charles Albert. Even young children, partaking in the enthusiasm of these exclamations, and wishing to join in them, cried, in their feeble voices, from the balconies, Viva Caro Berto (Viva Carlo Alberto), and Viva Taya (Viva l’Italia).

³ Joyful chimes.

The white-haired good old man passed from one to another, embracing all these youths, and exclaiming 'Viva la fratellanza!'¹ In each commune the greater part of the citizens, without distinction of religion, assembled at a patriotic banquet, and many speeches suitable to the occasion were delivered. That of Professor Malan was particularly remarked. It was delivered in the purest Italian.

"But all this was nothing in comparison with what took place at Turin. A national festival was announced for the 28th of February, at which all the provinces of Piedmont should have their representatives, to celebrate in the capital the establishment of the constitution. On the 27th the Vandois deputation set out. On the way they were saluted by vivas for 'Our Vaudois Brethren!' and for 'Liberty of Conscience!' At Turin, the members of this deputation, with many other persons who had joined them of their own accord, were lodged, to the number of some hundreds, in private houses. There were instances of merchants clearing out store-rooms to convert them into sleeping apartments. Next morning, this whole troop having assembled on the esplanade of Porte-Neuve, arranged amongst themselves the order of their procession. They were preceded by a group of young girls clothed in white, adorned with blue girdles, and each bearing a little banner in her hand. More than 600 persons then followed, having at their head a magnificent velvet standard, on which were the royal arms embroidered in silver, with this simple inscription:—'A Carlo Alberto i Valdesi riconoscenti.'²

"Acclamations of the liveliest sympathy greeted the Vaudois in the streets of Turin; handkerchiefs were waved from the windows, and flowers were showered down from the balconies upon the young girls who walked past. 'Evviva fratelli Valdesi!' 'Evviva l'emancipazione dei Valdesi!'³ was shouted from all sides. The Vaudois were saluted even by persons unacquainted with them, who, shaking them by the hand, expressed their delight at the new era of peace and liberty which all then anticipated for Italy. Even priests might be seen to approach the procession, and to embrace the Vaudois in its ranks, exclaiming—'Viva la fratellanza!' 'Viva la liberta!'

"When the order was to be arranged of all the provincial deputations which were to defile before the palace of his majesty, the managers of the festival assigned the first place to the Vaudois.

¹ Fratellanza—Fraternity.

² To Charles Albert, the Vaudois grateful.—This banner was presented to his majesty, who thanked the Vaudois for it through the Marquis D'Azeglio. The marquis' letter, dated 28th February, may be seen in BERT, p. 345.

³ Vivas for "Our Vaudois Brethren!" and "The emancipation of the Vaudois!"

‘They have long been the last,’ said they, ‘and it is right that to-day they should be the first.’ It is impossible to give an idea of the eager affection and enthusiasm with which they were received. I have been told that in the streets it sometimes happened that those who met a new comer laid hold of him by the arm, and asked whence he came, and if he was a Vaudois they hugged him around the neck.

“Dear brother! who would have said that we would have seen all this? Who would have said that, on that very castle square where in former times the piles were raised for our martyrs, and the crowd gathered to witness their death, such a multitude would this day have welcomed the Vaudois with such acclamations of love and fraternity? Verily, it is God who has done all these things! To him be the glory and the thanksgiving! and may his blessing ever rest upon our pleasant native land!”

The great procession defiled before the king. More than 30,000 banners belonging to different corporations were lowered as they passed before his balcony.

But days of trouble were soon to succeed these festival rejoicings. An air of vague anxiety had already been remarked in the countenances of the king and his ministers. The swelling joy of the people who saluted them with their acclamations could not remove from their faces a certain look of constraint and hesitancy. In fact, they had that morning received news, still unknown to the people, that the King of France had been driven from his throne, and compelled to flee from his kingdom a homeless exile, whilst the republic, surrounded with terrible associations, had again been proclaimed by the French people. Like a peal of thunder ushering in the long convulsions of an unexpected storm, this event made all the thrones of Europe to tremble, agitated the nations, and led to marvellous things, to admirable deeds of devotedness, but also to revolting cruelties, and to terrible reprisals on the part of the defenders of the system of past times, whose love of power struggled fiercely against the love of liberty cherished by those who fixed their eyes upon a changed and happier future. At first, all was disorder and confusion: the final results of the great contest could not be discerned; blood and ruins covered the arena. Amidst the dust of combat nothing can be seen of the majesty and splendour of victory.

Italy partook of these commotions. Whilst a popular revolution broke out in Vienna, Lombardy rose in insurrection against the Austrians. Milan drove them from its walls; Venice broke their yoke; Sicily declared itself independent of the King of Naples; Rome adopted for itself a democratic constitution; Germany attempted to restore its shattered unity from amidst the multitude of its sceptres and of the shackles by which it was bound. Hungary, later in commencing, exhibited to the world the spectacle of the most gigantic contest which was produced by that epoch of universal conflagration.

But before these things had taken place the Lombardo-Venetian states were, of their own free motion, annexed to Piedmont. Austria sought to reconquer them; Charles Albert marched to defend them. After some successes, his army was obliged to retreat, and the Austrians re-entered Milan by capitulation. Very soon after this, however, the republic was proclaimed at Rome and in Tuscany. These were the flashes of liberty in a sky still heavily laden with the emanations, which had gathered for centuries, of a power more easily broken down than rooted up. Urged by the wishes of his people, or at least by the incessant outcry of the democratic party, which was at that time very apt to be taken for public opinion, Charles Albert resumed hostilities against the Austrians. The generals, it is said, were reluctant; the soldiers were inexperienced. The Piedmontese army was defeated at Novarra, and, to escape the hard necessity of subscribing a humiliating treaty, Charles Albert abdicated the throne of his fathers in favour of his eldest son, who assumed the name of Charles Emmanuel V. He may be ranked as the last of those chivalrous monarchs who took up arms to defend their people, and fell to defend dynasties. Covered with true glory, although defeated at Novarra, he resigned his crown, after ten laborious years of a reign which will be remembered for great things, although it was embittered by many mortifications. He left his country prostrated before the enemy, and retired to Portugal, where he died at Oporto, 28th July, 1849. His remains were brought back to Turin on the 14th October following. The honoured hearse was received with universal demonstrations of mourning. Every one called to remembrance the gentleness and bravery of the king who was now no more, and spoke with poignant regret of his liberal and generous disposition; and many a trait of his benevolence or noble-mindedness was recounted. Charles Albert, they said, reigned like a sage and fought like a hero. The devoted victim of a ruined cause, he died, like Napoleon, shorn of power, but not of glory. In the Vaudois valleys, especially, which he had so lately emancipated, he was regretted with profound regret. They had highly appreciated the benefits which he conferred, and they felt a proportionate grief at his loss.

Ought I now to set forth the few particulars of secondary importance which the modern history of the Vaudois valleys might still be found to present? No; their political condition is entirely changed, a new era has commenced, and its events must at some future time be narrated by other historians.¹ May their future history be as honourable as their past, and less troubled than it has been! Happy are the countries enlightened by the gospel! It alone can restore the proper dignity of human nature, at a time when institutions and habits are in process of change, in nations to which Catholicism has forbidden the liberty even of thought. May the ruins which the latter has made, yet flourish again through the immortal breath which quickens souls and gives freedom to men! The truth is the power of God! The Redeemer has said, "It shall make you free;"² and hope is one of the duties of the Christian.³

Thus, in all the countries which the Vaudois once occupied—in Bohemia, in Provence, in Calabria—they have been destroyed by persecution; the churches of Saluces, of Pragela, and of Barcelonnette, which came under the power of France, exist no longer; but only the churches of the valleys of Piedmont, which have remained under the sceptre of the house of Savoy, still subsist in our days. Nor is it to the princes of the house of Savoy that the blame should be ascribed of those cruel measures which so often drenched the Vaudois valleys in blood. Victor Amadeus II. presents the solitary exception; but even he acted under the influence of an imperious and foreign power; and when that influence had ceased to operate, he contended nobly and energetically against the court of Rome to maintain for the Vaudois the rights which they had regained for themselves by their valour and their fidelity. The church of Rome alone was in principle and always persecuting. The principle of mental thralldom could make no terms with that of liberty of thought; and this strife must continue as long as both shall exist. It is impossible to reconcile that despotism upon which the world of bygone days was founded, with the liberty which has opened up the springs of modern life.

¹ There are, however, a few facts which I cannot pass over in silence. Through the generous kindness of General Beckwith, who began the subscription, a Vaudois church has been built in Turin, and seven professors' houses will be erected opposite to Trinity College, at La Tour. Through the generosity of a member of parliament (M. Malan, himself of Vaudois origin, deputed to parliament in 1849 by the college of Briqueras), two new chairs have been founded in that college—one for the natural sciences, and one for the philosophical classes. They were founded without mention of the founder's name. A new Protestant church, nearer to the principal body of the people, is about to be constructed at La Tour. The establishment of public worship for the Vaudois is projected at Pignerol. And, finally, Trinity College is in the way of being transformed into a complete faculty, and the government seems disposed to favour this extension, so favourable to the progress of enlightenment.

² John viii. 32, 36.

³ 1 Cor. xiii. 13.

To this modern liberty the throne, better counselled, owes the discovery, made at last, that there is more glory in preserving the Vaudois than in destroying them. Like those monuments of ancient times which attract the steps of the traveller from afar, and which the neighbourhood protects with enlightened solicitude, they are venerable even for their antiquity itself.

Here, however, are not mere ruins, but a people—a church—and industrious and devoted citizens, an honour to their country. The Vaudois valleys are, in proportion to their population, more advanced in civilization than any other part of Piedmont. By the firm and generous hand of Charles Albert, those antiquated restrictions were abolished which the spirit of the middle ages had imposed upon the Vaudois. They have their fair share in the new rights created by the constitutional government. They are no longer restrained within the limits of their valleys.

May they extend themselves without loss of their distinctive excellencies! May it not be said of them, "It was when their country was small that the people was greatest!" From the gospel they derived their greatness and their strength: may they never forsake it! And in the words of Janavel, "May the fear of the Lord be the guard of their hearts, a better protection than any sword!"

APPENDIX. No. I.

HISTORICAL AND DOCUMENTARY BIBLIOGRAPHY

OF THE

ISRAEL OF THE ALPS:

OR, LIST OF WORKS WHICH TREAT OF THE VAUDOIS AND OF THE ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS IN THE ROMANCE LANGUAGE, WHICH CONTAIN THEIR OWN STATEMENT OF THEIR DOCTRINES.

SUMMARY.

PART I.—PUBLISHED WORKS. SECTION I. Original authors who have treated specially of the history of the Vaudois.—§ 1. Vaudois authors.—§ 2. Anonymous Vaudois Authors.—§ 3. Original authors, not natives of the valleys, who have written in a spirit favourable to the Vaudois.—§ 4. Original authors, not natives of the valleys, who have written in a spirit unfavourable to the Vaudois. SECTION II. Authors who have occupied themselves with inquiries on particular points connected with the history of the Vaudois.—§ 1. Latin Treatises (mostly contra Valdenses, and generally relating to the disciples of Valdo, rather than to the Vaudois of Piedmont).—§ 2. Academic Theses.—§ 3. Various authors. SECTION III. Historic works on the Vaudois, derived from original sources, and contributing to the more complete elucidation of the subject. SECTION IV. Polemical Works.—§ 1. Against the Vaudois.—§ 2. In defence of the Vaudois. SECTION V. Periodical, artistic, descriptive, scientific, and literary works, relative to the Vaudois.—§ 1. Books of Travels.—§ 2. Descriptive works.—§ 3. Illustrated works.—§ 4. Tales and poems.—§ 5. Journals. SECTION VI. Historical works, in which the Vaudois are only incidentally treated of, but which embody particular views or documents. CHAPTER I. Works on special subjects.—§ 1. Local History.—§ 2. Memoirs and Biographies. CHAPTER II. Works of a general character.—§ 1. Ecclesiastical Histories.—§ 2. Profane Histories. SECTION VII. Detached Documents.—§ 1. Collections of Official Papers.—§ 2. Collections of Various Documents.

PART II.—MANUSCRIPT WORKS. SECTION I. Ancient Vaudois MSS. in the Romance language.—§ 1. Origin of these MSS.—§ 2. Biblical MSS.—§ 3. MSS. of Geneva.—§ 4. MSS. of Dublin.—§ 5. MSS. of Cambridge.—§ 6. A note of what has been published of these MSS. SECTION II. MSS. deposited in different archives.—§ 1. Public.—§ 2. Private.

PART III.—DETACHED PIECES, PUBLISHED AND MANUSCRIPT.—CHAPTER I. Confessions of faith, published by the Vaudois or in their name, in different languages. CHAPTER II. Historic pieces, anterior to the bull of Innocent VIII. against the Vaudois (1487). BESIDES ALL WHICH, there remain unpublished fragments of ancient Vaudois books in the Romance language, and other proof documents, mostly unpublished, of which the narrow limits of this Bibliography do not permit any particular notice.¹

PART I.—PUBLISHED WORKS.

SECTION I.—ORIGINAL AUTHORS WHO HAVE TREATED SPECIALLY OF THE HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS.

§ 1.—Vaudois authors.

MIOL, VIGNAUX, PERRIN.

PERRIN.—“Histoire des Vaudois et des Albigeois, &c., à Genève, pour Matthieu Berjon, CIQ.IQI.XVIII. (1618).” Two vols., usually bound in one; of xxx, 248, iv, and 333 pages; the last 157 containing the Vaudois books, in the Romance language, with translations. The epistle dedicatory is addressed to Lesdiguières, and dated from Lyons, in Dauphiny, 1st January, 1618.

Perrin was not of Vaudois origin (he was born at Lyons); but as the documents of which he made use all came from the valleys (Gilles, p. 333; Perrin, ch. iii., and pp. 57–60), he must be ranked amongst the Vaudois historians. Amongst these historic documents were the memoirs of VIGNAUX, entitled, De la source, ancienneté, doctrine, religion, mœurs, confessions et progrès du peuple surnommé Vaudois, habitant dans les vallées du Piémont. These memoirs are now lost. A modern author professes to have consulted them, but must have fallen into some mistake.—(FABRE D'OLIVET, Les Montagnards des Alpes, i. 26.) Vignaux's Memoirs were, after all, only a translation of a similar work composed in Italian by JEROME MIOL, pastor of Angrogna, in 1580 (Gilles, p. 333).

Perrin had also many other documents at his command (see his chapters ii., iii., and vii.) In the Acts of the Synods of Dauphiny (Synod held at Grenoble in 1602) we read, that the pastors of the Embrunois and of the Val Cluson (which was then included in Dauphiny) were requested to collect “all sorts of documents bearing on the history of the life, doctrine, and persecutions of the Albigeois and the Vaudois.” At the synod of Embrun (in 1603) it was resolved to place these documents in the hands of M. Chamier, pastor at Montélimart, who had undertaken to write this history. (Léger speaks of M. Chamier, P. ii., pp. 257, 258.) M. Chamier devolved this work upon M. Crisson (Synod of Grenoble, 1605), and he again upon Perrin, pastor at Lyons. (See a note at p. 300, of vol. i. of this work.) In 1604, the Vaudois valleys still sent historic documents, which Vignaux himself conveyed to Perrin (Gilles, p. 333). The

¹ By a letter recently received from M. Hahn, I learn that there is already a pretty long list of works on the Vaudois in the Nederlandsch Archief voor Kerkelijke Geschiednis. Leide VI. 109-132. A number of these works are indicated in WINER'S Manual (Handbuch der theologischen Literatur . . . Third Edition, Leipsic, 1838), section xxii., under the head of the Precursors of the Reformation, and in some other Bibliographical works.

Synod of St. Marcellin, held in 1606, exhorted the latter to hasten forward his work. At the Synod of Orpières, held in 1608, Perrin demanded a sum of money to pay the expense of his researches. He presented the manuscript of his work in 1609, at the Synod of St. Paul-trois-Châteaux. The style of this work was retouched at Geneva, by M. Tronchin.—(Records of the Venerable Company, vol. E, p. 205). The Synod of Tonneins (1614, art. vi.), resolved that a copy should be sent to each pastor of Dauphiny. But it does not appear that this work was generally found to answer the expectations which had been formed of it; for the Synod of Vitré (1617, art. iv.), resolved that the work of Perrin should be submitted to the examination of the pastors and professors of Geneva. The result of this examination was not more favourable to it; for the Synod of Charenton (1623, ch. x., art. i.), resolved that the composition of a new history of the Vaudois and Albigeois should be undertaken. (M. Tilloit, of Sedan, was charged with this undertaking. The provinces of Dauphiny were exhorted to send him all the documents which they could collect; but death prevented him from carrying the design into effect.)

Besides the sum which Perrin demanded from the Synod of Orpières, he received 300 livres from that of Privas (held in 1612, art. iii.); and, moreover, he sold his manuscript to the publisher.—(Records of the Ven. Comp. of Geneva, vol. E, p. 203.) Never, perhaps, was the price of a historic work less merited. If Perrin had simply published the documents which had been sent to him, his work would have been of great value, for these documents came direct from the best sources. (The Synod of Mentoules, 1612, resolved that a folio Bible should be sent to a person in Pragela, in return for many manuscripts which he had furnished to Perrin.) They amounted to the number of twelve MS. volumes (Perrin, pp. 57–60). Not only did Perrin fail to make proper use of his rich materials, but he has even been accused of having employed them unfaithfully. (See in the British Magazine, No. CXIII., p. 397, a remarkable article by Dr. Todd, on the Book of George Morel, Dublin Library, class C, Tab. V. No. 18.)

As an author, Perrin's abilities are very doubtful; but his work is rendered precious by the original fragments of ancient Vaudois treatises at the end of the volume. Perrin is rarely to be met with in public libraries, but not uncommon in private collections.

GILLES (in Italian, GILLIO; in Latin, ÆGIDIUS).

“Histoire ecclésiastique des Eglises réformées, recueillies en quelques vallées de Piedmont et circonvoisines, autrefois appelées Vaudoises; commençant dès l'an 1160 de nostre seigneur et finissant en l'an 1643; par Pierre Gilles, pasteur de l'Eglise réformée de La Tour. . . . A Genève, pour Jean de Tournes. . . . MDCXLIV.” 1 vol. 4to, of xx. 569, and xlv pages. Reprinted, according to Winer (Handb. der theol. lit. sect. xx.), in 1655, in 4to, at Geneva.

The epistle dedicatory, addressed “to the pastors, elders, and deacons, and to all the faithful of the valleys of Piedmont,” is dated from La Tour, 27th June, 1643, “and in the 72d year of my age.”

The idea of this new history of the Vaudois was conceived immediately after the appearance of the unsatisfactory work of Perrin. In the Acts of the Vaudois Synods (Synod of Pramol, held 15th September, 1620)—“E ordinato, che si ridurra in scritto, l'istoria delle cose avvenute in le chiese di queste tre valli, dal 1600 in qua; e è dato carrigo à M. Pietro Gillio, con l'aiuto di M. Appia, e participatione di M. Gaio, e altri che potranno portare in ciò, aiuto opportuno, . . .” &c.

This history was first written in Italian. In 1627 it was almost completed in that language, and the only question discussed was how Gilles was to be remunerated for his labours. The Synod of Le Villar (held from 16th to 18th September, 1625) resolved, "che ogni chiesa darà à l'honorando Pietro Gillio, il compimenti de scudi tre, con li due già qui dananzi assignati;" from which it appears that, to bear the expense of this history, a contribution of five crowns was imposed upon each Vaudois parish. And, in the Acts of the Synod of 1627 (held at Pramol, 13th to 17th Sept.), we read, that this contribution not having been yet all paid, "e ordinato che infra un mese le chiese le più potenti, habiano da dargli (al reverendo M. Pietro Gillio, per la fatica dell' Historia), il compimento de scudi cinque, e le altre de scudi quatro, senza includerni fiorino quatro, datti nel principio da ogni chiesa." These first four florins had been given for the purchase of paper.

But, in 1630, of sixteen Vaudois pastors then living (fifteen of whom were actual pastors and one emeritus, without reckoning the pastor of Roure in Pragela), fourteen died of the plague, which carried off more than one-half of the whole population of the Vaudois valleys. Gilles was one of the two who survived (but he lost the four eldest of his sons); he was then 59 years of age, and still continued to preach two or three times on Sabbath and once on each weekday. (See his work, page 516, and in the Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 316.) At this time new pastors were brought from Geneva to supply the Vaudois churches. As they were not able to preach except in French, that language became the more prevalent, and Gilles considering that it was also more extensively diffused than the Italian, had the resolution to recommence his work, and to complete it in the form in which we now possess it.

He has excellent qualities as a writer; he is energetic and simple, natural and vigorous; his style can be found fault with only as antiquated and a little diffuse. As an historian, he must be placed in the very highest rank for correctness, impartiality, and moderation. Yet he is rather a chronicler than an historian—he relates in chronological order the events which took place in all the countries with which he has to do. Within the space assigned to each year are to be found brought together and in succession events occurring in localities between which there was no connection. Thus Gilles, although interesting in every page, produces but a confused impression on the mind of the reader. Different images which succeed one another so rapidly, efface one another to the mental as well as the bodily eye.

The history of Gilles may be regarded as an original authority for the events which took place from 1550 to 1640. It was put in the Index by the court of Rome, as were afterwards the work of Léger and the volume which I published in 1834. Gilles must be compared with Rorengo, who relates the same events as contemplated from another point of view, and who often attempts to refute him, but without success. Rorengo calls him il professore Gillio (Dedication, p. 2), and says, "che si vantava d'havere corsa l'Italia, l'Alemagna e diversi paësi, per cercar nuove dottrine o vecchie, . . ." &c.—(Rorengo, chap. xv. p. 73.) This proves the learning of our author, and the value which he set upon truth.

In the Acts of the Synod, held at Pinache, 1st May, 1607, we read: "E stato proposto da M. Pietro Gillio, ministro della Torre, se sarebbe bene di metter in scritto tutte le difficultà e questione, onde sarà trattato nei sinodi," &c. This proposal of regular records, made by the first of our historians, was not carried into effect till two centuries after. Two Vaudois pastors contemporary with Gilles bore the same name with him, viz., Peter Gilles, pastor at Molines, and James Gilles, pastor at Angrogna. The latter was suspended from his functions for six months. I mention them to prevent errors which the sameness of name might cause in reading contemporary documents.

Gilles is the author of several polemical works, of which the occasion was as follows:—Rorengo had published in 1632 a work against the Vaudois: Breve narratione dell'introductione degl'heretici nelle valli. The minister of Le Villar, Valerius Gros, refuted this work by order of the Synod (Léger, p. 539). Rorengo speaks of his reply in Memorie storiche . . . , p. 252. Rorengo then associated with himself the prefect of the monks of Pignerol, by name Antonio Lazzari, but who assumed the fictitious name of Theodore Belvidere. They jointly wrote the Lettrés apologétiques, which appeared in 1643. (They related to the tone of the Vittoria triumphale, published by the Cordelier Casini, in 1610). Gilles replied to the Lettrés apologétiques by Considerations, which called forth a new reply from the monks, under the title of Turris contra Damascum (published in 1636); and, in reply to this new work, Gilles composed a Latin treatise in thirty-three chapters; but before this treatise was published a fourth publication of the monks, entitled Lucerna della christiana verita, compelled him to resume the pen in order to refute it likewise. His reply, entitled Torre evangelica, contained forty-eight chapters. Theodore Belvidere rejoined by himself in Risposta al libro del Sr Gillio titolato Torre evangelica. This book was divided into eighteen sections, and dedicated to the Society de propagandâ fide et extirpandis hereticis. Gilles replied yet again and refuted it, in an equal number of chapters, in a work of which I know not the title. All these works have become very rare.

There exists, in the handwriting of Gilles, a manuscript of an ancient Vaudois Discipline, drawn from the Acts of Synod previous to 1564, by the minister Humbert Raymond, and completed by our author under this title: "Les ordonnances ecclésiastiques, faites par nos tréshonorés Pères et Frères, ministres de la Parolle de Dieu, aux vallées de Luzerne, St. Martin, Pérouse, Cluson, et Marquizat . . . transcriptes en ce present livre par moy, Pierre Gilles, secrétaire, l'an 1610, par le commandement du Synode." From 1615 to 1630 Gilles was almost always moderator of the Vaudois church. The republication of his history was recently undertaken by Mrs. Jenkinson, a benefactress of the Vaudois valleys. The first ten chapters alone have been reprinted.

LÉGER.

"Histoire générale des Eglises Evangéliques des vallées du Piémont, ou Vaudoises . . . par JEAN LÉGER, pasteur et modérateur des Eglises des vallées, et depuis la violence de la persécution, appelé a l'Eglise Wallonne de Leyde, chez Jean le Carpentier, 1669." Two volumes fol.; vol. I., of xxxviii and 212 pages, and vol. II., of xvi, 385, and vi pages.¹ These two volumes are ordinarily bound in one. The work is accompanied with a map of the valleys, pasted on cloth, and sufficiently exact, with vignettes, representing various tortures inflicted on the Vaudois martyrs; and a false title-page, a copperplate, representing two old men who each bear a medallion, between which a drapery falls down inscribed with the title of the work. The medallion on the right exhibits a lily surrounded with thorns, with this motto, Luctor et emergo; that on the left a burning bush, with the words, Quamvis uror non comburor. The figures of the old men trample under foot the emblems of Popery; and in the space between them, beneath the drapery which they sustain, are to be seen a bishop, a soldier, and a monk, who strike upon an anvil, under which is written, Tritantur mallei, remanet incus. Towards the top of the page, an escutcheon, supported by two genii, exhibits a candlestick surrounded by seven stars, with this inscription, Antiqua convallium insignia, and this motto, Lux lucet in tenebris.

¹ This history was translated into German by Hans Frédéric von Schwenitz, with a preface by Sigismund James Baumgarten. Breslau, 1750. Two vols. 4to.

The work of L  ger is, in fact, only a history of the persecution of 1655, or rather a very confused collection of documents relative to that event. In the first part, he has reprinted the Vaudois treatises in the Romance language which had been published by Perrin, adding a fragment of La Nobla Leyezon, and a few other documents. L  ger is the most diffuse, and one of the most superficial of all our historians. He owes his importance partly to the epoch in which he wrote, and to the imposing form of his work. He is often incorrect, credulous, and carried away by his feelings; but the latter fault was almost inevitable in a contemporary author, himself the victim of the events which he records. I shall not here give any particulars of his life, for he has himself taken care to include his biography in the last chapter of his work, and so much of it as concerns the history has been already given in the first volume of the Israel of the Alps (part ii., ch. x.) L  ger published separately a Remonstrance pour les Vall  es on occasion of divers infractions of the patents of Pignerol, and an Apologie des Eglises du Pi  mont (anonymous: Haarlem, 1662, 4to, p. 39), which has for its object only his own vindication. I know not the precise date of his death; but thirteen years after the publication of his history, he no longer survived, for, under date 27th August 1684, we meet with a royal decree, in which mention is made of the property of the late JEAN L  GER (Turin, Archives of the Court of Accounts, Regio controrollo, Finanze: 1684, No. 179, fol. 55).

L  ger's History was reprinted at Lyons, in one vol. folio, in 1799; and translated into German, Breslau, 1750, in 4to.—Antoine L  ger, the uncle of the historian, wrote some sermons, which were published two years after his death, with the title, Sermons sur divers textes de l'Ecriture Sainte, par A. L  ger, pasteur et professeur en th  ologie. Geneva, 1720, three vols. 8vo."

ARNAUD.

"Histoire de la glorieuse rentr  e des Vaudois dans leurs vall  es . . . le tout recueilli des m  moires qui ont   t   fid  lement faits, de tout ce qui s'est pass   dans cette guerre des Vaudois, et mis au jour par Henri Arnaud, pasteur et colonel des Vaudois, MDCCX." One vol. large 12mo, of xxxiii, 65, and 407 pages. The place of publication not named. The following opinion has been expressed in a journal:—"This volume, according to all the typographical indications, was printed at Basle, by Brandm  ller, or some other master." (Etretnnes nationales, faisant suite au Conservateur Suisse . . . Lausanne 1845, chez Bridel, p. 126.) I was informed by the late pastor Mondon, who succeeded a son of Arnaud, in the Vaudois colony of Gros Villar (W  rtemberg), that this volume was printed at Cassel.

The memoirs of which mention is made in the title, and of which the author made use, were—(1.) The Journal of the Expedition, written daily by Paul Reynaudin, who suspended his theological studies at Basle, to follow his compatriots when they went to reconquer their native valleys (Arnaud, p. 175). He resumed his studies in 1692, and published his inauguration thesis in 1694, entitled Dissertatio de Valdensibus. He was settled as pastor at Pral in 1695, at Rocheplate in 1702, and at Bobi in 1705. There he ended his days in 1736, having long been moderator of the Vaudois church. (2.) Personal Memoirs, written by François Hugues (or Iluc) of Vigan (Arnaud, pp. 216, 217). (3.) A Narrative (Relation) of the Attack on the Balsille by Catinat, printed at the Hague (by Olivier le Franc, MDCXC.), and reprinted word for word by Arnaud, from p. 281 to p. 297. (4.) Private letters, published at the end of the volume.

A number of authors have given particulars of the life of Arnaud; amongst others, Mr. Bracebridge, who published in English a biography of that celebrated man; and Mr. Acland, who translated his work, "The Glorious Recovery by the Vaudois . . ." &c., London, 1827, an 8vo of cix, xxv, and 239 pages. (Some further particulars will be found in the second volume of the Israel of the Alps, in Part III. Chap. iii., and Chap. ix.)

The most circumstantial account which has come down to us of the family and youth of Arnaud, is contained in a certificate which was sent to him by the Vaudois pastors assembled at Les Clos, on the 28th of October, 1699, when he was obliged to leave the Vaudois valleys, in consequence of the decree of 1st July, 1698, banishing all persons of foreign birth. This document is as follows:—

"Certificate granted by the pastors of the valleys to H. Arnaud and his family, upon their departure from these countries.

"We, pastors of the Vaudois, elders of the evangelical church of St. John, and directors of the valleys of Piedmont, declare and testify, that Mr. Henry Arnaud is the son of the late Mr. Francis Arnaud, a native in the valley of Ambrun in Dauphiny, and of Piedmontese descent, and of the late Margaret Gros, a descendant of an illustrious and noble race formerly resident at Dronier in the Marquisate of Salusse. He was educated in his earliest years in the schools of these valleys, and there received the first elements of instruction; and he was then sent to Basle, to pursue his studies there, taking advantage of the charitable aid which the illustrious rulers of that canton are good enough to give to our students; from whence he made a visit to Holland, and returned to the university of Geneva, to complete his studies there; after which he was received as a pastor, conjointly with Mr. William Malanot, by our synod, in the year 1670. The service of the churches of Maneille and Macel was first intrusted to him, and afterwards that of the principal communes of our valleys, concluding with that of which he is now pastor, which, to our great regret, he is compelled to quit, in obedience to an order of his royal highness. It is impossible for us to say how painful to us is this separation, which deprives us of his useful and acceptable services. For this reason, whilst we express our sorrow, we must also declare that his zeal in fulfilling his duties has always, and in all places, been inexhaustible, and that, on all other occasions which presented themselves of advancing the glory of God, he and his family (consisting of four sons and two daughters, besides his wife Margaret Bastie, likewise a descendant of one of the most ancient and principal families in this country), have always set an example not common among us. And because of the love and respect which we have for them all, we ardently pray the Lord so to order things in his grace, that we may yet at some time have the consolation of seeing them again return among us here; and, therefore, hoping that the times may change, we have not bade them a final farewell, but, on the contrary, we reserve to ourselves the right to recal him amongst us again, as if he had been always a pastor of our church. Meanwhile, we pray the Most High that he may be pleased in his infinite goodness to go with them and to preserve them, wheresoever his Divine hand may conduct them.

"Given at the above-named village of St. John, in the valley of Lucerna, the 22d of August of the year 1698. — D. Léger, G. Malanot, L. Bertin, J. Jahier, B. Jahier, R. Reinoudin, ministers of the Vaudois of the communes of Bobi, Angrogna, Macel, Pramol, St. Germain, and Prals, in the valley of St. Martin; B. Belione Capine, Monsieur Bartie, lieutenant, keeper of accounts, D. Parissa, D. Dacna, elders.

"We, foreign pastors from Switzerland and Geneva, serving in the communes of the valley of Lucerna, confirm with the greatest pleasure the present certificate, and all that it contains, granted in favour of M. Arnaud and his family. We have been extremely edified by the conduct of Madame Arnaud and her children, and have received a thousand evidences of their friendship since our arrival in these valleys. We earnestly pray God in his goodness to be with them during all the journey which Madame Arnaud is ready to undertake with her family.—Given at Clos, the 28th of October, in the year 1699. J. Senebier, J. De Cappet, J. Du Bois, P. P. Du Toit, P. Bud, pastors of the churches of La Tour, St. John, Bobi, Rocheplatte, Prarustin, and Villesèche."

M. Arnaud very soon afterwards retired to Germany, and became pastor at Dürmentz. In 1703, political events permitted him to resume the exercise of the ministry in the Vaudois valleys. We find him still pastor at St. John, in 1706. Next year he went to London, where Van Somer took his portrait. He afterwards returned to the valleys, but was again compelled to leave them in 1709. William III. then invited him to his court, and gave him a colonel's commission; but Arnaud preferred to return to Germany. Queen Anne granted him a pension of £226 sterling, and he died at Schonberg in 1721, aged eighty years.

There are several portraits of him. The best is that which was drawn and engraved on copper at London by Van Somer, an oval medallion of 116 millimetres in height, and 112 in breadth, with only this inscription—Henry Arnaud, Vaudois pastor.

The Glorious Return of the Vaudois, by Arnaud, has become very rare. Two copies of this work were sold in London, in 1829 and 1832, the one for £5, 9s. 10d. and the other for £8, 16s. 4d. It was reprinted in 1845, by Altinger, at Neuchâtel, with a preface by F. de Rougemont, in large 18mo, xii and 251 pages. The original autograph MS. of this work is deposited in the Royal Library of Berlin.

RECENT AUTHORS.

1. "Défense historique des Vaudois, ou lettres à Mgr l'évêque Bigex, sur l'origine, la doctrine et les mœurs des Vaudois, par PEYRAN, Modérateur des Eglises Vaudoises." Published at London by Mr. SIMS, in 1826.—These letters were written in 1818, in reply to a pastoral of Monseigneur Bigex, Bishop of Pignerol. They display spirit and learning.

2. "Exposé historique de l'état des Vaudois, dans les vallées du Piémont, par M. Pellegrin." 12mo; Haarlem, 1824. The profits of this pamphlet were destined to assist in the foundation of the hospital of La Tour. It produced about £80.—M. Pellegrin is also the author of an arithmetical work for the use of the Vaudois schools (Turin, Pomba and Co., 1836; two small 18mo vols.), and of a collection of Scripture narratives, entitled Bible de la jeunesse, two thick 12mo vols. of 540 and 640 pages. (Amsterdam, published by Delachaux, 1830.)

3. "Considerations sur les Vaudois du Piémont, par Timoléon Peyran." Geneva, 1825; 8vo, pp. 94. It is a theological thesis.

Other theses have been maintained by Vaudois on subjects borrowed from the history of their country.—BASTIE, Dissertationis historico-theologicæ de Valdensibus pars prima (on their origin and their doctrine); pars altera, agens de afflictionibus . . . &c. Basle, 1700; maintained against Samuel Werenfelsius, 13th and 14th March, 1700.—This Werenfelsius is the author of an elegy in Latin verse, Ad Valles Pedemontanas, remarkable as a literary production. Bastie had a stroke of apoplexy in February, 1727, and lived a number of years afterwards deprived of his reason.

4. "Le livre de famille, ou instructions familières sur l'histoire des Eglises Vaudoises . . . par Pierre Bert, ancien modérateur," . . . &c. 12mo, of 105 pages. Geneva, Barbezat, 1830.—M. Bert was an author and an orator more distinguished than might be supposed from this pamphlet. He is the author also of the translation of The Gospel according to St. John into the present dialect of the Valleys, printed at London in 1830; 8vo, pp. 231.

5. "Histoire des Vaudois des vallées du Piémont, et de leurs colonies, depuis leur origine jusqu' à nos jours, par Alexis Muston, docteur en théologie." Tom. i. 8vo, of xx and 523 pages, with map and fac-simile.—The publication was continued no farther than this first volume; but the whole work was taken up anew upon another plan, with more abundant materials more critically weighed in the ISRAEL OF THE ALPS. The following parts of this work have appeared separately:—(1.) "Siloë des Alpes; ou sources vives de la grâce, jailissantes dans l'Eglise vaudoise, depuis les premiers siècles jusqu' à la réformation." (2.) "Les parfums de l'hysope; ou la foi dans les solitudes; histoire de l'Eglise vaudoise dans les Hautes-Alpes." (Val Louise, Freyssinières, Queyras, &c.) (3.) "Les témoins du Seigneur; histoire des Vaudois persécutés en Provence." (4.) "La couronne d' épines; histoire des Vaudois persécutés en Calabre, et martyre admirable de Jean-Louis Paschal, leur pasteur." (5.) "Les martyrs Vaudois; ou les confesseurs de la vérité dans les vallées du Piémont." (6.) "Les lys d'Israël, abattus par l'orage; histoire des Eglises vaudoises dans la province de Saluces et dans la plaine du Piémont." (7.) "La foi dans les épreuves; ou la cruelle persécution et la glorieuse défense des Vaudois, en 1560." (8.) "Les Pâques Piémontaises; ou le massacre des Vaudois du Piémont, en 1655." (9.) "Le bras de Dieu dans la persécution: histoire de l'héroïque défense des vallées vaudoises, par Josué Janavel." (10.) "Les Néhémites: ou l'expulsion, l'exil, et la rentrée des Vaudois, de 1666 à 1690." (11.) "Ismaël au désert: ou les habitants des vallées vaudoises, expulsés en 1698." (12.) "La Gossen opprimée: histoire jusqu' ici inconnue, des Vaudois du Pragela: depuis les temps les plus anciens, jusqu' à leur extinction." (13.) "Religion et patrie: histoire des vicissitudes de l'Eglise vaudoise, de 1560 à 1650." (14.) "La terre de servitude et la terre promise: ou les vallées Vaudoises, depuis le séjour de Félix Neff dans les Alpes, jusqu' à l'émancipation civile et politique des Vaudois du Piémont."

6. MEILLE. "Les Vaudois en Calabre au quatorzième siècle." An interesting work, inserted in the Revue suisse, t. ii. pp. 647–658 and 687–709.

7. "Histoire de l'Eglise vaudoise, depuis son origine, et des Vaudois du Piémont, jusqu' à nos jours, avec un appendice, &c.; par Antoine MONASTIER, ancien pasteur du canton de Vaud et originaire des vallées Vaudoises du Piémont." Toulouse, 1847; 2 vols. 8vo (the first of 362, and the second of 385 pages).—This work, published by the Religious Tract Society of Toulouse, has been translated into English by the Religious Tract Society of London, 1848, 1 vol. 12mo, of 432 pages. The first thirteen chapters contain general observations on the origin and doctrine of the Vaudois. The last 153 pages of the second volume contain a reprint of a number of Vaudois works in the Romance tongue already known, including, amongst others, the poetic fragments published by Raynouard (Choix de poésies originales des Troubadours, t. ii., Monuments primitifs de la langue romane). M. Monastier proposes some well considered modifications of Raynouard's translations. The variations which he suggests of the Romance text are less happy. The notes which he has appended to the treatise On Antichrist (pp. 323-363), and, above all, his commentary on the book On Purgatory (pp. 365-375), deserve the careful attention of all who study this subject. The work of M. Monastier is an authority for the facts of modern history recorded in his last two chapters.

8. BERT, "I Valdesi, ossia i cristiani secondo la chiesa primitiva, abitanti le così dette valli di Piemonte, cenni storici, da Amedeo Bert, ministro del culto valdese, e capellano dalle Legazioni protestanti a Torino." Turin, 1849; 1 vol. 8vo, of xxxv and 498 pages. This work contains a general sketch of the history of the Vaudois, derived from the works of previous historians, and with the same gaps which they had left. There would have seemed to be a disproportion between the brief notices of the first chapters and the often minute details of the latter ones, if the author's very object had not been the more particular exhibition of the events of modern times. He is the first writer whose work can be reckoned an authority in matters relative to the civil and political emancipation of the Vaudois. This interesting volume is accompanied with a happy selection of proof documents, of which a considerable number had never before been published. In particular, it contains (from page 386 to page 390) some very important passages, very skilfully arranged by the learned author, to throw light upon the ancient autonomy of the diocese of Milan, to which the Vaudois valleys at an early period belonged, and which was then so far from submitting to the supremacy of the Holy See, that it was completely independent of the Romish church properly so called. M. Amadeus Bert is the son of the author of the Livre de famille above-mentioned; but I Valdesi is a much more important work, and has unquestionably exercised a greater influence in Italy than other works of the same kind written in foreign languages. An incidental remark (in p. 310, line 12) leads me to make an observation here on the subject of language—that the patois of the Vaudois valleys has a radical structure far more regular than the Piedmontese idiom. The origin of this patois was anterior to the growth of Italian and of French—antecedent even to the Romance language, whose earliest documents exhibit still more analogy with the present language of the Vaudois mountaineers, than with that of the troubadours of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The existence of this patois is of itself a proof of the high antiquity of these mountaineers, and of their constant preservation from foreign intermixtures and changes. Their popular idiom is a precious monument.

§ 2.—Anonymous Vaudois Authors.

1. "Histoire des persécutions et guerres, faites depuis l'an 1555 jusques en l'an 1561, contre le peuple appelé Vaudois . . . &c." With this motto, "Il n'est point difficile au Seigneur de sauver un grand nombre de gens ou un petit." (1 Sam. ii. 6; 2 Chron. xiv. 11.) Printed in MDLXII. (place not given), large 8vo, pp. 173. Translated into Latin, by Christopher Richard, Geneva, 1581, 8vo. I do not know the name of the author, but the materials of this work had certainly been derived from the valleys. (See the authorities of Chap. i. of Part II. of the Israel of the Alps.)

2. "Relation veritable de ce qui s'est passé dans les persécutions et massacres faits, cette année, aux Eglises réformées de Piémont; avec la réfutation des calomnies dont les adversaires de la vérité tachent de les noircir." Without place of publication: MDCLV, 4to of 84 pages, but divided into two parts, of which the first ends in p. 54. The second is entitled, "Suite de la Relation, contenant une succincte refutation de l'invective du Marquis de Pianesse . . . à quoi est ajoutée une brève confession de foi, des Eglises réformées des vallées du Piémont." This confession, which concludes the work, is the same which is also published by Léger (Part I. p. 112-116), and which the Synod of 1839 declared to be the purest expression of Bible doctrine at all times maintained by the Vaudois church. (See, in regard to this, a note in this work, Part III. Chap. xxiv.) It is not known where, nor how, nor by whom this confession of faith was composed. It is probable that it was composed at Geneva; for, in the year 1655, it is impossible to find any time or circumstances which would admit of its being drawn up in the valleys. Léger, moreover, does not say that it was composed by the Vaudois, but only that it was *published by them*¹ (Part I. p. 112). But if we do not know the authors and the origin of this confession, there can be no doubt that it was composed by Calvinists. (See Part III. Chap. i. No. 12, of this Bibliography.) I place this work amongst those of anonymous Vaudois authors, because the author makes the Vaudois speak in it in their own name (see pp. 79 and 84); but it does not, therefore, certainly follow that the author was a Vaudois. Léger calls this work "the manifesto of the Vaudois churches" (Part I. p. 112); and in his Biography, he says, in 1655, "I wrote my first and largest manifesto in twice twenty-four hours . . . and sent it to Geneva to be printed . . . but this these gentlemen would not permit" . . . (Part II. p. 365). I do not know if it was printed elsewhere; but Léger adds that they did not send him back his manuscript (p. 366). He composed a second manifesto at Paris, which was printed in all languages (Ibid. p. 356). (See the authorities for Chap. vii. of Part II. of the Israel of the Alps.) The Relation now in question cannot be this second manifesto, because it was printed at Geneva, and not at Paris. It appears to me, therefore, impossible, in the present state of Vaudois bibliography, to determine the origin of this work, and of the Confession of Faith with which it concludes. The Confession, however, is a mere reproduction, often in exact words, of the Confession of Rochelle. (See Part II. Chap. i. No. 12, of this Bibliography.)

3. "Apologie des Eglises évangéliques des vallées de Piémont, faite en défense de l'innocence de Sr Jean Léger, pasteur de l'Eglise réformée de saint Jean contre les impostures de Michel Villeneuve, Jean Vertu et semblables faussaires, apostés et stipendiés," . . . &c. Translated from the Italian edition, printed at Haarlem, by Jacob Alberts, in 1662, 4to, pp. 39.

This Apology is from the pen of Léger himself (p. 371), and was signed by all the members of the Vaudois synod, held at Angrogna, in the quarter of Les Malans, 13th September, 1661. The Italian edition, printed at Haarlem, is a 4to of 16 leaves, unpagged.

4. "Apologia delle chiese Riformate del Piemonte, circa la loro confessione di fede, e la continua successione di esse, tanto ne statù del Paëse, quanto ne valdesi, contra le gravillationi e calonniè del Priore Marco Aurelio Rorengo di Lucerna: in Geneva, appresso Francesco Bouvard anno 1662." Small 8vo of xxxviii and 156 pages. Rorengo had alleged that the Confession of Faith already mentioned (§ 2, No. ii.) was not agreeable to the ancient Vaudois doctrines, nor to the Bible, nor to reason, and that it was not the work of the Vaudois. His observations are intermingled with many sarcasms, in bad taste. His work is entitled, "Esame intorno alla nuova breve confessione di fede, delle chiese riformate di Piemonte, in cui si fa conoscer alli professori d'essa distrutta con la novita la pretesa antica confessione. Del Priore Marc' Aurelio Rorengo; de Conti di Luserna; in Torino par Carlo Gianelli, 1658." Small 4to pp. 43. To this work, that now in question is the Vaudois reply, but I know not the name of the author.

¹ According to the usual style of Léger, and still more certainly according to the facts of the case, these words, published by the Vaudois, ought not to mean and could not mean more than published in name of the Vaudois.

5. "Très humble remontrance touchant le pitoyable état où se trouvent à présent réduites les pauvres Eglises évangéliques des vallées de Piémont, à cause de l'altération et violation de leurs concessions, et particulièrement de la patente de 1655. . . A Haarlem. . . 1662." Unpaged; 4to, 12 leaves. This Remonstrance was composed by order of the Vaudois synod of November, 1661.

6. "Récit de ce qu'il y a de plus considérable aux affaires des Eglises réformées des vallées de Piémont, depuis les massacres de l'année 1655. . . . A Haarlem, 1663." Small 4to, of iv and 60 pages.—The title of this work is much longer than what I have here given. The particulars which the work contains, and the guarded language employed with reference to the Piedmontese authorities, are my sole reasons for ascribing this work to a Vaudois author. But it does not seem probable that a stranger could have been acquainted with such details, and still less is it probable that a stranger would have thought it requisite to express himself in such guarded terms. The same observation applies to the work following.

7. "Histoire de la persécution des vallées de Piémont, contenant ce qui s'est passé dans la dissipation des Eglises et des habitants de ces vallées, arrivé en l'an 1686." Rotterdam, MDCLXXXIX.; 4to, pp. 36.—This work was translated into German, and published in that language in 1690, in an 18mo vol. of 155 pages. See the authorities of Chap. xiv. of Part II. of the Israel of the Alps.

8. "Cinq lettres, par un Vaudois des Gaules Cisalpines, sur quelques pages d'un livre intitulé: HISTOIRE GEOGRAPHIQUE, NATURELLE, &c." . . . For (the title of this latter work, see Sect. vi. § 1, No. 14, of this Bibliography).

An 8vo pamphlet of 74 pages, printed in 1784, but the place not named.—It is an excellent dissertation on the origin, manners, doctrine, and antiquity of the Vaudois. It has been ascribed to Maraudo, the author of the Tableau du Piémont sous le régime des rois; but it is really from the pen of PAUL APPIA, whose unpublished memoirs have frequently been quoted in the Israel of the Alps, Part III. Chaps. xxi. and xxii. (Maraudo is also a Vaudois writer; but as he has produced no work specially devoted to the subject of the Vaudois, his writings do not fall to be included in the present category. See Sect. vi. § 1, No. 15.)

9. "Histoire des Vaudois ou des habitants des vallées occidentales du Piémont, qui ont conservé le christianisme dans toute sa pureté et à travers plus de trente persécutions, depuis les premiers siècles de son existence jusqu'à nos jours, sans avoir participé à aucune réforme." Two vols. 8vo; without date or place of publication—the first volume consisting of xxv and 132 pages, and the second of 268—commonly bound in one. (The second volume bears on its title-page seconde partie, and not tome 2.) This work was printed at Lausanne, by Luquiens, and was sold at Paris by Marandani, in 1796. In p. xxiv, line 24, are the words—"The celebrated martyr of the same name with myself, Guido Brez." . . . And it has therefore been supposed that the name of the author was Guido Brez; but this is a mistake. His name was James Brez. Barbier, in his Dictionnaire des anonymes, No. 7979, says that he died in 1800.

Guénard, in La France littéraire, i. 508, says, 1810: The exact date was 1809, and the place Middleburgh, in Holland. His work treats of the history of the Vaudois only to the year 1655. He had composed the sequel to 1688. This unpublished part, which I possess in MS., consists of seven chapters in 104 folio pages. Neither the manuscript nor the printed work contains any new fact. Brez published also La Flore des insectophiles précédée d'un discours sur l'utilité des insectes et de l'étude de l'insectologie, par Jaques Brez. Utrecht, 1791; 1 vol. 8vo, pp. 524. His History of the Vaudois was translated into German. 8vo; Leipsic, 1798.

§ 3.—Original authors not natives of the valleys, who have written in a spirit favourable to the Vaudois.

1. CAMERARIUS, "De excidio reliquiarum Valdesium . . . lugubris narratio." Heidelberg, 1606. Composed by Joachim; published thirty years after the death of the author by his nephew Louis.—This work relates to the Vaudois of Provence, and is to be found in the Historica narratio . . . Joachimi Camerarii . . . de fratribus orthodoxis Ecclesiis in Bohemia, p. 303.

2. RICHARD, "Memorabilis historia persecutionum bellorumque in populum vulgo Valdenses appellatum," &c. Geneva, 1631. One volume, printed in italics; small 8vo, pp. 151.—With a few additional details, this work is merely a translation of the Histoire mémorable de la guerre faite par le duc de Savoie, Emmanuel Philibert, contre ses subjects des vallées d'Angrogne, . . . &c. MDLXII.; without place of publication; small 8vo, pp. 30.—And this latter work is itself only an amplified translation of the Storia dell' ultima guerra, &c., published in 1561. (See the authorities of Chaps. i. and ii. of the Second Part of the Israel of the Alps, and No. 2 of § 2 of this section.)

3. MORLAND, "The History of the Evangelical Churches of the valleys of Piemont, containing . . . and punctual relation of the late bloody massacres." London, 1658. One vol., small folio, pp. lx and 709.—This work is analogous to that of Léger, but it appeared before his. It relates especially to the persecution of 1655. Morland was a very young man when he composed this work. He had been sent by Cromwell to the court of Turin, as ambassador extraordinary, on the subject of the Vaudois.

4. "Brief discours des persécutions advenues aux Eglises du Marquisat de Saluces." Geneva (chez Paul Marceau), MDCXX. One vol. 32mo, pp. 132. Followed by an account of the massacres in the Valteline.—A work composed by order of the synod of Dauphiny, held at Briançon, 30th June, 1620. (See the Archives of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva. Register F, folio 8, left-hand page.)

5. "History of the Vaudois persecution in Piedmont," in German, published in 1690; 12mo (library of Berne).—With a few additional details, it is a translation of the work noticed in this section, § 2, No. 8. The same may be said of another German work, entitled, The Palm Tree of Christian Truth; or, the Persecutions of the Protestants and the Vaudois; 12mo, Nürnberg, MDCXC.

6. "Histoire de la négociation des ambassadeurs envoyés au duc de Savoie, par les Cantons Evangeliques, l'année 1686." Basle, MDCXC.; 1 vol. 32mo, pp. 172.

7. "Histoire d'une ambassade des Cantons Evangeliques de la Suisse, au duc de Savoie, en 1655," inserted in the Revue suisse, t. iii. p. 260. (Concerning the events of the year 1655, see the authorities of Chaps. vi.—ix. of Part II. of this work.)

8. "Le banissement des gens de la religion prétendue réformée, hors des estats du duc de Savoye, le tout selon l'ordonnance et arrest de l'inquisition et sénat de Piedmont." Paris, 1619. Small 12mo.—It relates to the Vaudois of Saluces.

9. "Lettres des fidèles du marquisat de Saluces . . . contenant l'histoire de leurs persécutions . . . et des deux martyrs . . ." &c. Geneva, 1619. (See the authorities of Chap ix. of Part I.)

10. "Lettre des fidèles des Vallées de Piémont à MM. les Etats Généraux des Provinces-Unies des Pays-Bas." 1655. (For other original works relating to the same period see the authorities of Chap vi. of Part II.)

11. "Relation en abrégé de ce qui s'est passé de plus remarquable dans le retour des Vaudois au Piémont . . ." &c. The Hague, 1690. (See authorities of Chap. iii. of Part III.)

12. "Sommaire de l'état de la religion dans la vallée de Pragela, . . ." &c. Small 4to, without date or place of publication. (I place this work amongst those favourable to the Vaudois, because it is impartial in its statements of facts, and free from bitterness and passion in its style, although the author was a Catholic and personally hostile to the Vaudois doctrines.)

13. "Notice sur l'état actuel des Eglises vaudoises Protestantes des vallées du Piémont, suivie des ordonnances intolérantes, rendues contre ces chrétiens," &c. Paris, 1822, 8vo. (See mention made of a number of similar works in Chaps. xxiii. and xxiv. of Part III. of the Israel of the Alps.)

14. MOSER, "History of the Vaudois and of their admission into the Duchy of Würtemberg, derived from the most authentic documents." (In German.) Zürich, 1798, one vol. small 8vo. pp. 558; containing proof documents to the number of xix.—Moser was far advanced in years when he composed this work; he promised a continuation of it, but did not publish it. His book is therefore far from being a complete storehouse of materials relative to the Vaudois colonies in Würtemberg.

15. DIETERICI, "History of the Introduction of the Vaudois into Brandenburg." (In German.) Berlin, 1831; 1 vol. 8vo, of xx and 414 pages.—Contains a general sketch of the history of the Vaudois, and an analysis of a great number of letters relative to their introduction into Brandenburg.

16. "Memoires sur l'arrivée des Vaudois à Stendal," contained in the sixth volume of ERMAN and RECLAM. "Memoires pour servir à l'histoire des réfugiés français dans les états du roi" (the King of Prussia).—The most interesting part of the preceding work is borrowed from this. The memoirs of an exile (Memorie di me Bartolomeo Salvajot), a manuscript which extends from 1686 to 1688, complete this narrative.

N.B.—For completion of this paragraph, see part of the authorities of Chaps. v. and vi. of Part I. of the Israel of the Alps, and also those of Chap. viii. of Part III.

§ 4.—Original Authors, not natives of the Valleys, who have written in a spirit unfavourable to the Vaudois.

1. ALBERT CATTANÉE (called De Capitaneis), "De ortu et deletionē Valdensium."—On the events of 1487–1489. Memoirs inserted in the Hist. . . . chap. viii. par Guill. de Saligny. . . . Le tout recueilli par feu M. Godefroy. . . . MDCLXXXIV. Paris, imprimerie royale, folio, of xiv and 759 pages. (See at page 277.)—Cattanée had been specially delegated by Pope Innocent VIII. to exterminate the Vaudois. (See the bull in Léger, Part II. pp. 8–20; Hahn, p. 744; and abridged in Bert, p. 438.) This bull is of date

27th April, 1488. Cattané is styled, Albertus Cattaneus Placentinus, prolegatus apostolicus, archidiaconus Cremonensis, juris doctor. These memoirs themselves formed part of a History of the Kings of France which he composed, but which has not been preserved.

2. RORENGO (called Rorenco), “Memorie storiche dell’ introduzione dell’ heresie nelle valli di Lucerna, Marchesato di Saluzzo e altre di Piemonte, editti, provisioni, diligenze delle Altezze di Savoia, per estisparle, col breve compendio d’ esse e modo facile di confutarle; del Prior Marc’ Aurelio Rorengo, dé conti di Lucerna.” (The armorial bearings of the family are inserted in the title-page.) Turin, 1649, 4to of xx and 350 pages. The name of this author is variously written Rorengo, Rorenychus, and Rorenco, and this even in his book itself (fol. iv, fol. vi. and fol. vii.) The last spelling occurs in the title-page of the following work: “Breve narratione dell’ introduzione de gl’ heretici nelle valli de Piemonte, con gl’ ordini fatti dalle Altezze di Savoia; di Marc’ Aurelio Rorenco, priore e de conti di Luserna e valle.” Turin, 1632, small 4to, pp. 114. This work was merely a study and rough draught of that above-named. Rorengo was a contemporary of Gilles. His work is very valuable upon account of the great number of documents which it contains; but his style wants dignity; and the spirit which he exhibits is not that of impartiality.

3. THEODORE BELVEDERE (his true name was Anthony Lazari): “Relazione all’ eminentissima congregazione de propaganda fide dei luoghi di alaure valli di Piemonte all’ A. R. di Savoia soggette.” . . . Turin (without date, but of the year 1636), small 18mo, pp. 323. “William of Vuitiberg came,” says he, “with an army of Lutherans to the assistance of the French king, and confiscated the possessions of the lords of Lucerna, who were exiled during three years. Then, the government of the country was given to the Prince de Meffi.” Not having been able to satisfy myself regarding these events, I have not mentioned them in the Israel of the Alps, and now point them out for the investigations of historians who may come after me.

4. “Relazione de successi nelle valli di Luserna e Piemonte, l’ anno 1559–1634.” Without date or place of publication.

5. “Relation des événements qui se sont passés entre les Vaudois et le duc de Savoie, faite par ordre de S. M.” . . . Turin, 1655. Published also in Italian: “Somma delle ragione e fondamenti, con quali S. A. R. s’è mossa a prohibiri alli heretici della valle di Luserna l’ habitatione fuori de limiti tollerati;” and in Latin—“Summa rationum quibus regia celsitudo adducta est,” &c. . . . Another similar relation was printed at Villefranche, and a number of others without place of publication. (See in the Israel of the Alps, the authorities of Chap. vi. of Part II.)

6. “Les assemblées sur les affaires des protestants des vallées de Piedmont.” Without date, paging, or place of publication. This pamphlet relates to the years 1662–1664.

7. “Relation de la guerre contre les religionnaires nommés Barbets.” (A work referred to in p. 15 of the work mentioned in this section, § 2, No. 7.) I presume it must be the same with “Relation de la guerre de 1686 contre ceux des vallées.” . . . 4to, pp. 8. Without date or place of publication. At the end of this pamphlet are the words, “Suite de la relation de la défaite des sujets rebelles de S. A. R.” . . . &c.

8. “Le feu de la reconnaissance et de la joye pour la glorieuse victoire remportée sur les hérétiques Vaudois, dans les vallées de Luzerna, par S. A. R. Victor Amé II.” . . . Chambéry, 1686. Not paged.

9. “Recherches historiques sur l’ origin des Vaudois, et sur le caractère de leurs doctrines primitives." Paris, 1836 (chez Perisse), 8vo. This work, published anonymously, is acknowledged by M. Charvaz, Bishop of Pignerol (from 1832 to 1847), on the cover of the book entitled, "Guide du Catéchumène Vaudois." . . . (Paris, chez Perisse, 1840; 3 vols. 18mo.)—The Recherches historiques are designed to prove that the Vaudois were not anterior to Valdo. This work has been translated into Italian. With it may be named, as having been conceived under the same influence, a historic work (very far from being accurate), published at Pignerol in 1846, under the title of Soirées Vaudoises. The talents of M. Charvaz have been rated very high by a number of writers. The motives which induced this prelate to demit his office in 1847, are noticed in a pamphlet entitled, "Un mot au Messagiere Torinese et à la Concordia, sur la démission de Monseigneur Charvaz, évêque de Pignerol, par un défenseur officieux, qui n'est ni un obscurantiste, ni un rétrograde." (Pignerol, printed by Paul Ghighetti, 1848; 8vo, pp. 31.)—The prelate's secretary, the Abbé Jorioz, D.D., wrote upon the same subject, "Réponse à un article du journal la Presse, . . ." (Pignerol, 8th February, 1848; printed by Lobetti-Bodoni; 8vo, pp. 8) See also Sect. iv. § 2, No. 19, of this Bibliography.

SECTION II.—AUTHORS WHO HAVE OCCUPIED THEMSELVES WITH INQUIRIES ON PARTICULAR POINTS CONNECTED WITH THE HISTORY OF THE VAUDOIS.

§ 1.—Latin Treatises.

(Mostly contra Valdenses, and generally relating to the disciples of Valdo of Lyons, and to other Protestants of the middle ages, rather than to the Vaudois of Piedmont.)

1. REYNERUS. "Contra Valdenses." Such is the abridged title by which his work, written in 1250, is generally known. (HERZOG, De origine et pristino statu Waldensium, p. 3.) The exact title is: Summa de Catharis et Leonistis, seu pauperibus de Lugduno. It is sometimes quoted as follows: "Fratris REYNERI SACHONI, ordinis Predicatorum, Summa contra hæreticos; or, 'Summa de Cath. et Leon.'" GRETSEUS, in inserting this treatise into his collection (Opera, t. xii.), has added to this title: "Liber contra Waldenses hæreticos, nunc primum integre ex manuscripto codice editus." This treatise was published by MARTÈNE (Thesaurus novus anecdotorum, t. v., p. 1762.) "Ipsius auctoris ætate exaratus." Is this the original text? It is derived from a Rouen manuscript. D'ARGENTRÉ (Collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus. . . . t. i., p. 48) published it from a Caën manuscript; and ECHARD (Scriptores ordinis Prædicatorum, t. i., p. 154) from a Dublin manuscript. It is also to be found in the Bibliotheca mediæ et infimæ latinitatis, t. vi., p. 47 (edition of Passau), and in the following works: Biblioth. maxima P. P. t. xxv., p. 264; VON-DER-HARDT, Rerum concilii Const. t. iii.; USSER, de gravissima questione, &c. FLACIUS ILLYRICUS published the first six chapters of it (Catal. test. veritatis, No. 267). Reynerus is sometimes designated by the name of Sæcho or Sacchonus. He says of himself: "Ego Rinherus olim hæresiarcha, nunc Dei gratia sacerdos . . . annis xvii. conversatus sum cum eis." (Note of GIESELER, Hist. Eccles., t. iii., p. 598.) He is the most interesting of the authors mentioned in this §. In the third chapter of his work, entitled, "De causis hæreseorum," he enumerates the churches belonging to the heretics of whom he speaks, and he names forty-one, all bearing German or Wallach names. Farther on, he points out, in a general way, the churches of the Cathari, to the number of sixteen (caput xvi.) He bestows high praise upon the Leonists and Vaudois, even in contending against them, speaking especially of their attachment to the Bible, and the purity of their lives. He says of them: "Nullum sanctum credunt nisi Apostolos; nullum invocant nisi Deum solum . . . Legendas sanctorum non credunt; miracula eorum subsannant; reliquias contemnunt . . . dicunt quod omne peccatum sit mortale et nullum veniale . . . et ita, Lombardiam intrantes, visitant episcopos suos." (cap. v.) Concerning a PSEUDO-REINERUS, an interpolator of this work, see GIESELER, De Rainerii Sacconi summa de Catharis et Leonistis, commentatio critica (Goettingæ, 1834); and the Hist. Eccles. of the same author, 4th ed., ii., 613. Léger supposed that there were two authors of the name of Reynerus. (Histoire gén. p. 170, note 2.) His error, no doubt, arose from the circumstance that our author has been placed by FRÉHÉRUS amongst the Scriptores rerum Bohemicarum. It appears to me that he ought to be quoted with great caution as an authority in matters of history concerning the Vaudois of Piedmont; and I have abstained from quoting him in this latter work. The same observation applies with still greater force to most of the following authors. See also, concerning the interpolations to which the work of Reynerus has been subjected, and concerning other particulars, the work of M. SCHMIDT on the Cathari (vol. ii., note xvi.)

2. PILICHDORF. "Contra hæresin Waldensium." (Published by Gretserus, t. xii. second part; and in the Bibl. Max. Patrum, t. xxv., p. 278.) This treatise contains thirty-six chapters. It acknowledges that the origin of the Vaudois may be traced back to the time of Pope Sylvester (§ i.) In a subsequent place the author says, "Dixit Christus: Vos estis lux mundi" (§ x.); and he reproaches the Vaudois for concealing themselves (§ xi.) and afterwards he mentions the reply of one of them, "Non possum esse talis Lucerna publica, propter instantes persecutiones, quia vocant me hæreticum." (§ xiii.) This author must belong to the end of the fourteenth century. His style is in general bad, and he abounds in injurious epithets.

3. EBERHARD DE BÉTHUNE. (Eberhardus Bethunniensis.) "Liber anti hæresis;" published under the title of "Contra Valdenses," by Gretserus, tom. xii.; Bibl. Max. Patrum, t. xxiv. "ERMENGARD, Opusculum contra hæreticos qui dicunt et credunt mundum istum et omnia visibilia, non esse a Deo facta sed a Diabolo." (It may be seen in Gretserus, t. xii.) The mention made of the Vaudois is merely incidental. The editor himself says, "Nec scio an itaque contra Valdenses." (Præloquia.) For further particulars concerning these authors, see Schmidt, Hist. of the Cathari, vol. ii. note xvi.

4. GRETSERUS, who published the works of the three preceding authors under the title of Trias contra Valdensium sectam, prefixed to them a treatise of which he was himself the author: "Prolegomena in Scriptores contra Valdenses;" and after the work of Pilichdorf, he gives a "Refutatio errorum quibus Waldenses distinentur, INCERTO AUCTORE. (Gretzeri Opera, edition of Ingolstadt, t. xii., and Max. Bibl. Patrum, t. xxiv.)

5. ALAIN DE L'ISLE (Alanus de Insulis), or simply Alain. "Adversus hæreticos et Waldenses qui postea Albigenenses dicti sunt." More frequently cited thus—"Contra hæreticos sui temporis," and by different authors under various other titles. It is to be found in "Alani Theologi insignis opus." . . . Antwerp, 1654, fol., p. 199. The first two books of this treatise were published separately at Paris in 1612, in 8vo, under this title, "Contra Valdenses, Judeos, et Paganos;" the last two appear under another title in the Bibl. Script. Cistercensium, Cologne, 1656. For more particulars concerning this author, his homonyme and his works, see Schmidt's History of the Cathari, vol. ii., note xvi.

6. BERNARD DE FONTCAUD (Bernardus de Fonte Calido). "Contra Valdenses et Arianos." The Vaudois are very little spoken of in this work. However, the author says in his preface, "Valdenses dicti sunt nimirum a valle densa." Valdo is not even named in the work. See also Histoire littéraire de France, t. xv., p. 35. The author belongs to the twelfth century.

7. MONETA. "Adversus Catharos et Valdenses." A thick folio volume, edited by Richinius, at Rome, in 1743. The editor has prefixed to the work an introduction concerning the life and writings of the author, who lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century; and two dissertations—the first, "De Catharis," and the second, "De Valdensibus." In § i., he says, "Valdensium nomen non peculiari alicujus sectae, aut hæreseos, sed commune omnium a seculo 12mo . . . nec desunt qui sic doctos (Valdenses) velint, a voce Italica, Valdesi."

8. STEPHEN DE BORBONNE (Stephanus de Bella Villa). "De septem donis spiritus sancti." Published in D'ARGENTRÉ, Collectio judic. de novis erroribus, t. i., pp. 85–91. See also ECHARD, t. i., pp. 184–196. There is a MS. of the Septem dona at Paris, in the library of the Sorbonne, No. 938.—Herzog says, "Hæc narratio majoris momenti esse videtur, cum quod Stephanus ipse vidit virum cum Waldo societate conjunctum . . . denique quod multorum Waldensium confessiones, ut inquisitor ipse audiit." (Cap. i., p. 3.)

9. YVONETUS. "Tractatus de hæresi pauperum de Lugduno;" cited thus, "Contra hæreses Valdenses, libri quatuor." It is to be seen in MARTÈNE, Thes. Anecd., t. v., fol., 1778.

10. GUIDO DE PERPINIACO. "Summa de hæresibus et earum confutationibus;" Paris, published by Josse Badius, 1523, fol. The author of this work was Guido of Perpignan, a Carmelite, who was Bishop of Elne about 1342. He speaks of the Vaudois, beginning on the first page of fol. 79, but confines himself to stating and refuting their doctrines. (For this note I am indebted to M. Schmidt.)

11. GUALTERUS MAPES, Archdeacon of Oxford, who saw and heard the disciples of Valdo at the Council of Lateran in 1179, wrote a short dissertation De Sectâ Valdesiorum, inserted in USSER, "De Christianae Ecclesiae successionem et statu, Historica Explanatio." London, 1687.

12. CLAUDE COUSSORD. "Valdensium et quorundam aliorum errores, præcipuas ac pene omnes, quae nunc vigent, hæreses continentes." Paris, published by Thomas Richard, 1548, 8vo. This book is directed against the Lutherans. The refutation of the Vaudois doctrines commences in fol. 41. These doctrines are taken word for word from the catalogue drawn up by Yvonetus (No. 9 above). This catalogue is inserted in fol. 126, et seq., under the erroneous title of Valdensium errorum catalogus, sive summa Fratris Reinerii. Coussord says that he derived it from an old manuscript, which probably contained the Summa of Reynerus, and after it the catalogue of Yvonetus, and hence the error. (For this note I am indebted to M. Schmidt.)

13. In this work of Coussord (or Coussart) is to be found also a "Disputatio inter Catholicum et Paterinum hæreticum," a production of the thirteenth century. It has been inserted by Martène and Durand, in the Thes. nov. Anecd. t. v., fol., 1755, et seq. Concerning it, see Schmidt's History of the Cathari, vol. ii., p. 311.

14. CLAUDE SEYSSSEL. "Adversus Valdenses disputationes," 8vo, 1547—a thick volume in black letter. This work has served as the basis for a great number of dissertations; amongst others, "La doctrine des Vaudois, dressée par Claude Seyssel et Claude Coussart, théologiens de Paris, avec notes dressées par Jean Cappel;" Sedan, 1618, 8vo. Seyssel was Archbishop of Turin.

§ 2.—Academic Theses.

1. DANHAUERUS (John Conrad). "Ecclesia Waldensium, orthodoxiæ Lutheranæ testis et socia." Argent. (Strasburg) 4to, 1663. Since published also by HESTERBERG, with a preface.

2. HAVER (John Christopher). "Oratio de Waldensium ortu, progressu, et persecutionibus." 4to, Aldorf, 1686.

3. GILLES STRAUCH (Algidii Strauchii). "Disquisitio historico-theologica de Valdensibus." Witebergæ, 4to. The first part appeared in 1659, the second in 1663.

4. WERENFELSIUS (Peter Verenfels). "De Valdensibus." He chiefly treats of their origin and their doctrines. The first part of his thesis was published at Basle in 1695, the second in 1700, in 4to.

5. HOUERT (Van der). "De Valdensium, Bohemorum, et Moravorum, fide et religione." 4to. (I do not know the date nor the place of publication.)

6. KIESLING (Kieslingus). "Dissertatio historico-theologica, de variis Waldensium veritatis testium nominibus et sectis." 4to, Jena, 1739.

7. JAS. "Disputatio Academica, de Valdensium secta, ab Albigenisbus recte distinguenda." Lyons, 1834, 4to, of about 150 pages. An excellent work. Amongst the moderns, I have elsewhere cited REYNAUDIN, PEYRANI, BASTIE, ROMAN, &c.

8. MAYERHOFF, "Kritische Beleuchtung des Ursprungs und der namen der Waldenser." 8vo, 1834.

9. WEHNMAYER (Elias). "Dissertatio historica, de vicissitudinibus et fatis Waldensium." Witebergæ, 1690, 4to.

10. MARTINETUS. "Apologia veræ doctrinæ eorum qui vulgo appellantur Waldenses." Lugduni Batavorum, 1738.

11. HESTERBERG. "De ecclesia Waldensium." Argentorati, 1768.

12. PLARESIUS. "Dissertatio de Waldensibus." Groningæ, 1660, cited by Martinetus.

13. A pamphlet, without the name of the author, on the antiquity of the Vaudois Churches in the Valleys of Piedmont; 4to, Utrecht, 1662.

14. FRISCHIUS. "Disquisitio historico-theologica de Waldensibus." Viëtembergæ, 1650.

15. WESEMBECIUS (Peter). "Oratio de Waldensibus et Albigenisbus Christianis, ab anno 1585." Jena, 1603; reprinted at Leipzig by Menger, in 1610, and inserted by Camerarius at the end of his work. (Historica narratio, &c.; Heidelberg, without date on the title page, but bearing that of 1605 at the end of the preface.)

16. HERZOG. "De origine et pristino statu Waldensium, secundum antiquissima eorum scripta, cum libris Catholicorum ejusdem aevi collata." Halle, 1849; 4to, pp. 44. A work of merit and of erudition, interesting especially on account of the parallel which it exhibits between the doctrines of the Cathari and those of the Vaudois. (Cap. iii. p. 7.) The fundamental idea of this work is an excellent one—the comparison of Vaudois books with Catholic contemporary writings; but it has not been developed as much as it is capable of being, in consequence of the small number of the original works hitherto published. The work of M. Herzog is divided into eight chapters, treating—I. Of Catholic and Vaudois books in general, pp. 2–5. II. Whether the Vaudois books were known to the Catholic authors, pp. 5–7. III. The Christian Faith of the Vaudois, pp. 7–13. IV. Their Catholic Faith, pp. 13–16. Chapters V. VI. and VII. contain an examination of different points of Vaudois doctrine.

VIII. Of the period to which the Nobla Leyczon is to be referred, and of the other Vaudois books and the name of Valdo. The very distinguished author of this thesis, thinks that the Vaudois derive their origin only from Valdo.

The same author has since published at Halle, a work on the Vaudois, "Die romanischen Waldenser," which I regret that I have not been able to procure. [Some notice of this important work will be given in a subsequent appendix by the translator.]

§ 3.—Various Authors.

1. LYDIUS. "Waldensia: id est conservatio veræ Ecclesiæ demonstrata ex confessionibus, cum Taboritarum, ante ducentos ferme annos, tum Bohemorum, &c." Rotterdam, 1616, 2 vols. 8vo. (The second volume is entitled, Waldensium, Tomus Secundus, &c.) Concerning the relation between the Vaudois church and the church of Bohemia, see also EHWALT, "Doctrine ancienne et moderne des Frères Bohémiens et Moraves"—(at p. 660, he inserts the Vaudois catechism, entitled Interrogations menors); LUZITIUS, "De disciplina ecclesiastica, moribus et institutionibus Fratrum Bohemicorum," Amst., 1660; COMMENTUS, "Hist. Ecclesiæ Fratrum Bohem."—(may be seen in STRUVIUS: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum); ESROM RUDIGER, "Narratiuncula de Ecclesiis Frat. in Bohemia;" CAMERARIUS, "Historica narratio de fratribus orthodox. ecclesiis in Bohemia," Heidelberg, 1606. A rarer work is "Historica persecutionum Ecclesiæ Bohemicæ. . . ab anno 894 ad an. 1632," 12mo, printed in 1648. It mentions the Vaudois in Chap. xx. § 5. Besides these may be named ÆNEAS SYLVIUS (afterwards Pope, under the name of Pius II., from 1458 to 1464), DUBRAVIUS (Bishop of Olmutz); STRANSKY, SCHULZE, TITTLE, HENSEL, ANDREA, &c., who have written works on the church of Bohemia. Amongst modern authors, M. BOST deserves to be named. "Histoire ancienne et moderne des frères de Bohême et de Moravie." Geneva, 1831; 2 vols. 8vo. He speaks of the Vaudois, t. ii., liv. 3. (He has composed for them the music of a number of national songs, intended to recal the principal events of their history.)

2. FUESSELIN (John Conrad). "De gemina Albigensium et Valdensium distinctione." Inserted in the Nova Miscellanea of Leipzig, t. x., p. 3. FUESSELIN is the author of a History of the sects and heresies of the middle ages (in German), Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1770; 3 vols. 8vo. He speaks at great length of the Vaudois.

3. For the history of the Albigeois: WILLIAM DE PUY LAURENS (de Podio Laur-entii). "Historia negotii Francorum adversus Albigenes," inserted in Duchesne, Scriptores Historiæ Francorum, t. v., p. 666, and in several more recent collections. The author was chaplain to the Count of Toulouse, and secretary to the bishop of that city.—PETER DE VAUCERNAY. "Historia Albigensium." This work has been translated into French.—Extracts in prose, from the Languedoc poem published by M. Fauriel, are to be seen in the Histoire générale de Languedoc, t. iii., Preuves No. I., and in the collection of French MSS., t. xix.—Chaufepié, in his Dictionnaire historique et critique, quotes a MS., entitled, "Ce qui fut fait par les Inquisiteurs contre les Albigeois, depuis le 21 Janvier, 1311, jusqu' au 24 October, 1319. (Lettre J, pp. 80, 81)." This MS. has been published by Limborch, at the end of his Historia Inquisitionis.—Finally, and principally, SCHMIDT. History of the Albigenes or Cathari (see No. 26 of this §). The question of the connection between the Vaudois and Albigeois is far from being cleared up. The connection itself is very hypothetical. (See, on this subject, other works cited in No. 21 of this §, and in Nos. 15 and 16 of Section III. of this Bibliography.) With this branch of study may be united that of the Petro- brusians, with whom the Vaudois more probably had some connection, as Peter de Bruys was a native of the Val Louise. See Father ALBERT, Histoire ecclésiastique d'Embrun, t. i., p. 56; HECKER, Disputationes de Petrobrusianis, Leypzig, 1721; HARENBERG, Otia sacra. (The tenth thesis is entitled, Valdenses Petro de Valdo antiquiores); NEANDER, Life of Saint Bernard (in German), &c.

4. ALLIX. "Some remarks upon the Ecclesiastical History of the ancient churches of Piémont." London, 1690; 4to. Winer mentions a second edition, published in 1692. This work has not, properly speaking, any historic value. Its object is to prove the apostolic descent of the Vaudois. It derives a particular value, however, from the publication of three ancient Vaudois MSS. at the end of the volume. These MSS. were once at Cambridge, and have recently been rediscovered in Dublin. (Library of Trinity College, class C, shelf 4, No. XVIII., vols. viii. and ix.) Léger gives a translation of one of them (t. ii., p. 21); Basnage (t. ii. p. 1440) and Perrin (pp. 133 and 135) speak of the other two.—See also The Barque of the Church for the Friends of Religion (a German work). Zürich, 1764 (p. 210).

5. DU PLESSIS MORNAY, "Mysterium iniquitatis seu historia Papatus," speaks of the Vaudois at pp. 304, 406, 458, &c. Of this book there are many editions; that which I quote is the edition of Goricheim, 1662. With this may be noticed the Historia Papatus, by HEIDEGGER, which speaks of the Vaudois at p. 415. FLACIUS ILLYRICUS also wrote a Historia de primatu Papæ, in which he speaks of the Vaudois, § 267, pp. 630–660. His Catalogus testium veritatis—Strasburg, 1562, and Frankfort, 1666, with notes and supplements, at the end of which the preceding work is printed—also contains many things relative to the Vaudois.

6. KOECHER. A Catechetical History of the Vaudois, the Bohemian Brethren, &c. (In German), Jena, 1768. All that concerns the Vaudois in this work is their own excellent little catechism in the Romance tongue, entitled Interrogations menors, which is inserted in it, and which had been already published by Perrin, p. 157, and Léger, p. 58; and which is also given by Monastier, ii. 297, Hahn, pp. 673–679, and was separately published at Edinburgh in 1836. The original is amongst the Vaudois MSS. in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, class C, shelf 5, No. XXII., fol. 284–292.—Along with this work may be named the Duplex confessio Valdensium, folio, 1512 (a work which I have never seen).

7. VAN BREENN. "Apologetic Memoirs concerning the Vaudois, with an appendix, from 1642 to 1655. (In Dutch), Amsterdam, 1663." With this may be compared a modern German work, entitled, "The Ecclesiastical Government of the Vaudois Communities of Piedmont, by Weiss, pastor and clerk of the Synod of Zürich. (Die Kirchenverfassung der Piemontessichen, . . . &c)." Zürich, 1834; 8vo of viii and 76 pages.

8. DU CLERCQ (Jacques). "Mémoires sur la Vaudoiserie d'Arras." Printed in BUCHON'S Collection des Chroniques. Paris (Verdière), 1826, 8vo; t. xxxix. The title of these memoirs is much longer than I have given above. The first part commences thus:—"Of a woman named Demiselle, who was taken as a Vaudois in the town of Douay, and brought a prisoner to the city of Arras . . ." &c. DU CLERCQ is the continuator of MONSTRELET. There are some curious particulars in his chronicle. The style is characterized by an interesting simplicity; but the subject of which he treats is very remote from the history of the Vaudois of Piedmont. In this respect his work may be ranked along with the memoir of M. BOURQUELOT, entitled, Notice sur les sorciers Vaudois, inserted in vol. viii. of the Bibliothèque de l'Ecole de Chartes.

¹ The spelling of the French words is antiquated.—TRANSL.

9. PRATEOLUS. "De ritis, sectis, et dogmatibus omnium hæreticorum." Cologne, 1569, fol. Of little value.—ENGELHARDT. "Dissertations on various points of Ecclesiastical History" (in German). The subject of the Vaudois is incidentally treated of.—A German work, entitled, Universal Chronicles, contains more details. See the fifth part, p. 179; t. iv., p. 47; t. viii., p. 611; t. xi., pp. 7, 12, 338; t. xix., p. 695.—See also the Magdeburg Centuries (a Latin work), century x. and century xii., ch. 18, &c.

10. DE PARAMO. "De origine, officio, et progressu sanctæ Inquisitionis," fol. Madrid, 1598; Antwerp, 1619.—With which may be classed, EYMERICUS, Directorium Inquisitionum, Rome, 1570, (he speaks of the Vaudois at p. 282), and Doctrina de modo procedendi contra hæreticos, inserted in MARTÈNE, Thes. Anecdotorum, t. v., p. 1795; also, Forma qualiter hæretici hæreticant hæreticos, inserted in the Thesaurus novorum Anecdotorum, t. v., p. 1776, and Liber sententiarum Inquisitionis Tolosanae, published by LIMBORCH. See also chap. i. of book ii. of Perrin (p. 106), and chap. iii. (p. 132).

11. BENOIT (Elie). "Histoire de l'Edit de Nantes;" 5 vols. 4to, Delft, 1693–95. Translated into Dutch; Amsterdam, 1696, fol.—RULHIÈRES, "Eclaircissements historiques sur les causes de la révocation de l'Edit de Nantes, et sur l'état du protestantisme en France, depuis Louis XIV. jusqu' à nos jours." Without place of publication; 2 vols. 8vo, 1788.—BERNARD, Explication de l'Edit de Nantes, and La politique du clergé de France, 1 vol. 32mo; Amsterdam, 1682. He speaks of the Vaudois at p. 152.—Les soupirs de la France esclavée (a work which has become rare); also, Les derniers efforts de l'innocence opprimée; Ville-Franche, 1682, 2 vols. 32mo, of 236 and 212 pages.

12. "Voix de pleurs et de lamentations." Printed at Ville-Franche, in MDCLX.; small 4to, pp. 402. The first chapter of the second part (p. 178) relates to the Vaudois. See, in the Israel of the Alps, the authorities for Part II., chap. vii. (For this rare little work I am indebted to Dr. Long of Die, the author of a Memoire sur les Allobroges, which obtained the prize of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, and I take this opportunity of publicly expressing my obligation to him.)

13. Along with this work may be mentioned the Lamentation or Elegy on the Massacres of 1655 (in German, in the library of Berne); and a piece in verse, entitled, "Le cantique des Vallées du Piémont, sur les actes funestes de leurs massacres et de leur paix," relating also to the events of 1655, and printed at the end of a "Lettre des protestants du Piémont, a Mylord, Protecteur d'Angleterre," without date or place of publication. Also, "L'huile décollant du rocher, ou consolations adressées à nos frères des Vallées, exilés." Printed in 1688. Also, Lamentations de Sion, ou précis et véritable récit de la triste position des églises de Piémont, . . . &c. Middlesburgh, 1662.

14. RAYNOUARD. "Choix de poésies originales des Troubadours;" Paris, 1816, 6 vols. 8vo. In vol. ii., he places amongst the Primitive Monuments of the Romance language, or rather he names as the sole monuments of the Romance language, the Nobla Leyczon, which he gives entire, and the ancient Vaudois poems, of which he only quotes fragments. HAHN has published them entire in pp. 560–604 of his History of the Vaudois and collateral sects (in German); Stuttgart, 1847, an 8vo vol. of 822 pages, with a map. MILLOT, in his Hist. littéraire des Troubadours also speaks of the Vaudois (t. ii., p. 42). See also PARADIN, Annales de Bourgogne, book ii., p. 247, &c.

15. BOSSUET, in his "Histoire des variations des Eglises Protestantes . . ."

(Numerous editions), book xi., § c, et seq., treats of the Vaudois. He expresses doubt of the existence of their ancient manuscripts, which had then disappeared, but which have since been discovered again in Dublin and elsewhere. This work is full of erudition, and is, in general, very correct in its details; but this does not prevent its author from giving a very false idea of the Protestant churches, and particularly of the Reformers; for details selected from one quarter and from another, displaced and arranged in a new order, can no more represent the whole from which they were taken than a piece of oak furniture can give an idea of the tree. Bossuet sets out from the principle that truth is one, and does not prove it; Celsus started from the same principle to combat Christianity. There are many refutations of this work. One of the most worthy of notice is, "Introductio in memorabilia Ecclesiasticæ historiæ sacra." (Weisman, Halle, 1745.)

16. HERING. "Contributions to the History of the Reformed." (In German); pp. 19-26 relate to the Vaudois. "General History of the Jesuits, from the origin of that order to the present day" (in the same language), Zürich, 1789. See vol. i., p. 226, et seq.—Another History of the Jesuits, by WOLF (also in German), speaks of the Vaudois in vol. i., p. 223. See also MÉNARD, Hist. de la ville de Nîmes . . ." 4to, 1750; proof documents, vol. i., p. 73.

17. MARNIX DE SAINTE ALDEGONDE. "Tableau des différends de la religion;" 2 vols. 8vo, La Rochelle, 1601. This work is frequently quoted by Perrin. It is of little importance in a historical point of view, but it is written with much energy, sometimes mingled with a sort of bitter pleasantry, which gives it an originality of character entirely its own. The author was not contented with writing, he also went out to battle in the cause of Protestantism. His work has become rare.

18. RUCHAT. "Histoire de la Réformation en Suisse, où l'on voit tout ce qui s'est passé de plus remarquable, depuis l'an 1516 jusqu'à l'an 1556 . . ." 6 vols. 8vo.; Geneva, 1728. The continuation of this work, which existed in manuscript, was published in 1835-1838. Mention is made in it, and particulars given of the embassy sent by the Vaudois to the Reformers in 1530. See vol. ii., p. 330, and vol. iii., p. 175. In the new edition, see Appendix, p. 556. See also the History of the Swiss Confederation, by JOHN DE MULLER, continued by HOTTINGER, VULLIEMIN, and MONNARD. See also FLATHE, "Geschichte der Vorläufer der Reformation" (Leipzig), vol. i.

19. CALVOER (Gaspard). "Fissura (or Fissuræ) Sionis; hoc est, de schismatibus ac controversiis quæ ecclesiam agitarunt;" Leipzig, 1690. A work of learning, but little known. The Vaudois are spoken of, p. 354.

20. The Abbé MARTIN DE CLAUSONNE wrote a book against Vulçon, councillor of the parliament of Grenoble. (I do not know the exact title.) This Vulçon is the same who communicated to Perrin the "Enquêtes juridiques, poursuivies contre les Vaudois par les évêques d'Embrun," which had fallen into the hands of a soldier at the time of the sack of that city by Lesdiguières. (Perrin, pp. 114, 127, 131, 137, 141, and the preface.) The Abbé de Clausonne repeats against the Vaudois all the accusations of their most unworthy adversaries. His twentieth chapter is entitled, A Reply on those points which the Minister Perrin stigmatizes as calumnious. See also FLORIMOND DE REMOND, "De l'antéchrist," ch. vii., No. 7; and the MS. of FOURNIER, "Histoire des Alpes maritimes ou Cottiennes, particulièrement d'Embrun leur métropolitaine," p. 71. (In folio, in the libraries of Gap and Lyons.)

21. DE SAINT MICHEL (Jacques). "L'histoire et le cours des hérésies des Vaudois et des Albigeois," 8vo, Toulouse, 1676.—PANTALÉON, "De rebus in ecclesia gestis," lib. v.—Gulielmus MERPBURCENSIS, De rebus Angliæ, lib. iii., and in the Scriptores Anglici, published at London in 1652, in folio; the Chronicon ad annum MCLXXVII., folio, 1441.—Likewise the Annales of MALVENDA, ch. iv., ad ann. MCCXX., and the Fasciculus of Orthuinus GRATIUS; fol., Cologne, 1535, pp. 81–95; also the "Fasciculus rerum expectandarum et fugiendarum," in which the epistle of the Vaudois to King Ladislas is given.—Also, SERRARIUS, Trihæresium, lib. i., ch. v.; and DE VINEIS, Constitutiones, lib. i., ep. 25–27.

22. SISMONDI, "Histoire des répub. d'Italie," vol. xvii., &c.—"Histoire des ducs de Savoie," by FRAIZET and others.—CHIESA, "Corona vale di Savoia," &c.—SCLOPIS, "Storia dell' antiche legge del Piemonte."—(In sect. VI. I will notice the works of MM. Cibraria, De Saluces, and De Beauregard.)—Amongst works restricted to more particular subjects, may be named the Histoire d'Emm. Philibert, duc de Savoie. . . . Amsterdam, 1693; and in Latin, "De vita Emmanuelis Philiberti, Allobrogum Ducis, et Subalpinorum principis, libri duo JOHANNIS TONSI, patricii Mediolanensis," fol., Aug. Taur., 1596.

23. FABER (George Stanley), B.D. "An Inquiry into the history and theology of the ancient Vallenses and Albigenes;" London, 1838; 8vo, of 596 pages.—"History of the Christian Church, from the birth of Christ to the eighteenth century, containing interesting particulars relative to the Waldenses and Albigenes, by William JONES;" third edition, 8vo; London, 1818. The second volume and the fourth chapter of the first volume relate to the Vaudois. This author connects them with the Paulicians, as Faber does. A fourth edition of this work appeared at London in 1820. In this edition, the particulars relative to the Vaudois announced in the title are to be found in the eighth volume.

24. GILLY (William Stephen), D.D. "Waldensian Researches during a second visit to the Waldenses," &c. . . . 8vo; London, 1830. Also, under another title, Researches among the Waldenses. A work of learning. Also, by the same author, The Vaudois, Valdo, and Vigilantius; London, 1841, an 8vo of 69 pages, consisting of three articles, originally published in the seventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. This study led to a new work, Vigilantius and his Times, by W. S. Gilly, D.D.; London, 1844; 8vo, pp. xvi and 488. Other works by the same author will be mentioned in section V. § 1.

25. ELLIOT. "Horæ Apocalypticæ" (a critical and historical commentary upon the Apocalypse, in English), 3 vols. 8vo; London, 1844. In vol. ii., the Vaudois are spoken of at much length as being the two witnesses (Rev. xi.) who appear as dead for three days and a half (ver. 9, 11), which this author explains by the three years and a half of exile endured by the inhabitants of the valleys, whom he considers as the depositaries of the Old and New Testaments, applying to this vers. 5, 6, and 7.

26. SCHMIDT. "Histoire et doctrine de la secte des Cathares ou Albigeois." Paris, 1849, 2 vols. 8vo, the first of xii and 392 pages, the second of 320 pages. This work is full of great learning, but acknowledges that for the exposition of the doctrinal system of the Cathari, we are reduced to the sole testimony of the adversaries of that sect (vol. i., p. 4). These words awaken a desire for the discovery of some original doctrinal writings, which might enable us to separate the Albigeois from the Dualists, with whom they are identified in this work. M. Schmidt devotes the tenth note of his second volume to the examination of the origin of the Vaudois (p. 287). He thinks that they were not anterior to Valdo, and that we cannot connect them with Claude of Turin, because the latter was not separated from the Roman church (p. 288). But neither did the Vaudois ever separate themselves from it, otherwise than as remaining attached to the gospel, they found themselves isolated, when the Church of Rome had separated itself from the sacred code (see chap. i. of the Israel of the Alps). M. Schmidt rests also upon the fact, that no mention is made of the Vaudois from the time of Claude to that of Valdo (p. 288). But are there not peoples of whom history makes no mention for centuries, because nothing remarkable has occurred, or because chroniclers have been wanting, or because the chronicles have been lost? And does this prove that these peoples did not exist? In the third place, he says (p. 290), the Nobla Leyczon makes mention of the Vaudois, and bears date the 1100th year. This date is not disputed; but, according to the literal sense of the text, the one thousand and one hundred years completed at the period when this poem was composed (l. 6), ought to be reckoned only from the time when the prophecy was written which is contained in the 24th chapter of Matthew's gospel, or in Rev. xix.-xxi., which will bring the date from the year 1139 to the year 1196 or thereby, i.e., to the very time of Valdo. This is true; but (1), it is difficult to ascribe to the author of a poem an exegesis so minutely accurate, when the theologians of his time committed so many anachronisms, and as even in our own day, the date of the composition of the above-mentioned books of Scripture is not perfectly known. (2.) It seems to me more difficult, considering the circumstances of the times, to ascribe the Nobla Leyczon to the disciples of Valdo, and to place its composition at the end of the twelfth century, than to maintain the opinion that it emanated from the Vaudois of the eleventh. (See in this Bibliography, part II., sect. I., § 3, MS. 207, article 5.) (3), Finally, there is not more reason for taking as a point of departure the composition of the Apocalypse, than that of the gospel according to Matthew, which was half a century earlier, and which consequently would still place the composition of the Nobla Leyczon a generation before Valdo. M. Schmidt also says that the name Vaudois cannot come from vaud or vauz, or the Latin vallis, or it would be Vallenses and not Valdenses (p. 289). But we have in reality the name which he thus demands; De Thou calls the Vaudois Convallenses (Hist., lib. xxvii.); and if he be set aside as a modern author, I will adduce Eberhard or Evrard de Béthune, who belongs to the thirteenth century, and who says: "Vallenses se appellant, eo quod in valle lachrymarum maneant" (Liber antihæresis, chap. xxv.) Finally, I will remark, that many words are formed in a manner contrary to the grammatical rules of etymology, and that the irregularity of their formation proves nothing against its reality. M. Schmidt himself quotes (p. 289) a few lines of a Strasbourg MS., which was unknown to me, and which belongs to the thirteenth century, in which it is said, "Valdenses dicuntur . . . a valle . . . quia in valle orti sunt." The opinion, therefore, that the name of the Vaudois is derived from the valleys which they inhabit, is not of recent origin—nay, it was shared by Bernard de Fontcaud, a contemporary of Valdo himself. "Valdenses dicuntur a valle densa, eo quod profundis et densis errorum tenebris involvantur" (Gretzeri opera, t. xii., part ii., p. 196).

"Finally," adds M. Schmidt (pp. 291, 292), "the Nobla Leyczon speaks of the Vaudois as being already persecuted (l. 368, et seq.) But history makes mention of no persecution of the Vaudois before the end of the twelfth century." (There are many things of which history makes no mention. Of how many things concerning the Cathari was history silent, until the publication of the work of M. Schmidt! Does it follow that there was no reality in these things?) "The name of the Vaudois heretics, becoming an object of hatred to the Catholics, was employed by them to designate detestable crimes; the terms Cathari,

. . . &c., have had the same fate. This employment of the word in another than its primary sense, refers us to a period when that primary sense was generally familiar to people's minds, and when the sect which bore this name was generally hated and persecuted. This could not be the period of the origin of the Vaudois church" (Hist. des Cathares, ii., 292). Thus M. Schmidt writes; and from this I think it a fair inference that the origin of the Vaudois church was much anterior to the writings which it has left.

According to M. Schmidt, in fact, the Nobla Leyczon must have been composed at a period when the name of the Vaudois was already well known; and this period could not have been that of their origin. According to him, again, the Nobla Leyczon must have been composed, at the latest, in 1196; and in that case, it cannot be attributed to the disciples of Valdo, because this was precisely the period of their origin. But it could not have been composed at a later date, because 1196 is the last limit of which the context will admit. It must, therefore, have been composed before that time, that is to say, before the origin of the Vaudois of Lyons. There must then have been other Vaudois, because the name of Vaudois occurs in this poem (l. 372). And it is natural to think that these Vaudois were those of the Vaudois valleys, because the idiom in which the poem is written, is not that of the Lyonnais, but rather that of the valleys. (See part II, sect. I., § 1, art. 7, of this Bibliography.)

Why should we not admit that the Nobla Leyczon was composed at the date which itself indicates (l. 6), viz., about the year 1100? I will add, on the authority of M. Schmidt, that at this very period the name of the Vaudois was already familiar to people's minds, which proves that they had already existed for a long time, and establishes the fact of their existence at least from the eleventh century. It seems to me, therefore, that the learned author to whose arguments I reply, and to whom I am indebted for valuable corrections in this Bibliography, has no good ground for asserting that the Vaudois of Piedmont owe their origin to Valdo.

SECTION III.—HISTORIC WORKS ON THE VAUDOIS, DERIVED FROM ORIGINAL SOURCES, AND CONTRIBUTING TO THE MORE COMPLETE ELUCIDATION OF THE SUBJECT.

1. MARTINET (J. Florent). "Événements relatifs aux Eglises des Vaudois des vallées du Piémont, jusqu' à ce jour." Amst., 1775; 1 vol. 8vo. (The original of this work is in Dutch: "Kerkelyke Geschiednis der Waldenzen," &c.)

2. "Histoire des chrétiens, communément nommés Vaudois, pendant les douze premiers siècles." Haarlem, 1765. The first edition had appeared at Amsterdam in 1732, with the title: "Historie der Christenen, die men gemeenlyk Waldensen noemt." 1 vol. 8vo.

3. "Chronique des Vaudois, depuis 1160 à 1655," par D. S., professeur à Zürich. Of this work there were several editions. The first was in German, at Zürich, in 1655. It was reprinted that same year at Schaffhausen—translated into Dutch, and published at Amsterdam in 1656—translated into French, and printed at Geneva, also in 1656.

4. GRASSERN (John James). Waldensian Chronicle, 8vo; Basle, 1623. The original title is: "Waldenser Chronik, von den Verfolgungen. . . . Jetzt erst in's Teutsch gebracht durch Johann Jacob Grassern." Quoted by Hahn, p. 13.

5. CAPPEL. "Vallium Alpinarum trajecta portenta." . . . Sedan, 1621. James Cappel, seigneur of Le Tilloy, was first a Protestant minister at Rennes, afterwards Professor of Hebrew and of Theology. He died in 1624. He wrote also a treatise on the doctrine of the Vaudois, published at Sedan in 1618.

6. "Histoire véritable de l'état des pauvres églises évangéliques et vaudoises des vallées du Piedmont depuis les horribles massacres et incomparables désolations qu'elles ont souffertes l'an 1655, jusqu'au 17 Février, 1662." 4to; Middelburgh, 1662.

7. BOYER. "Abrégé de l'Histoire des Vaudois, où l'on voit," &c. La Haye, MDCXCI.; 1 vol. 32mo, of xxviii and 336 pages. This is a little work of great interest. It was written at the very time of the return of the Vaudois to their own country, in 1690; but contains so few particulars relative to that event, as may show us what history would have lost, if Arnaud had not published his narrative.

8. "Histoire des persécutions des vallées du Piémont." 12mo, Rotterdam, 1688; chiefly relating to the expulsion of 1686.

9. "An account of the late persecution of the Waldenses, by the Duke of Savoy and the French king, in the year 1686." 4to, Oxford, 1688.

10. "Der bedrückte Palmbaum, oder die verfolgte protestantischen Waldenser." 4to, Nuremberg, 1690.

11. "Histoire des chrétiens que l'on nomme communément Vaudois." Amsterdam, 1732. Anonymous; but the author was Martin SCHAZEN, tutor of the Mennonites at Utrecht.

12. "Geschichte der unter d. name Waldenser berühmten u. noch bestehenden rel. secte im ihrer mehr als 30 erdulden verfolgungen." 2 vols. 8vo; Leipzig, 1798. Mostly a translation of Brez.

13. "Abrégé de l'Histoire des Eglises esclavonnes et Vaudoises, depuis les premiers siècles du christian . . . jusqu' à celui de la réformation." Basle, 1785; 1 vol. 12mo, of xiv, 596, and 59 pages (usually annexed to the Histoire de la réformation, by SEKENDORF; and to that of Roos, which is merely an abridgment of Sekendorf), printed at Basle, MDCCLXXXV. The author of this anonymous work is M. DUVERNOY de Montbelliard.

14. BENOIST. "Histoire des Albigeois et des Vaudois, ou Barbets, avec une carte géographique des vallées." Paris, 1691; 2 vols. 8vo; the first of viii, 327, and xxii pages; the second, of 332 and xiv pages. This work is sometimes quoted in Latin, "Benedictus, historia Valdensis et Albigensis." It is of little value.

15. "Recit véritable de ce qui est arrivé depuis peu aux vallées de Piémont;" 8vo, pp. 48; without date or place of publication. Relates to the events of 1655. (See the authorities of the Israel of the Alps, part II., chap. vii., where mention is also made of many other authors, who wrote at the same period.)

16. "Chiare memorie e memorandi fatti de Valdesi, da compendii historici, del signor conte Alfonso LOSCHI, Vicentino." Without date or place of publication. (See the authorities of chapters iv. and v. of part III. of this work.)

17. ACLAND (Hugh). "A Sketch of the History and Present Condition of the Vaudois." London, 1825; 8vo. The same author translated into English, The Glorious Recovery . . . &c. London, 1827; 8vo, of cxix, xxv, and 239 pages.

18. "History of the Waldenses, from the earliest period . . . till the present time," by the author of the History of the Reformation. Edinb., 1828; 12mo, of xvi and 296 pages. (Communicated.) Is not this the same work with the "History of the Waldenses from the earliest period . . . till the present time," by WILLIAM SIME. Edinb., 1839; 3 vols. 8vo?

19. BLAIR. "History of the Waldenses and Albigenses." Edinb., 1833; 2 vols. 8vo.—JONES, "History of the Waldenses." London, 1812.

20. MAITLAND. "Facts and documents, illustrative of the history, doctrine, and rites of the ancient Albigenses and Waldenses." London, 1832.

21. "Notes concerning the Vaudois; the result of observations made in the valleys by an English clergyman." London, 1814; 8vo. The author of this work is Mr. SIMS, who published, in 1826, the Historic defence of the Vaudois by Peyrani. Other English writers of the same period will be cited in the first §§ of sect. V.

22. BAIRD. "Sketches of Protestantism in Italy, by Robert Baird." Boston, 1845. He treats of the Vaudois in his third part. See also M'CRIC, "History of the progress and suppression of the Reformation in Italy." Edinburgh, 1828. French translation. Paris, 1831; 8vo.

23. BENDER. "Geschichte der Waldenser." Ulm, 1850; 8vo. (I know as yet nothing of this work but its title.)

SECTION IV.—POLEMICAL WORKS.

§ 1.—Against the Vaudois.

1. "Contra hæreses Valdenses, libri quatuor. Impress. Patavii, 1579. Auctor Hieronymus NIGER, Fussanensis, vicarius generalis congregationis observantiæ Lombardiæ." 1 vol. 12mo. See the greater part of the treatises contra Valdenses, in § 1 of sect. II. But these latter works, although directed against the Vaudois, are rather works of party spirit than of religious controversy.

2. RIBOT (Philip), of Pancalier, Capuchin. "Ragionamento a modo di disputa, fatto tra lui e un ministro heretico delle valli." Turin, 1598; 18mo. This minister was David Rostain, pastor of St. Germain and Pramol. At the same period, Henry Rostain was pastor of Pinache. Philip Ribot wrote also, "Dichiaratione della salutatione evangelica," the date and place of publication of which are unknown to me.

3. CASSINI (Samuel). "Vittoria triumphale." . . . Coni, 1610. I do not know the complete title of this work. Gilles speaks of it, pp. 11–13. Cassini was a Cordelier, who was sent as a missionary to the Vaudois valleys. See FERRERO, Jus regnandi apostolicum, a folio volume which contains the history of the missions in the valleys.

4. DE LA MORRE (Maurice). "Catéchismo della vera religione." . . . Turin, 1509. I do not know the exact title of this book. It is dedicated to the Archbishop of Turin, at whose desire it was composed for refutation of the Vaudois doctrines. Charles Emmanuel I. wrote to the Vaudois to induce them to receive this catechism. His letter is dated from Pignerol, 5th February, 1599. He sent the catechism to Rome to submit it to the Pope, who approved of it, after having caused the cardinals D'Arcoi and Bellarmine to examine it. This catechism was made the subject of commentaries by several theologians, amongst others by the inquisitor Fossano.

5. "Turris contra Damascum, hoc est tutela civitatis sanctæ Syon, seu Ecclesiæ Romanæ, contra Calvinistorum incursions, objecta considerationibus cujusdam ministro," Pietro Gillio, "subscripti, ædificata cum propugnaculis, a Fratre Theodoro BELVEDERENSI." Turin, MDCXXXVI.; 8vo of 302 pages, printed in italics. The author had previously written Lettres Apologétiques. Turin, 1634. He afterwards wrote Lucerna della christiana verita per conoscer la vera chiesa e la falsa, and finally, Risposta al libro del S. Gillio, titolato Torre Evangelica, &c. . . . (See the article on GILLES.) The true name of

Theodore BELVEDERE was Antonio LAZZARI. The following work is also by him:—

6. "Relazione all' eminentissima Congregazione della Propagandi Fide, dei luoghi di alcune valli Piemont," &c. Turin; a small 24mo volume of 323 pages. The dedication is dated 30th August, 1626, and signed, Fra Teodoro Belvedere.

7. "Deux marques de l'erreur du Calvinisme: la présomption et l'infidélité découvertes juridiquement dans l'écrit d'un de ses ministres. Jouxte la copie imprimée à Grenoble, chez Antoine Verdier, en l'année MDCLX." The minister here intended was Benjamin de Joux, pastor at Fenestrelle. The author of the book was a Jesuit, named CALEMART, who had fixed his abode at the same place.

8. M. de Joux having refuted the preceding work in the Récit des conférences tenues à Fenestrelles (which was republished in the work mentioned in No. 5 of the following §, from p. 179 to p. 248), the Jesuit CALEMART replied to this refutation, by "Réfutation de la réponse de M. de Joux, ministre de l'Eglise prétendue réformée, en Pragelas; ou, conviction d'erreur et de mauvaise foi, par sa propre lettre." M. de Joux faithfully inserted this reply in the complete edition of the Conférences, from p. 111 to p. 171, and showed its futility. (See the §§ and Nos. above designated.)

9. Daniel Pastor, another minister of Pragela, in a work entitled, Le Manuel du vray chrestien (see § 2, No. 3, of this section), refuted two works of the priest JOHN BALCET, one entitled Le Diurnal du chrestien, and the other Remontrances chretiennes (cited in the preface of the Manuel, pp. 2 and 3). Jean Balcet, we are told in that preface, "was born in the true church, and had even the honour of exercising the holy ministry in it; but being drawn away by the heterodoxy of the Arminians, he terminated his course of declension by joining the Church of Rome. He obtained a degree in medicine, the priesthood, and the honour of Doctor of Theology."

10. "Réveille-matin, à double montre, une qui guide au précipice et l'autre à la gloire; par le son duquel ceux qui font profession de la religion prétendue réformée, doivent s'éveiller du sommeil de la mort, auquel ils sont léthargiquement endormis . . ., par frère illuminé FAVEROT, de Turin, Recollet, &c." Grenoble, 1670; one vol. 8vo, of xxiv, 434, and xii pages. It is dedicated, "To the ministers, elders, deacons, and generally to all the people . . . in the valleys of Lucerna, Angrogna, St. Martin, &c." (This work contains the statement of the old Vaudois doctrine made to Ecolampadius, by George Morel and Peter Masson, extracted from SCULTETUS, Annales Evangelii renovati, anno 1530.) A reply was made to this work in name of the Vaudois by the work mentioned in No. 6 of next §.

11. FAVEROT replied again by "La colombe de Noé, portant le symbole de paix, ou replique parainétique à deux réponses synodales faites à l'auteur, par ceux de la religion prétendue réformée des vallées de Luserne, &c. . . par frère illuminé Faverot, de Turin, Recollet, prédicateur et lecteur ci-devant missionnaire apostolique." Lyons, 1673; 2 vols. 8vo, the first of xxxviii, 394, and xxiv pages; the second of xiv, 582, and xlv pages. The two volumes are ordinarily bound in one.

12. A work, which I have not been able to procure, is referred to as follows:—"Conferenze del padre missionario Vanini gesuita, con diversi ministri Valdesi." Gilles speaks of it in his thirty-ninth chapter. "In the beginning of the year 1581," says he, "there preached in the valley of Lucerna, . . . an ostentatious Jesuit, a great roarer, and highly reputed amongst those of his own religion. He styled himself Dom John Baptist Vanin" (p. 217). Vanin is in Italian, Vanini. (See the Israel of the Alps, part II., ch. iv.)

13. RORENCO. "Esame in torno alla nuova breve confessione di fede della chiesa riformate di Piemonte, in cui si fa conoscer alli professori d'esse, distrutta con la novita, la pretese antica confessione del priore Marc Aurelio Rorenco." Turin, 1658; small 4to, or large 24mo, pp. 48.

14. "Journal des conversions qui ont été faites . . . durant le cours de l'année 1661." A journal of conversions made during the year 1661, by the congregation de propaganda fide et extirpandis hæreticis established at Grenoble. Relates exclusively to the Vaudois of Pragela. A 4to pamphlet of 20 pages.

15. "La conversione di quaranta eretici, con due loro principali ministri . . . nell'Augusta città di Torino, alla 18 di Maggio 1655." These two ministers afterwards returned to Protestantism, which gave occasion to a work entitled, "Sainte Palinodie, ou repentance des prisonniers des Eglises réformées de Piémont, &c." . . . (See No. 4 of next §; and for the particulars, LÉGER, part ii., p. 65.)

16. "La vérité reconnue, ou quinze motifs de la conversion de MM. de Pragellat." The first edition is without date or place of publication; the second was printed at Lyons in 1679. The author of this pamphlet is a Catholic, who pretends to be a converted Protestant. The work is addressed, "to the Brethren of Geneva, Charenton, and London."

17. DANNE. "Les colonnes de la religion catholique inébranlables aux attaques de leurs adversaires; et proposées aux habitants de St. Jean en la vallée de Luserne, par C. M. J.-B. Danne, ci-devant leur ministre, et maintenant docteur es-lois et conseiller de S. A. R." Turin, 1679; 18mo, of xii and 280 pages. In the Acts of the Synod held at La Tour, 30th December, 1693, we read that the Sieur Gautier, pastor and professor of theology in the city of Marburg, in Hesse, having composed a Reply for the Valleys to the book of M. Danne . . . he has already received upon this account the sum of fifty crowns." Danne had previously written a statement of the reasons of his conversion (see preface to the Colonnes, p. 3); and the ministers of the valleys had replied to him in a tract of more than 80 pages. But the latter work remained in manuscript. (Same preface, p. 7 and p. 8, paragraph 3.)

18. "Les Vandois convaincus d'hérésie, par François GAY, ministre du St. Evangile." Pignerol, 1836; 8vo, pp. 60. On the cover of this pamphlet we read, Appel aux Vaudois. (See the Israel of the Alps, part iii., ch. xxiv.)

19. "Le guide du catéchumène Vaudois, ou cours d'instructions destinées à lui faire connaître la vérité de la religion catholique: Ouvrage utile à tous les dissidents; par M. A. CHARVAZ, évêque de Pignerol." Paris and Lyons (Perisse, frères); three large 8vo volumes, the first and second published in 1840, and the third in 1842. One of the best written of all the works against the Vaudois, although the title contains an error of syntax, as the reference of the pronoun lui is indeterminate. The other works of the same author are noticed in section I., § 4, No. 9, of this Bibliography.

§ 2.—Polemical works in favour of the Vaudois.

1. "Excusatio Valdensium, contra binas litteras doctoris Augustini." 1 vol. folio, printed in 1512.

2. "Apologia eorum qui appellantur Waldenses." 1 vol. 4to, Wittenberg, 1538. With these two works I am unacquainted.

3. "Le manuel du vray chrestien, opposé au Diurnal du sieur Jean Balcet, enseignant la manière de la droite invocation du pur service de Dieu: et contenant la décision claire et solide des principales controverses de théologie agitées en ce temps; par Daniel PASTOR, ministre de la Parole de Dieu en l'Eglise réformée de Pragela." Geneva, 1652; 1 vol. 8vo, of xvi and 915 pages, besides twelve pages of contents. The epistle dedicatory, to the members of the reformed churches of the valley of Pragela, is dated from La Souchière, 1st June, 1651. Pastor had discharged the functions of a tutor in the Palatine house. (Records of the Venerable Company of Pastors of Geneva; vol. G, p. 283; and for other particulars, pp. 79, 161, and 337 of the same volume; also vol. H, p. 340.)

4. "Sainte Palinodie, ou repentance des prisonniers des Eglises réformées de Piémont, lesquels par infirmité avaient fait abjuration de la vérité; avec une brève réformation des articles de ladite abjuration dressés par ordonnance de l'archevêque de Turin, et du général des inquisiteurs de ladite cité;" 1656; 8vo, of 87 pages. (In reply to the work, No. 15 of the preceding §.)

5. "Le succès de la mission de Pragela, ou véritable récit de la conférence tenue à Fenestrelles, le 2 Octobre, 1659, entre le sieur Benjamin DE JOUX, ministre du saint Evangile en l'Eglise dudit lieu, et le sieur Marc Antoine Calemart, jésuite missionnaire." Geneva, 1659, 8vo, of xiv and 248 pages. (See Israel of the Alps, part III., ch. xv.)

6. "Réponse pour les Eglises des vallées de Piémont au sieur illuminé Favero, Récollet et missionnaire; où sont réfutées les erreurs de l'Eglise romaine, et les chicanes des missionnaires, avec les indices nécessaires." Geneva, 1679; 1 vol. 4to, of xxx, 824, and x pages. (For the titles of Favero's works, see the preceding §, Nos. 10 and 11.)

7. There exist, I am informed, two apologetic works intended for the defence of the Vaudois against one Peter Dolmans, who had accused them of Manicheism—the name of the author being HEYDENRYCK, and the place of their publication Harderwyck. They appeared in 1713. I mention them not without doubt and hesitation.

8. An Apology for the Vaudois, giving a general view of their origin . . . and an appeal to all the governments of Europe on their behalf. London, 1827; 8vo. Attributed to Mr. Sims. Along with this may be named the Historic Defence of the Vaudois, by PEYRANI, of which Mr. Sims was editor. (See sect. I., § 1, Modern Authors, No. 1), and the Five Letters by a Vaudois of the Cis-alpine Gauls. (See sect. I., § 2, No. 8.)

OBS. The controversial works specially intended for the defence of the Vaudois, are not so numerous as those which assail them; but it must not be forgotten that the assailants had every facility, whilst the liberty of the press and right of defence were denied to the Vaudois; wherefore, all the works mentioned in this §, were either composed by foreigners, or at least published in foreign countries.

SECTION V.—PERIODICAL, ARTISTIC, DESCRIPTIVE, SCIENTIFIC, AND LITERARY WORKS, RELATIVE TO THE VAUDOIS.

§ 1.—Books of Travels.

1. BURNET. "Voyage historique et politique, de Suisse, d'Italie et d'Allemagne." First ed., Rotterdam, 1690, 8vo. 2d ed., Frankfort, 1737; 3 vols. 12 mo. In this work are to be found particular details concerning the employment of part of the collections in favour of the Vaudois, made in 1655.

2. SPON (Jacob). "Travels in Italy, Dalmatia," &c. The author relates in this work that he met in Greece, at the base of Parnassus, a venerable old man, named Barba Dimon, &c.

3. COYER. "Voyage d'Italie et de Hollande." Paris, 1775; 2 vols. 8vo.—With this may be named ROLAND, "Lettres écrites de Suisse, d'Italie, et de Sicile." Paris, 1780; 6 vols. 8vo; and VOLKINANN, Travels in Italy (in German) 1771, 3 vols. 8vo.

4. "A brief account of the Vaudois of Piemont," without author's name, 8vo, London, 1753.

5. BRIDGE. "A brief narrative of a visit to the Vaudois." London, 8vo. A mere pamphlet.—"Courte narration d'une visite aux Vaudois." Cambridge, 1825. (The same work.)

6. JACKSON. "Observations on the Vaudois of Piémont." Lond., 1826 (Observations made during a tour in the valleys).

7. "Sketch of the past and present state of the Vaudois or Valdenses inhabiting the valleys of Piedmont." London, 1816.

8. "History and present situation of the Vaudois." Lond. 1823.

9. "Die Waldenser in den piemontesischen Thälern." Berlin, 1824.

10. BRACEBRIDGE. "Authentic particulars concerning the Vaudois." (Notice communicated.) This author likewise had visited the Vaudois valleys.

11. GILLY. "Narrative of an excursion to the mountains of Piemont, and researches among the Vaudois or Waldenses, Protestants, inhabitants of the Cottian Alps." London, 1824 or 1825. Dr. Gilly is one of the most voluminous, learned, and interesting of all modern authors who have written on the subject of the Vaudois. Some of the preceding works already named, and some of those still to be noticed, owe their existence to the universal interest which his pen has produced in favour of the Vaudois valleys. (Concerning the influence which he has exercised, and the benefits which he has conferred, see chap. xxiv. of part III. of the Israel of the Alps.)

12. HENDERSON. "The Vaudois, comprising observations made during a tour to the valleys of Piemont, in the summer of 1844." London, 1845; 1 vol. 8vo, of viii and 262 pages.

13. "Notes of a tour in the valleys of Piedmont in the summer of 1854, by the Rev. Baptist W. NOEL."

OBS. Amongst the numerous modern narratives of travels in which the Vaudois are mentioned, I have thought it necessary to name those only of which the Vaudois valleys are especially the subject.

§ 2.—Descriptive Works.

1. A Description of Piedmont, and particularly of the Vaudois valleys. (In German) 8vo, Zürich, 1698.

2. LEANDER. Description of the valley of Lucerna. (No fuller notice of this work is given in the communication which has been made to me.)

3. Letters regarding the Val Louise, by Father ROSSIGNOL. Turin, 1804; 8vo of 24 pages. (Communicated.)

4. "Description historique des Vaudois ou habitants des vallées du Piémont." Fol., Amst., 1731.

5. Names, situation, and particular description of the valleys of France, along the great Alps, in Dauphiny and Provence, and of those which descend from the Alps into Italy, from Savoy to that of St. Etienne, near Nice. By the Marquis DE PESAY. Turin, 1793; 18mo, pp. 172.

6. Report on the earthquake, which began on 2d April, 1808, in the valleys of the Pelis, the Cluson, the Po, &c. Laid before the class of physical and mathematical sciences in the Imperial Academy of Turin, in the sitting of 2d May, 1808; by A. M. Vassali-Eandi. Published by order of the prefect, by Félix Galetti. Turin, 1808; 8vo, pp. 136.

7. "Correspondance Vaudoise; ou recueil de lettres de quelques habitants des vallées de Pignerol, sur le tremblement de terre de 1808." New edition, Paris, 1808; an 8vo, of viii and 70 pages.

8. With the two preceding works, which are essentially works of description and observation, I think it right to name the following, which is entirely theoretic, but which relates to the same phenomenon:—"Nouveau pas sur les sentiers de nature, concernant les causes physiques des secousses réitérées des tremblements de terre. Système sur la matérialité de l'axe du globe, &c. . . . par un habitant des Hautes-Alpes." Gap, without date, one vol. 12mo, pp. 292. The name of the author was DE ROCHAS. This earthquake is incidentally spoken of in many other works. HUMBOLDT, in his Cosmos, ranks it amongst the most remarkable earthquakes recorded in history.

9. LA DOUCETTE (ex-prefect). "Statistique des Hautes-Alpes." One vol. 8vo.

ALLIONI, in his Flora of Piedmont; 2 vols. fol.—VILLARS, in his Flora of Dauphiny, 4 vols. 4to, and other authors writing on particular subjects, have incidentally described different parts of the Vaudois mountains.

§ 3.—Illustrated Works.

1. "Viaggio romantico-pittorico, delle provincie occidentali dell' antica e moderna Italia, dell' avvocato Modesto PAROLETTI." Turin, 1824, 2 vols. fol. He speaks of the Vaudois valleys, in vol. i., pp. 134-137.

2. "The exiles of Lucerna, or the sufferings of the Waldenses during the persecution of 1686." Edinburgh, 1841, 8vo, pp. 196, with lithographs of two tints.

3. "A tale of the Vaudois, designed for young persons." By M. R. WEBB, &c., London, 1842, 18mo, pp. 251; with wood engravings. A sort of historic romance.

4. Les vallées Vaudoises pittoresques, ou vallées protestantes du Piémont, du Dauphiné, et du Ban de la Roche, par W. BEATTIE . . . traduit de l'Anglais, par L. de Baucelas." Paris, 1838; a large quarto vol. of viii and 216 pages, with map, portrait, engraved title-page, and 73 engravings on steel, of great beauty, made from drawings taken on the spot, by Messrs. BARTLETT and BROCKEDON. This work appeared at the same time in English and in German. It is one of the most beautiful illustrated works which modern times have produced, and unquestionably the most deserving of notice of all those which have for their object the exhibition by engravings of the aspect of the Vaudois valleys.

5. There are also views of the country in Dr. GILLY's "Narrative of an excursion to the mountains of Piémont." (See § 1, No. 8, of this section.) Other works also contain views, but, like his, only as accessory to their principal contents.

§ 4.—Tales and Poems.

1. D'OLIVET (Fabre). "Les montagnards des Alpes, en 1488." 2 vols. 8vo; first edition, Paris, 1835; second, Paris, 1837. This work relates to the events which took place in the Vaudois valleys, at the time of the crusade proclaimed by Innocent VIII. and directed by Albert Cattané; but the author neither knew the history nor the country of the Vaudois. He says, however, at the end of vol. ii., "I might easily have loaded these pages with notes and quotations, or have added a volume of documents in justification," &c. . . . In the first edition of this tale, he quoted the work of Valbonays (see § 1 of next section, No. 13.) under the name of the printer, and made the further blunder of ascribing two different editions of that work to two different authors. In his second edition there are still many errors. He even quotes, as if he had read them, works which are not in existence. Such are the Memoires of Vignaux, Rostaing, and Morel, the Enquêtes juridiques, and other MSS. to which Perrin had access, but which have since been lost. I have compared all the references on particular points which the author of this tale makes with precision, and I have found them all incorrect, except five.

2. DINOCOURT. "Le chasseur noir, ou les Vaudois." Paris, 6 vols. 12mo. Relates to the events of Merindol and Cabrières. It is still less historic than the preceding.

3. MALAN (César). "Le chrétien primitif; anecdote provençale." Geneva; a small 12mo volume. The same author has published a "Complainte sur l'origine et les malheurs des Vaudois de Merindol," with a view of that village, and the words set to music.

4. "La protestante, ou les Cévennes au xviii. siècle . . ." Paris, 3 vols. 12mo. This work relates to the Camisards, as does likewise the romance of Eugene Sue, "Cavalier ou les Montagnards des Cévennes." Paris, 1840. The sources of historic information for this subject, were the Histoire des Comisards, par Court de Gebelin, 3 vols. 12mo.—the Mémoires de Jean Cavalier, 4 vols.—the Théâtre sacré des Cévennes, by Max. Mibbon, London, 1707, 8vo.—Le patriote français et impartial, 4 vols., published in 1703, &c. There exists a historic romance entitled The Albigenes, by Ch. Mathurin, 4 vols., a work full of very tedious passages.

5. "La vallée de la Clusone, épisode de l'histoire des Vaudois du Piémont au xvii^e siècle, par Carloman d'Andilli, traduit de l'Anglais." Geneva and Paris; 1838, one vol. 12mo.—With this may be named a little work entitled, Pierre et sa famille.

6. "The Waldenses, or the Fall of Rora; a lyrical sketch, with other poems, by Aubrey DE VERE." Oxford, 1842; 8vo, of xii and 311 pages. The poem relative to the Vaudois occupies 94 pages. See also No. 3 of the preceding §.

7. "L'exil des Vaudois;" "Le Retour des Vaudois;" "Le Serment du Sibaud;" "La Voix des Martyrs," and "Le Culte dans les Alpes," are patriotic songs which have been published in different collections. The music of the first three was composed by M. A. Bost, that of the last, by M. Cuche.

§ 5.—Periodical Works.

1. "Mercure Historique et Politique, contenant l'état présent de l'Europe, ce qui se passe dans toutes les cours, l'intérêt des princes, leurs brigues, et généralement tout ce qu'il y a de mieux, pour le mois de . . . Le tout accompagné de réflexions politiques sur chaque Etat. A La Haye, chez Henri Van Bulderen. . . . avec privilège des Etats de Hollande et Westfrise."

The title of this publication has been taken from the number for January, 1690; it was somewhat changed in subsequent numbers; and after the month of January, 1710. the paper bore only the title of Mercure Hist. et Polit. This collection commences, I believe, about 1682, and ends about 1730. I have it not in my power to give these notices with greater accuracy; and the same remark applies to many others.

2. "Lettres Historiques, contenant ce qui se passe de plus important en Europe, et les réflexions nécessaires sur ce sujet. A La Haye, chez Adrien Moetjens." The first number appeared in January, 1692. With this may be named the "Journal Historique de l'Europe," by Louis Augustin ALEMAND, from 1690 to 1696; and "L'Introduction à l'histoire d'aujourd'hui, tirée des Gazettes." (Concerning the Vaudois, see chap. xiii.)

3. "L'Esprit des cours de l'Europe, où l'on voit tout ce qui se passe de plus important touchant la politique, et en général ce qu'il y a de plus remarquable dans les nouvelles. A La Haye, chez François L'Honoré." This began to appear in 1699.

4. Gazettes of Leyden, of France, and of England. The last was the earliest in date, and began to appear in 1588. The complete collection is very rare. These journals make no mention of the Vaudois except at the times of those great events which drew public attention to that people, especially in 1655, 1686, and 1690.

5. The National Archives of Baden (in German), Carlsruhe, t. I., No. 5. Letters and Observations on the Vaudois, by Mone. The Universal Gazette of Halle, March, 1821, No. 59, gives an analysis of this publication. The work of Mone appeared in a separate form at Berlin, in 1821.

6. The Ecclesiastical Gazette of Darmstadt (in German), contains a number of articles on the Vaudois, by Mr. Bracebridge. Another journal, published in the state of Darmstadt—the weekly paper of Budingen—contains, amongst others, an interesting article on the Vaudois Church of Waldensberg, in the number of 19th November, 1825.

7. The Universal Gazette of Augsburg, for the year 1842, in Nos. 362, 363, and 364, of 28th, 29th, and 30th December—articles "From Piedmont," and "On Piedmont."

8. The New Theological Annals (a German journal). Numbers for February and March, 1820, p. 171; and for May, 1821, p. 316; and May, 1822, p. 216.

9. The Preachers' Bibliotheca Critica (a German publication). Vol. viii., part 1., p. 181, "Theological Notices." Some particulars regarding the Vaudois.

10. British Review, March, 1828, and other numbers. British Magazine, No. 113, p. 397, and other places.

11. Edinburgh Review, and Edinburgh Encyclopedia. Articles by Messrs. Plenderleith, Gilly, &c.

12. Quarterly Review; number for December, 1843, article entitled, The Vaudois Church and the King of Sardinia, of which an account is given in the Record for 22d December, 1843. There are also articles in previous numbers of the Review relating to the Vaudois.

13. Monthly Review; number for June, 1814, p. 204, &c.

14. Evangelische Kirchenzeitung; year 1829.

15. The Religious Narrator (a journal published in Holland); number for 24th August, 1839, and many others.

16. The Philanthropist (a German journal, published at Elberfeld, in Prussia); numbers for 13th and 14th June, 1825.

17. "Le Fédéral" of Geneva; numbers of 21st, 22d, and 23d May, 1844. Another journal of Geneva, Le Lecteur, first part, "Notice hist. et statique sur les vallées Vaudoises." And with this article should be compared for correction of mistakes, "Le disciple de Jesus Christ," a religious review, published at Paris, vol. ix. p. 32 (Number for April, 1847). See also L'Ami de la jeunesse, Paris, 1831, vol. vii., p. 373; containing a ballad by M. De Félice, entitled, Le Colporteur Vaudois (the subject taken from the eighth chapter of Reynerus).

18. "Revue Encyclopédique;" "Bibliothèque Encyclopédique," &c. See the Index.

19. "Archives Évangéliques de Nîmes; year 1844.

20. "Les Archives du Christianisme;" many articles, as also in Le Semeur; (years, 1834, 1837, 1840, &c.)

21. Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, Wesleyan Record, &c. Many articles, from 1833 to 1848.

22. "Le Chroniqueur; journal de l'Helvetie Romande, de 1535 à 1536;" published in 1835 and 1836. Lausanne, 4to; by M. Vuillemin, p. 394, &c.

23. "Revue Théologique." Strasburg, December, 1850; vol. I., p. 334; article On the Origin and Primitive Doctrines of the Vaudois; and vol. ii. No. 6, in which is a most interesting article on the Vaudois translations of the Bible, by Reuss. Vol. v. also contains two articles on the Vaudois.

24. Theological Miscellanies, in German, published by the Theological Society of Strasburg, under the direction of Messrs. Reuss and Cunitz, at Jena. The first three volumes contain valuable articles on the Vaudois.

25. "L'écho des Vallées: feuille mensuelle, spécialement consacrée aux intérêts de la famille Vaudoise." The first number appeared on 13th July, 1848. This journal, the collected numbers of which will yet become extremely valuable for the information which they contain, relative to the modern history of the Vaudois, was established, and has hitherto been conducted with remarkable ability, by M. MEILLE, author of the work mentioned in this Bibliography, in No. 6 of the Modern Historians, placed at the end of § 1 of the first section. This work has been succeeded by La Buona Novella, also conducted by M. Meille.

SECTION VI.—HISTORICAL WORKS, IN WHICH THE VAUDOIS ARE ONLY INCIDENTALLY TREATED OF, BUT WHICH EMBODY PARTICULAR VIEWS OR DOCUMENTS.

CHAPTER I.—WORKS ON SPECIAL SUBJECTS.

§ 1.—Local History.

1. The Authorities referred to at the head of each chapter of the Israel of the Alps, and particularly those of chapters iii., iv., vi., and ix. of Part I., and of chapters viii. and ix. of Part III.

2. "Mémoires historiques sur la maison royale de Savoie," by the Marquis Costa DE BEAUREGARD. Turin, 1816; 3 vols. 8vo.

3. Researches concerning the History and ancient constitution of the monarchy of Savoy, composed chiefly from unpublished documents, by M. L. CIBRARIO. In Italian; Turin, 1832; and translated into French by Boullée, Paris, 1833; 8vo of ix and 308 pages. See also the admirable work of M. Cibrario, On the History of Law during the Middle Ages. This eminent man, as obliging as he is learned, has had the goodness to extract from the researches which he made as a member of the Commission for the Monumenta Patricæ, interesting notes and unpublished documents for the Israel of the Alps.

4. DELLA CHIESA (Agostino). "Corona reale di Savoia," 4to.—Ludovico DELLA CHIESA, "Storia di Piemonte," 8vo.

5. DE SALUCES. Military History of Piedmont.

6. MULETTI. "Memoires historiques sur le Marquisat de Saluces." See vol. vi.

7. MASSI and other authors, "Storia di Pinerolo."

8. SOLERI. "Diario dei fatti successi in Torino;" and other authors on the history of Turin or of Piedmont.

9. SILLERY. "Die Waldensischen Protestanten, in den Alpenthalern bei Turin, in Italia . . ." Heidelberg, 1844; 32mo.

10. LOWTHER. "Brevi osservazioni sui Valdesi . . ." Geneva, 1821. Also in French, Geneva, 1821; in English, London, 1821; 8vo, pp. 52.

11. "Notice sur l'état actuel des Eglises Vaudoises . . ." Paris, 1822. Another Notice Historique on the same subject, Geneva, 1825.

12. CHORIER. "Histoire générale de Dauphiné, depuis l'an 1000 de notre Seigneur jusqu'à nos jours . . ." Lyons, 1672; 2 vols. folio. (The first volume was printed at Grenoble in 1661.) See vol. ii., § xix., p. 69; book xv., § x., p. 500, &c. This author is indiscriminating, and often inaccurate. In consulting his work, reference ought always to be made to the higher authority of the following:—

13. VALBONAYS (Jean-Pierre Moret de Bourcheny, Marquis de Valbonays; born at Grenoble in 1651; became blind in 1701. I do not know the date of his death). He wrote a work—the title of which varies in the different editions—the "Histoire de Dauphiné et des princes qui ont porté le nom de Dauphins, particulièrement de ceux de la troisième race, &c. . . ." Geneva, 1712; 1 vol. fol. The first edition was entitled, "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de Dauphiné, sous les Dauphins de la maison de La-Tour-du-Pin, &c. . . ." Paris, 1711; 1 vol. fol. of ix, vi, 22, 681, and 20 pages. Concerning the Vaudois, see pp. 326–346. The name of the author is not printed in either of these volumes.

14. "Histoire géographique, naturelle, ecclésiastique et civile du diocèse d'Embrun, par M——, bachelier en droit canonique et civil de la faculté de Paris et docteur en théologie." Without place of publication, 1783; 2 vols. 8vo. This is the work to which the Five Letters, by a Vaudois, &c., are a reply. (See section I., § 2, No. 8 of the present part of this Bibliography.) The author of this history, which is sometimes referred to under the title of Histoire du diocèse d'Embrun, was Father ALBERT. His work must have been printed at Lyons.

15. MARANDA. "Tableau du Piémont, sous le régime des rois, avec un précis sur les Vaudois et une notice sur les Barbets." Turin, year XI. (1803); 1 vol. 8vo, of vi and 244 pages, dedicated to Bonaparte, First Consul. This work contains 15 chapters, of which only the last two relate to the Vaudois. It is by no means trustworthy.

16. "Johannis COLUMBI Manuscensis [de Manosque]. Opuscula varia, &c. . . ." Lugduni, 1568. One vol. 32mo. What relates to the Vaudois is contained in the fourth book, entitled, De rebus gestis Epis. Valent. et Dieusum. Jean Colomb Manosque belonged to the order of the Jesuits.

17. "Les transactions d'Imbert, dauphin de Viennois, prince du Briançonnais et marquis de Sézane, &c. . . ." One vol. fol., MDCXLV.—See also Brunet, seigneur de l'Argentière, "Recueil des actes, pièces et procédures, concernant l'emphithéose perpétuelle des dîmes du Briançonnais, &c. . . ." One vol. 32mo, 1754. Also, "Recueil de pièces concernant la régle, l'affaire d'Embrun," &c. . . . 10 vols. 4to.

18. DU TILLIER, History of Berne, 5 vols. 8vo. Berne, 1839 (in German).—DENINA, History of the Italian Revolutions (in Italian). Translated into French by Jardin; Paris, 1770.—LÊTI, Storia Genevrina. . . . Amsterdam, 1686; 5 vols. 8vo. (In a number of houses in Geneva, there are MSS. which pass for family records, and which are nothing else than fragments of this work, translated at the time when it appeared).

§ 2.—Memoirs and Biographies.

1. "Memoires de M.D.F.L., touchant ce qui s'est passé en Italie, entre Victor Amedée II., duc de Savoie, et le roi très-chrétien avec le detail. . . ." &c. Aix-la-Chapelle, 1697. Concerning the Vaudois, see pp. 39, 40, et seq., 170, &c.

2. "Mémoires du prince Eugène." Several works are referred to under this title: "Histoire du prince François-Eugène de Savoye, généralissime des armées de l'Empereur et de l'Empire. . . ." Amsterdam, 1740. Reprinted at Vienna in 1755, in 5 vols. 8vo, with engravings. See vol. i. book ii. p. 113, of the first edition; vol. iii. p. 146 of the second, &c.

3. FEUQUIERES. "Lettres et negociations." Paris, 1753; 3 vols. 8vo. Memoires du Marquis de Feuquieres, published in 7 vols.—To which may be added, D'ESTRADES, Lettres et Négociations; London, 1743, 9 vols. 8vo; extending from 1637 to 1677; and Vie du Cardinal de Richelieu, the second volume of which may be consulted.

4. The Histories of Louis XIV., by Bruyen de la Martinière, and many other authors, contain a number of particulars connected with the history of the Vaudois.

5. "Recueil de lettres de Louis XIV. à ses ministres et à ses généraux." Paris, 1760; 8 vols. 8vo.

6. Histories of the Dukes of Savoy, by various authors; e. g., those of Emmanuel Philibert (Amsterdam, 1693, and in Latin, Turin, 1596); and of Charles Emmanuel (Turin, 1632), &c.

7. "D'ORIGNY. "La vie du P. Antoine Ponevin et de ses négociations." Paris, 1712. See also the Lives of Schomberg, of Catinat, of the Marquis de La Feuillade, of the Marquis De Parelles, and, in general, of all the eminent personages who figured in the campaigns of 1690 and 1703. But the particular memoirs and biographies, which refer more or less to the Vaudois, are so numerous, that I have thought it necessary to restrict myself in the enumeration of them. Those which are of any historic importance relate especially to the period from 1664 to 1713.

CHAPTER II.—WORKS OF A GENERAL CHARACTER.

§ 1.—Ecclcsiastical Histories.

A.—IN FRENCH.

1. BASNAGE DE BEAUVAL (Jaqu.) "Histoire de l'Eglise depuis J. C. jusqu'à présent," divided into four parts. First edition, Rotterdam, 1699; 2 vols. fol. Second edition, the Hague, 1723; 2 vols. fol., &c. This author treats at great length of the Vaudois, and had even conceived the design of writing their history.—See also the Biblioth. eccl. of DUPIN, and the critical examination of it by RICH. SIMON, articles Valdo, Brays, &c.

2. FLEURY (Claude). "Histoire ecclésiastique." (It comes down to 1414.)

Paris, 1691–1720; 20 vols. 4to. Brussels, 1692–1720; 20 vols. 4to, &c. General Index of Matters by Rondet. Paris, 1758; 4to. This history has been continued to 1595 by J. Cl. FEBRE, who has added 16 volumes to it (vols. xxi.–xxxvi.); and, finally, it has been brought down to the end of the eighteenth century, under the title, “Histoire du Christianisme connu, &c., augmentée de 4 livres, comprenant l’histoire du quinzième siècle et continuant jusqu’à la fin du dix-huitième siècle,” by a Society of Ecclesiastics, under the superintendence of the Abbé O. VIDAL. Paris, 1837; 8 large 8vo vols.—Fleury’s history has given rise to the following works:—HONORÉ DE SAINTE MARIE, “Observations sur l’histoire ecclésiastique de Fleury,” addressed to Our Holy Father Pope Benedict XIII., and to Our Lords and Bishops. Malines, 1727, 8vo; and ibid. 1760. Consists of denunciations of Fleury’s Ecclesiastical History to Our Lords and Bishops.—BEAUDOIN DE HOUSTA, “La mauvaise foi de M. Fleury, prouvée par plusieurs passages des Saints Pères, des conciles et d’auteurs ecclésiastiques qu’il a omis, tronqués ou infidèlement traduits dans son histoire.” Malines, 1733; 4to.—ROSSIGNOL, “Reflexions sur l’histoire ecclésiastique de Fleury;” 1802.—MARCHETTI, “Critique de l’histoire ecclésiastique de Fleury,” translated from Italian into French; published in Belgium in 1803, and at Besançon in 1819; in 2 vols. 12mo.—MAZARETTI, “Remarques sur l’histoire ecclésiastique et spécialement sur la dissertation de Fleury,” translated from the fourth Italian edition.

3. MOSHEIM (John Laurence). “Histoire ecclésiastique,” translated into French from the English, by Fortunat Félice, Yverdon, 1776; 6 vols. 8vo; and from the original Latin, by Eidous (Marc Antoine), Maëstricht, 1776, 6 vols. 8vo. This history has been translated into almost all the languages of Europe.

4. BÉZE (Théodore De). “Histoire ecclésiastique de l’Eglise réformée au royaume de France, en laquelle est décrite au vray la renaissance et accroissement d’icelles, depuis l’an 1521 à 1523; leur réglemeut ou discipline, synodes, persécutions tant générales que particulières.” Antwerp, 1580; 3 vols. 8vo. A second edition of this work was published by M. Marzials, at Lille, 1837–1841; 3 vols. 8vo. In the first edition, which I have used, the Vaudois of Provence are treated of in vol. i., p. 35, et seq. On the same subject, see (besides the authorities named at the head of chap. v. of part I. of the Israel of the Alps), GAUFRIDI, “Histoire de Provence;” Aix, 1684; folio; book xi., BOUCHE, “Histoire de Provence,” p. 607. NOSTRADAMUS (César, the eldest son of Michel the prophesier), “Histoire et chronique de Provence;” Lyons, 1664; folio, book vii. DE THOU, “Historiar. sui temporis . . . ;” book v. LA POPLINIÈRE, “Histoire de France,” (from 1550 to 1557), 2 vols. folio. VOLTAIRE, Histoire générale, vol. i., p. 170.

B.—IN LATIN.

5. GERDES. “Specimen Italiae reformatae.” Leyden, 1765, 4to; vol. ii., p. 400.—SCULTET (Abraham), “Annalium Evangelii passim per Europam, 15 salutis partae seculo renovati decas 1 et 2, ab a. 1516 ad a. 1536. Heidelberg, 1618.

6. BARONIUS (Cæsar). “Annales ecclesiast. a Chr. nato ad a. 1198.” Rome, 1588–1607; 12 vols. folio. Second edition, Antwerp, 1589–1603; 10 vols. folio, &c. This work has been continued by BZOVIVS (Abraham), “Annales ecclesiast. post Caes. Baronium;” vols. xii.–xx.; “ab a. 1198 usque ad a. 1565, rerum in orbe Christ. gestar. narrationem complectentes.” Rome, 1616. et seq., folio; and Cologne, 1621–1630, folio. This author often declares himself opposed to Baronius. Another continuation is by H. SPONDANUS, “Annalium ecclesiast. Caes. Baronii continuatio ab an. 1197 ad finem 1646. Paris [1640-41], 1647; 2 vols. folio. Lyons, 1678; 3 vols. folio. Another continuation is by Od. RAYNALDUS, "Annales ecclesiast. ab a. quo desinit Caesar Baronius, 1198, usque ad an. 1565;" vols. xiii.-xxi. Rome, 1646-1677, folio. Cologne, 1693-1727; folio. Another continuation is by James DE LADERCHIO, "Annales eccles. ab a. 1566, ubi desinit Od. Raynaldus;" vols. xxii.-xxiv. Rome, 1728-1737; folio. The following works are also relative to the Annals of Baronius:—Is. CASAUBON, "De rebus sacris et ecclesiast. exercitat. xvi. ad Baronium prolegomena," &c. London, 1614, folio. Frankfort, 1615, 4to. Geneva (1654), 1663, 4to. Ant. PAGI, "Critica hist. chronol. in universos Annal. Baronii. Opus Posthumum 4 T. distinctum. Accedunt ca'alogi 10 veter. Summor. pontificum haecternus inediti." Antwerp, 1705, 4 vols. folio. New edition of Fr. P. GI, Antw., 1724; 14 vols. folio.

ALEXANDER (Nat.), "Hist. eccles. V. et N. T., ab orbe cond. ad a. p. Ch. n. 1600, et in loca ejusdem insignia dissertt. hist. chronol. crit. dogm. in 8 tom. divisae, ante quidem (1676 ff. 26 v. 8o), per [24, according to others 26] partes, nunc autem conjunctim et accuratius edita, rerum novar. accessione, scholiis et indicib. aucta, illustr. ornata. Par. (1699-1714) 1730, 8 vols., bound in 7, folio. New editions have been published by Roncaglia (Lucca, 1734, 9 vols., bound in 8, folio), and Mansi (Lucca, 1749). This last edition has been several times reprinted. Ferrara, 1758-1762; 9 vols. folio. New edition, Bassano, 1778, 9 vols., and 3 vols. of supplement, folio, &c.

The brothers DE SAINTE MARTHE, "Gallia christ., qua series omnium archiepiscoporum, episcop., et abbat. Franciæ vicinarumque ditionum ab origine eccles. ad nostra tempora deducitur." Par. 1656, 4 vols. folio. New edition, vols. i.-iii., Par. 1715-25, edited by the Monk of Saint Maur; vols. iv.-xiii., Par. 1728-85, folio. "Scriptores ordinis Prædicator. recensiti, notisque hist. et crit. illustrati; opus, quo singulor. vita præclareque gesta referuntur, &c., &c. Inchoavit JAC. QUETIF, absolvit JAC. ECHARD." Par. 1719-1721; 2 vols. fol. —USHER, "De christianarum Eccles. successione et statu." It was from the library of this celebrated Anglican bishop, that the precious Vaudois MSS. were derived, which are now deposited in the library of Trinity College, Dublin.

7. Hermann VAN DER HARDT, "Hist. litter. reformationis, constans 5 partib. . . . omnia rara partim MSS., cum introductionibus." Frankfort and Leipzig, 1717; fol.—BERNHARD-LUTZENBURG, "Catal. hæreticor. omnium pene qui ad hæc usque tempora passim litterar. monument. proditi sunt, illor. nomina, errores et tempora, quib. vixerunt, ostendens, in ejus calce et de Luthero non nihil deprehendes." Without place or date of publication (Cologne, 1525). Second edition, enlarged, without place of publication (Cologne, 1526), 1527; 8vo.—Abr. SCHULTET, "Medullæ theologiæ patrum syntagma, in quo theologia priscor. primit. eccl. doctor. qui a. et p. conc. Nicen. floruer. etc. etc." Frankfort, 1634; 4to. See also the work by him mentioned in No. 9.—COLBERG, "De origine et progressu hæresium." London, 1674; 4to.—HERMANT (John), "Histoire des hérésies." Rome, 1717; 4 vols. 12mo.

8. F. SPANHEIM, "Introd. ad chronol. et histor. sacr. ac præcipue christian., ad tempora reformationis cum necessariis castigationibus Cæs. Baronii." Leyden, 1683, 1687; 2 vols. 4to. "Summa histor. eccles. a Chr. nato ad sec. 16, inchoatum. Premittitur doctrina temporum," etc. (Leyden, 1687-1694.) Leipzig, 1698; 4to. See Section xii.—Eberhard A. BORGER, "De Mysticismo." The Hague, 1820; 8vo. Translated into German, by E. Stange, with a preface, by J. Gurlitt; Altona, 1826; 8vo. New ed., with preface by E. G. A. Boeckel; Altona, 1827; 8vo. A work to which a premium was awarded.—Is. DE BEAU-

SOBRE, Hist. crit. de Manichée et du Manichéisme; Amst. 1734, 1739; 8 vols. 4to. In favour of the Vaudois; see the preface, which says—"Amongst the errors of the Vaudois there is nothing which savours of Manicheism."—BOSSUET, Hist. de Variat. Book xi., § xcvi., par. 2.—LUDNÆ, History of the Middle Ages.—BAUMGARTEN, History of Religious parties. A calm and impartial German historian.

C.—IN GERMAN.

9. SCHRÖCKH (John Matthias), "Christl. Kirchengesch." Leipz. 1768–1803; 38 vols. 8vo. An immense collection; for what concerns the Vaudois, see vol. xxix.—HENKE (H. Ph. Kr.), "Allgem. Gesch. der Christl. Kirche nach d. Zeitfolge." The first volume appeared in 1788, and has passed through many editions, as have also all the following. J. SEV. VATER has continued it from vol. vii. The ninth and last volume appeared in 1823, in 8vo.—ARNOLD (Godefroy), "Unparth. Kirchen-und-Ketzer-Historie, vom Auf. des N. T. bis auf das Jahr. Chr. 1688." Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1669–1700; 4 vols. fol. "Supplementa, Illustrationes u. Emendationes zur Verbess. der Kirchen-Historie." Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1703; 4to. New ed. with supplm.; Id. 1729; 2 vols. 4to; Schaffhaus. 1740–42; 3 vols. fol.—A. NEANDER, "Allgem. Gesch. der Christl. Relig. u. Kirche." The earlier volumes appeared at Hamburgh, from 1825 to 1836, each divided into several parts.—Of abridgments of Ecclesiastical History in German, may be mentioned, J. K. L. GIESELER (the first volume appeared at Bonn, in 1824), and H. E. Fred. GUERICKE, (first ed., Halle, 1833, 2 vols.); Dan. H. HERING, "Beiträge z. Gesch. der Evang. reform. Kirche in die Preuss.," &c. Breslau, 1784, 1785; 2 vols. 8vo. New ed., Berl., 1786–87; 2 vols. 8vo. See vol. ii. W. D. TURMANN, "Handwörterb. der Christl. Religions u. Kirchengesch., &c. Nebst ein. Abhandl. üb. die hohe wichtigk. u. die zweckmässigste methode eines fortges. Studiums der Relig.-u.-Kirchengesch. für prakt. Religionslehrer, v. A. H. NIEMEYER." Halle, 1826–29; 3 vols. 8vo.—H. SCHMID, "Der mysticismus des Nittecalters in seiner Entstehungs periode." Jena, 1824; 8vo.

10. DU VOISIN (Lancelot), History of the French churches. Antwerp, 1580. For what concerns the Vaudois, see book i., p. 35.—REMY (John) published a work with the same title.—With these may be named, WIIHL'S Apologetic History or Defence of the liberties of the Reformed Churches of France, an Appendix to the History of the French Church; 1759, 8vo (a German work).

11. CAVE (William). "Tabulæ quib. doctores et scriptor. ecclesiast. eorumque patria, ordo, ætas et obitus in synops. . . . a epochæ christ. 1 ad a. 1519 exhibentur." (Lond. 1674, fol.) Hamb. 1676; fol. This work has been several times reprinted under new titles. The last edition is that of Basle, 20 vols., 1745.—WATER, Materials for Modern Ecclesiastical History. Halle, 1820. A German work which speaks of the Vaudois in vol. i, where a sketch is given of their history since the French Revolution.

(For the greater part of the titles contained in this section, I am indebted to Pastor EUGENE ARNAUD, the author of Recherches critiques sur l'épître de Jude, présentant une introduction à l'épître, et un commentaire sur chaque verset. Strasburg and Paris, 1851.—These titles are taken from a Repertoire bibliographique de la Théologie française, depuis la réformation jusques à nos jours, with which this author is engaged.)

§ 2.—Profane History.

1. MURATORI, Scriptores rerum Italicarum, fol.; published from 1723 to 1751. Concerning the Vaudois, see vol. v., p. 82; vol. xvi., p. 662, and in vol. xi. the Annales mediolanenses, ad annum 1259, cap. xxxi. Muratori wrote also Antiquitates Italiæ mediæ ævi, Milan, 1738-1742; 6 vols. fol.; and Annali d'Italia, 12 vols. 4to. Venice, 1744-1749. The State Archives at Turin, it is said, were never opened to this eminent writer, notwithstanding all the endeavours which he made to obtain access to them.

2. Histories of Italy.—GUICCIARDINI, extending from 1490 to 1534 (Francesco Guicciardini, Storia d'Italia, 1775, 4 vols. 4to). Prolix and superficial. See a critique, by Montaigne, Essays, book ii., chap. x.—BRUSONI, Storia d'Italia, extending from 1625 to 1660. Venice, 1661, 4to.—DENINA, Delle rivoluzioni d'Italia. Turin, 1770; 3 vols. 4to.—SIDONIUS, De regno Italico. Still less profound.—GUICHENON, Histoire généalogique de la maison de Savoie, 3 vols. fol. A servile writer. He labours to justify the persecutions of which the Vaudois were the victims, and often attacks the historian Léger, with whom, however, he had studied at Geneva, but afterwards abjured his religious opinions and friendships to gratify his ambition.—PARADIN, Chronique de Savoie. Diffuse and unsatisfactory. He speaks of the Vaudois, or rather of Valdo, in chap. xxxi. A Chronique de Savoie, in MS., and very interesting, exists in the library of Carpentras, amongst the MSS. called MSS. of Peyresk.—BOTTA (History of Italy) and SISMONDI (History of the Italian Republics), have not studied the subject of the Vaudois, although they speak of it in passing.

3. Histories of France.—Bernard Girard DU HAILLAN, Hist. gén. des roys de France. Paris, 1616; 2 vols. fol.—ANQUETIL; MEZERAY; HAINAULT; and the Histoire de France, called Des trois marteaux; also, the Histoire des Français, by SISMONDE DE SISMONDI; and, finally, MICHELET, who, although the last in date, is nevertheless one of the first in erudition, in method, and, above all, in that rare gift of life, which can only be communicated to recitals of the past by a noble heart and a great enlightened mind.

4. Particular Histories.—LACRETELLE, "Histoire des guerres de rel. au xvie siècle," &c.—DU MOULIN (Molinæus), "De Monarchia Francorum," Paris, 1561.—Anonymous: "Memoire pour servir à l'hist. du xviiie siècle" (extending from 1643 to 1690). Paris, 1765; 3 vols. 8vo.—LAMBERT, Memoires pour servir à l'hist. du xviiiie siècle. Amsterdam, 1757; 4to, 14 vols.; and many other collections noticed in next section.

5. Universal History, published in 47 vols, 4to, at Amsterdam and Leipzig in 1790. See vol. xxxii. p. 477, &c.—HALLER, "Biblioth. d'hist. universelle."—D'AUBIGNÉ, "Hist. universelle depuis l'an 1550 jusqu'à l'an 1601." Amsterdam, 1616; 3 vols. fol. A writer full of energy. (See book ii.)

6. Historical Dictionaries of MORERI, BAYLE, RICHELLET; Conversations-Lexicons—Encyclopedias—Moderne—Nouvelle—Progressive—Philosophique—Du xixe siècle—Des Gens du Monde, &c.—And, finally, L'ART DE VERIFIER LES DATES, on the chronology of the Dukes of Savoy, and in other places. This excellent work may be regarded as indispensable for every writer of history. It was continued with great assiduity by M. DE COURCELLES, and completed by M. DE FORBIA.

SECTION VII.—DETACHED DOCUMENTS.

§ 1.—Collections of Official Papers.

1. "Liber statutorum, franchisiarum ac immunitatum, civitatis Pinarolli, nunc denuo impressus, ejusdem civitatis impensis." Aug. Taur., 1602; of xxxii and 454 pages. Chap. lxxxiv. treats of the Vaudois.

2. "Raccolta de gl' editti et altre provisioni, delle altezze Reali delli serenissimi duchi di Savoia, di tempo in tempo promulgate, sopra gl' occorrenti delle valli di Lucerna, Perosa e San-Martino, terre anesse di San-Bartolomeo, Prarustino e Roccapiata: e dell' altre terre del Marchesato di Saluzzo e del Piemonte." Turin, 1678 (by Sinibaldo), small fol., pp. 158, containing 104 papers or edicts, printed at full length, from 1476 to 1672.

3. "Confirmazione de privilegii fatta alli Signori Conti e communita della valle di Luserna." Turin, 1682 (by the same printer), 4to. Containing the letters-patent or privileges of 1582, 1584, 1585, 1635, 1643, 1663, with the enterinations.

4. BORELLI. A general collection of the Edicts of the Royal House of Savoy. (In Italian. I cannot at this moment lay my hands on the original title.) In the third part, book xv., chap. ii., from p. 1259 to p. 1287, it contains a number of Edicts relative to the Vaudois, printed at full length. This collection requires to be supplemented by the following:—

5. DUBOIN. "Raccolta per ordine di materie, delle leggi, providenze, editti, manifesti, etc., publicati dal principio dell' anno 1681, fino agli 8to Dicembre, 1780." . . . Turin, 1825, fol. For the edicts concerning the Vaudois, see vol. ii, book ii., chap. xiii., p. 109. The first three volumes of this valuable collection were at first published anonymously. The name of this author, when his work is cited by foreigners, is sometimes written Dubois instead of Duboin. The son of this eminent jurist continues the work of his father, and proposes to publish a supplement to the edicts relative to the Vaudois.

6. "Raccolta delle leggi, providenze e manifesti, emanati dai governi francese e provvisorio, e dalla Municipalità di Torino, unitamente alle lettere pastorali, del citt. arcivescovo di Torino." Vol. i. Turin, year vii. of the French Republic, and first year of Liberty in Piedmont, 1 vol. 4to. of 320 pages. Vol. ii., published afterwards, contains 240 pages. This collection contains all the decrees of the Provisional Government, and of the Executive Committee in Piedmont, from 1798 to 1800, relative to the Vaudois.

7. The following were published separately:—the Patents of Grace, signed at Pignerol, 18 Aug., 1655; the Edict for the re-establishment of the Vaudois, 23 May, 1694 (reprinted in 1713), and most of the other pieces of the same description at the time of their promulgation.

8. "Conférences faictes à Turin, dans l'Hostel de Ville en présence de MM. les Ambassadeurs Suisses, entre les ministres de S. A. R. et les députés des vallées de Luzerne; à la fin de l'année 1663, et au commencement de la courante, 1664." Turin, small folio, pp. 230.

9. The old Civil Code, published in 1724, under this title, "Leggi e costituzioni di sua Maesta" (title of the edition of 1770; 2 vols. 4to, of 504 and 574 pages). The new Civil Code, promulgated by CHARLES ALBERT in 1837, and likewise the Statute of 1848, deserve also to be mentioned, because of the articles which they contain relative to the Vaudois.

10. Amongst the collections of edicts emanating from foreign powers, the following will be found to contain things relating to the Vaudois of Saluces and Pragelas, at the time when these countries were under the dominion of France.—"Recueil des édits et déclarations des Roys, Henry IV., Louys XIII. et Louis XIV., sur la pacification des troubles de ce royaume." Paris, 1659; small 4to, each edict pagged by itself. "Recueil des édits, déclarations et arrêts du conseil, rendus au sujet de la religion prétendue réformée, depuis 1679 jusqu'à présent." Paris, 1701; 8vo. of xx and 475 pages. The same papers are to be found also in other collections.

§ 2.—Collections of various Documents.

1. "MONUMENTA PATRIÆ: Regis Caroli Alberti jussu edita." Turin, 1837; large 4to. "Chartarum Tomus primus," No. dxiii.; and in vol. ii., entitled Scriptores, GIOFFREDO: Storia delle Alpi maritime, etc., col. 488, year 1209, the decree of Otho IV. against the Vaudois.

2. "Bibliotheca maxima Patrum;" quoted by abbreviation BIB. M. P. P., containing the greater part of the Latin chroniclers who have written Contra Valdenses. Some of them are also published in the Biblioth. P. P. Lugdunensium.

3. Some of the same works are also to be found in JUSTELLUS, Codex canonum ecclesiasticorum (see the preface), and in GRETZERUS, already noticed (section II., § 1); in D'ACHERY, "Spicilegium veterum auctorum," printed from 1655 to 1677, in thirteen vols. 4to, and in 1723, in 3 vols. fol.—MARTÈNE, "Thesaurus anecdotorum," 1717; 5 vols. fol.; see vol. iv. (This author wrote also De antiquis Ecclesiæ ritibus, Rouen, 1700); MARTÈNE and DURAND, "Veterum scriptorum et monumentorum amplissima collectio." Paris, 1724-1733; 9 vols. fol.—D'ARGENTRÉ, "Collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus," Paris, 1728; 3 vols. fol.—BALUZIUS, Miscellanea, 1678-1715; 7 vols. 8vo. (See vol. ii., p. 208).—LABBEUS, Bibliotheca manuscriptorum, &c.

4. "Bullarium magnum,"—for the Bull of Innocent VIII., &c.—RIPOLL, "Bullarium ordinis prædicatorum." See in vol. i., p. 52, a letter to the Bishop of Mayence, given also by RAYNALD, in his Annales, No. xliii., ad an. 1233. Another letter to the Archbishop of Cologne, concerning the heresies of the time, is to be seen in TENGNAGEL, "Collectio veterum monumentorum contra schismaticos;" Ingolstadt, 1612; vol. i., p. 368; also in JUNIUS, Acta sacra, vol. i., p. 345.—MANSIUS, "Collectio conciliorum." See in vol. xxii., p. 476, the decree of Pope Lucius II., contra hæreticos.—HARDOUIN, Concilia Gallie, vol. i., p. 30.—MEIERS, "Codex canonum ecclesiæ universæ ex recens. Justelli, editus nova cura," &c. In this will be found most of the authors edited by Gretzerus, contra Valdenses, with new introductions, which, however, contain nothing new.

5. DUCHESNE. "Scriptores historiæ Francorum." Edition of Baluze, vols. v. and vi. (The Paris edition of 1636 is in 5 vols. fol.)—MABILLON, Vetera analecta, concerning Peter de Bruys. Vol. iii., pp. 312 and 315 of the second edition.—LELONG, "Bibliothèque historique de la France." Paris, 1768, 5 vols. fol.; vol. i. for notices of books; Biblioth. manuscriptorum for notices of old MSS.—Biblioth. sacra. Halle, 1768, 4 vols. 4to.—"Collection de documents pour l'histoire de France." There are a number of works with this title, by CIMBER and DANJOU, GUIZOT, LECOINTE and MICHAUD, BOUQUET, LEBER and PETITOT, &c.

6. CRESPIN (his name is not in the title-page of the work). "Histoire des martyrs persécutés et mis à mort pour la vérité de l'Evangile depuis les temps des Apôtres jusqu'à présent, &c." . . . Geneva, 1570; fol. The first edition was issued with the following title, "Le livre des martyrs, depuis Jean Huss, jusqu'en 1534." Geneva, 1554; 8vo. Claude BADUEL translated this work into Latin, and published it with the title, "Acta martyrum qui sæculo xvi. in Gallia . . . Italia, constans dederunt nomen Evangelio idque sanguine suo obsignarunt," 1556, 8vo.; and 1560, 4to. A third edition of Crespin, in French, appeared in 1559, and a fourth in 1561. The edition of 1570 was republished with several different titles; it is divided into eight books. SIMON GOULARD enlarged it by the addition of two books, in 1597. The edition of Geneva, in fol.,

1619, divided into twelve books, is the most complete. This Protestant martyrology has been placed in the Index by the court of Rome. This work has supplied the greater part of the materials for the History of the Martyrs (in Dutch), by MELLINUS, Amsterdam, 1620; The Mirror of the Martyrs, by VAN BRACHT, fol., Amsterdam, 1685; The Martyrology of PANTALEON, Basle, 1563 (containing the Confession of Faith presented by the Vaudois of Provence to Cardinal Sadolet (part II., book v., p. 130,) &c. Crespín was born at Arras about 1519. He retired to Geneva in 1548, and conceived the design of writing his admirable History of the Martyrs, in consequence of an account which he received of the sufferings and courage of five young Frenchmen, students at Lausanne, who were arrested at Lyons, when they were returning from visiting their parents, and burned alive in that city, as heretics, in 1552. "I may well say," such are Crespín's own words, "that they have suggested to me by their writings, the first thought of making these collections." (Edition of Geneva, 1619, fol. 5, at the bottom, in the Argument des douze livres.) The story of these five youths is related in this edition, from folio 201 to folio 931. The facts concerning the Vaudois are to be found in folios 111, 133, 182, 319, 333, 396, 411, 412, 418, 506, and 532-547.

7. In the Journal des Savants, the Bibliothèque Universelle, and other collections, documents have been published, of very various interest, connected with the history of the Vaudois. In particular, I shall mention (as pointed out to me by Professor Dumesnil), an interesting refutation of the charges made against the Vaudois of Cabrières and Merindol, in vol. iii. of "L'histoire de France, depuis l'établissement de la monarchie française dans les Gaules, dédiée au Roi, par le P. Gabriel Daniel, de la compagnie de Jésus." (Paris, 1713, 3 vols. fol.) This refutation is to be found in the "BIBLIOTHÈQUE CHOISIE, pour servir de suite à la Bibliothèque universelle, par Jean Le Clerc;" year 1713. Amsterdam, vol. xxvii., 32mo, pp. 49-76.

PART II.—MANUSCRIPT WORKS.

SECTION I.—ANCIENT VAUDOIS MANUSCRIPT IN THE ROMANCE LANGUAGE.

§ 1.—Origin of these MSS.

Bossuet, in his "History of the Variations of Protestantism" (book xi., § cxxvii.) exclaims, "Until some known library shall be pointed out to us where we may see the manuscripts, we cannot but be astonished that books are brought forward against us as authentic, which nobody ever saw save Perrin alone; as neither Aubertin nor La Roque refer to them, otherwise than upon his authority, only not saying that they never had them in their hands. This Perrin, who alone makes great use of them in his argument, takes no notice of any of the marks by which it is possible to establish the date of a volume, or to prove its antiquity; he merely tells us that they are old Vaudois books, a description sufficiently general to be applicable to the most modern black letter volumes." And before this he says, "Not only the language of Ville-Hardouin, who wrote 100 years after Peter de Bruys, but even that of authors subsequent to Ville-Hardouin, is more antiquated and obscure than that to which the date of 1120 is assigned; so that there can be no grosser absurdity than the attempt to palm these treatises upon us as of great antiquity." (Id. § cxxvi.) Such are Bossuet's words. "There is good reason, therefore, for thinking," he afterwards adds, "that these books, which are so vauntingly brought forward, without any solid proof of their date, were composed or altered by these reformed Vaudois, after the manner of Farel and his associates." (End of § cxxvii.)

By these words, Bossuet (1.) expresses a doubt of the existence of the Vaudois manuscripts; (2.) signifies his opinion that the language in which they are written is that of a later period than the thirteenth century; and (3.) insinuates that these books were composed or falsified by the Vaudois of the seventeenth century. Besides which, other authors have alleged (4.) that these manuscripts proceeded not from the Vaudois but from Petrobrusians; (5.) that they contain internal evidence of a more recent origin; and (6.) that they belong not to the Vaudois but to other Protestant sects of the Middle Ages. These different objections I propose to examine very briefly.

1. Almost all the Vaudois MSS., referred to by Perrin, are now deposited in public libraries, in which the author of the Variations might have consulted them. This is a sufficient reply to his first objection. (See these MSS. noticed in §§ 2, 3, and 4 of this section.)

2. Whether the language of Ville-Hardouin is more antiquated than that of the Vaudois MSS., the reader may judge. "Un Vénisien et un chevalier de France qui avoit nom André d'Urboise, entrèrent en la tor (tour), et autres genz comencent à entrer après als (eux); et cil (ceux) de la tor se desconfissent (débantent) et s'en vont . . . Ensi fu l'oz hebergié com vos avez oi (oui), et Constantinople prise le lundi de Pasque florie." Such is the language of Ville-Hardouin, who lived from 1167 to 1213. Hist. de la conquête de Constantinople, towards the end. Compare with this, the first lines of the Vaudois poem La Barca (Geneva MSS. No. 207; Dublin MSS. Class C, shelf 5, No. 21):—

"La sancta Trinita nos don parlar
Cosa que sia donor e de gloria
E que al profit de tuit poysa tornar
E a li auvidor donc atalentament," &c.

As I cannot suppose that the language of these lines will be so readily understood as that of Ville-Hardouin, I subjoin a reduction of them into modern French:—

"Que la sainte Trinité nous donne de dire
Des choses qui soient à son honneur et à sa gloire,
Et qui au profit de tous puissent tourner;
Et qu'aux auditeurs elle donne pareillement,"¹ &c.

Let us compare also with these some lines of the Châtelain De Coucy, who died in 1192. Let us see if they do not come much nearer to the French of the present day, than the Vaudois language does to that of the Troubadours of the twelfth century:—

¹ The word atalentament, here rendered by the adverb pareillement, comes from tal, aital, which signifies such, equal, like [tel, pareil, semblable], with the adverbial termination in ment, the use of which has passed from the Romance language to the French. Raynouard, who translates this word désire [désir], unconsciously affords a proof of the difference between the idiom of the Troubadours and that of the Vaudois; for he was perfectly acquainted with the former, and it may be supposed, without disparagement to his reputation, that the latter was less familiar to him. It would, consequently, be wrong to confound the one with the other. The recent labours of the Ecole des Chartes have manifested the existence, in the great family of the Romance tongues, of a greater number of branches than had been previously supposed. That which extended into the Vaudois valleys is one of the most distinct. M. Fauriel had already given it a place by itself (Verbal communications, Nov., 1834); and M. Augustin Thierry acknowledges the distinct character of the Vaudois idiom (10th Nov., 1851). This opinion is shared by M. Villemain (whom I saw at the same period); and it is in accordance with the views of M. De Sismondi, whose long-continued researches into the history of the middle ages made him very competent to judge of such a matter. (Letter on the Antiquity of the Nobla Leycecon. Geneva, 12th June, 1852.)

“Ble dame me prie de chanter
Si est bien drois que je face chançon. . . .”

(This song is quoted by TISSOT in his Leçons et modèles de littérature française, vol. ii. p. 41.) To find in the earlier states of the French language, something analogous to the Vaudois language, we must go much farther back than the time of the Troubadours. I will now show what resembles it most nearly.

“Pro Deo, et pro Christian poblo, et nostro commun salvament, d'ist di (from this day) in avant, in quant Deus savir (savoir) et podir (pouvoir) me dunat (donnera) si salvarai io eist meon fradre Karlo (so will I defend my brother Charles),” &c. (TISSOT, i. 13.) Such was the language of the eighth and ninth centuries. The sentence just quoted is from the speech of Louis of Germany, to the vassals of Charles the Bald, who died in 876, at the foot of Mount Cenis. These brief specimens will suffice to show the character of the language at these different periods; and from this it follows that the idiom of the Vaudois books much more nearly resembles the language of the eighth century than that of the twelfth. And Raynouard, in placing these Vaudois poems amongst the PRIMITIVE monuments of the Romance tongue, sufficiently recognizes them as possessing an antiquity greater than the days of the Troubadours.

3. All the MSS. mentioned by Perrin, and to which this note relates, are of a date anterior to the Reformation, and consequently could neither have been composed nor falsified by the Reformed, as Bossuet more maliciously than justly insinuates. All these manuscripts (with the acknowledged exception of one only) are anterior to the invention of printing. However, none of them is as ancient as the works which they contain. In other words, we have not (unless it be in one or two doubtful exceptive instances) the paper written by the authors' own hand, we have only copies. It is easy, therefore, to see how modifications might be introduced by copyists, as we shall by and by find that they have been. But the copyists themselves lived before the Reformation, and therefore could not be subject to its influence, which deprives Bossuet's insinuations of all power. At the end of the treatise on the reading and efficacy of the Word of God, which occurs in the first volume of the ancient Vaudois MSS. deposited at Cambridge, No. 4, this date appears, Anno Domini 1230.

4. After having cited the Vaudois treatise OF ANTICHRIST, dated in the year 1120 (p. 57), Perrin found a difficulty of reconciling that date to his system, which made the Vaudois to derive their origin from Valdo of Lyons (chap. i. and ii.), according to the received opinion of all the writers of his time. Nor could he devise any better means of escape from this embarrassment, than to ascribe to Peter De Bruys the Vaudois works which bore a date anterior to Valdo, and in particular this treatise Of Antichrist. See the marginal note in pp. 253 and 254. It was evidently this note that suggested to Fusselin, Baumgarten, and other authors, their opinion which ascribes the Vaudois books to the Petrobrusians. But the character of the Petrobrusians, as Neander observes in his Life of St. Bernard, is very different in its warlike fire, from the peacefulness and the calm and serene faith which generally marked the Vaudois. Moreover, Peter De Bruys, as the writers of that country say, was a native of the Vallouise. (See Hist. du diocèse d'Embrun, by Father ALBERT, i. 56; Memoires de Dominique Rochas, MS. of Carpentras and Grenoble; Hist. des Alpes Cottiniennes, by Father MARCELIN FOURNIER, MSS. of Gap and Lyons).

According to other authors, Valdo himself retired to Freyssinières (MSS. of Carpentras, No. 606, vol. i., p. 101). The Abbot of Cluny (Peter the Venerable) wrote against Peter De Bruys to the prelates of Embrun, Gap, Die, and Arles. (See this letter in FLEURY, Hist. Eccles., vol. lxi. No. 24.) We know that Bruys was burned alive at St. Gilles. But it was only in these regions, where his doctrine was new, that a violent feeling was excited against him. His party subsisted but for a short time, and consequently could not produce works which exhibit proofs of long meditation. Moreover, these MSS. have been found nowhere but amongst the Vaudois mountains. If it was there that Peter De Bruys was born, it is natural to admit that he was of Vaudois descent. To conclude, we can account for the motive which causes these manuscripts to be ascribed to the Petrobrusians—this motive is based merely upon a hypothesis—this hypothesis is not supported by any proof, and there are numerous proofs that they ought to be ascribed to the Vaudois. (See Nos. 6 and 7 of this §.)

5. The different treatises in the Romance language contained in the Vaudois manuscripts, have not been all composed at the same period. The MSS. which we now possess are mere copies; and these copies also have been made at very different dates. Some of them are on paper, and cannot be older than the fourteenth century; others are on parchment, and may be of a much earlier date. In these latter, however, the orthography, the writing, the abbreviations, the form of the letters, &c., still vary sufficiently to prove that there are amongst them great differences of age. "I find reason to think that there does not exist any very ancient manuscript of these pieces," said Mr. Raynouard, in a letter to me upon this subject (6th April, 1833). In some of these manuscripts, there are private annotations or new citations, written sometimes on the margin, and sometimes at the bottom of the page, by subsequent hands (for example in the MSS. of Geneva, No. 208, pp. 4, 5, 6, 7, 12, 14, 20, 21, &c.; and in that of Dublin, Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18). Later copyists often introduced these additions into the text at the place to which they referred, so that the new book, when it came from their hands, was clean on the margins, and seemed really new; this has been the source of unquestionable interpolations. It is upon these considerations that the authenticity of the date 1120, in the book OF ANTICHRIST above quoted, is defended, notwithstanding the reference which it contains to the Milleloquium, and which could not have been made before the fourteenth century. This reason is a good one; but the numerous passages of the Old and New Testaments which are contained in this treatise (Perrin, pp. 273–280, and Léger, pp. 77–79), do not correspond to the ancient divisions of the sacred books (τιτλοι and κεφαλαιαι), but rather to the present division (see Perrin, pp. 279, 280, &c.); introduced by Cardinal Hugo of Saint Cher, in the thirteenth century.¹

Moreover, Léger places in the same Book of Antichrist, and under the date 1120, a Confession of Faith, which contains a canon of the books of Scripture, such as was not determined till a much later period² (Léger, p. 92), and this

¹ I speak here of the division into chapters, for the division into verses was not introduced into the gospel till 1551, by Robert Stephen. M. Monastier (vol. ii., p. 344) has indicated the verses where the text published by Perrin (p. 274) does not indicate them. But the books of the Old Testament were already divided into verses, from the time of Jesus Christ.

² I think it may even be said that this canon was not fixed till after the Reformation. (1.) Because the books of the Old Testament were never before that epoch (from the fifth century at least) distinguished into apocryphal and canonical. (2.) Because the sentence which begins with the words, Ainsi sen segon li livres Apocriphe, &c., is to be found also in the confessions produced after the Reformation (Gallican, art. iv.; Anglican, art. vi.; Belgic, id., &c.) (3.) Because it is only since the Reformation that there have been reckoned two books of Confession of Faith occurs almost word for word in the MS. of Dublin, Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18, p. 21, under the date 1530. Perrin also gives it as being extracted not from the treatise Of Antichrist, but from another book whose date is not signified. (Marginal note in p. 79.) But after all these difficulties are removed, by the supposition of the alterations to which this treatise may have been subjected by later copyists; it remains, however, by no means probable, that it was composed in the year 1120 (Léger dates it in 1126, chap. xv. p. 83), because at this period the Church of Rome was not regarded as Antichrist; and because the Vaudois always speak of that Church with respect, in their most ancient writings, even when contending against and exposing its errors.

It would be interesting to inquire if a number of these treatises, in the Romance language, are not translations or imitations of various short Latin treatises published about the same period. Finally, it ought to be observed that the Romance idiom was preserved in the Vaudois valleys much longer than anywhere else, proof of which may be found in the Acts of the Synod of 1532. (Dublin MSS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18.) To conclude, the Vaudois works are not all of the same antiquity; but even when in a work of ancient composition, passages are found of a modern date, it does not follow that the antiquity of the book is to be rejected, for these passages may have been interpolated by copyists. Also, a work written on paper, may be anterior to the invention of paper, as Homer and Virgil, printed in our days, are nevertheless anterior to the invention of printing. The surest marks of antiquity are presented in the very contents of the works in question. The general character, the roots, and what may be called the very woof of the language in which they are written, afford also a solid basis for determining their date. The more that this language resembles Latin, it is the more ancient. (See the principles of this comparison applied to the Vaudois MSS., in No. 2 of this §.)

6. Do these writings really belong to the Vaudois?

(1.) On the first leaf of the Geneva MS., No. 207, are these words, "This Book contains the Exposition of the Song of Songs of Solomon, and the poems entitled La Barea, Novel Comfort, Nobla Leyezon, Lo Payre Eternal, Lo Novcl Sermon, Lo Desprezzi del mont, and the Avangeli de li quatre semenez, also a Treatise on Penitence. It belongs to the Reformed Churches of the valleys of Piedmont, who request that it may be preserved in the Library of Geneva."

(2.) The treatise De la penitencia is also in part to be found in the other Geneva MSS., Nos. 208 and 209, and in the Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 22. The poems are to be found also in the Dublin MS. of the same series, No. 21.

(3.) It is in exactly the same idiom that all the other works are written, which bear the general designation of Ancient Vaudois MSS. in the Romance tongue.

(4.) Perrin, who gives the list of these manuscripts (Part i., pp. 57-60), declares that they all come from the Vaudois valleys. (Perrin, part i., pp. 13, 18, 20, 24, 29, &c. Part ii., p. 157, et seq.) Those which Léger sent to the library of Geneva in 1662, came also from these valleys. (Léger, chap. iii., p. 23.)

(5.) The acts of several Synods attest the Vaudois origin of these manuscripts. (See sect. I. of this Bibliography, art. Perrin.)

(6.) In these manuscripts, the Vaudois speak in their own name (Book of George Morel, Dublin MSS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18), and often name themselves, "Ilh dion qu'es VAUDÉS." (Nobla Leyezon, l. 372—" Le petit tropel de li christians, appella par fals nom, VAUDÉS" [Perrin, p. 224], because this little flock which was called Vaudois, claimed to be designated by the name of Christians alone).

Samuel and two of Kings; before that period they were only reckoned as four books of Kings. Other incompatibilities have been pointed out in vol. i. p. 334 of the Revue Théologique, Strasburg, 1850.

(7.) All the learned men who have published fragments of these different manuscripts, agree in giving them without hesitation as Vaudois manuscripts. (Raynouard, vol. ii.; Morland, chap. iii.; Hahn, pp. 560-703, &c.)

(8.) The enemies of the Vaudois, who have frequented their country, themselves attest the existence of such manuscripts, which they say that they have seen, held in their hands, and read in the valleys. (RORENGO, Memorie storiche dell' introduzione degl' eresie nelle valli. 4to edition, p. 20. "Se bene il Perrino n'habbia prodotto qualche particella . . .," says he, which implies that the unpublished portion was very considerable.

(9.) We know that one of the principal occupations of the Vaudois Barbas, was to make copies of pious books, for the instruction of their disciples. (GILLES, chap. ii. p. 15. Preface to Olivetan's Bible.)

(10.) All these books, which are now scattered in different libraries, were once obtained from the Vaudois valleys. (PERRIN, p. 57, marginal note, and the articles PERRIN and GILLES in this Bibliography.) None of them have ever been met with elsewhere. The Synod of Grenoble (1602) having caused search to be made for all the Vaudois and Albigensis MSS. which still existed, found none but Vaudois MSS. No other people, that I know of, have produced any similar. Everything, therefore, concurs to prove that these MSS. are really the work of the Vaudois, and nothing indicates the contrary.

7. Were all these pieces composed in the language of the Vaudois valleys? One circumstance which has never been noticed, and concerning which, the Vaudois themselves must be the only witnesses, but which is nevertheless of great importance with regard to this question, is that all who are acquainted with the present patois of the valleys (and especially with that of the mountains¹), very easily, and almost without any preparatory study, comprehend the language of these ancient Vaudois books which Raynouard calls the primitive Romance tongue. On the contrary, it frequently happens that persons versed in the idiom of the Troubadours, are very far from understanding the Vaudois books; and, for myself, I do not hesitate to avow, that there are in the writings of the Troubadours many passages which I could not understand without a translation, which is not the case with the books now under consideration. The author of the Choix de poésies originales des Troubadours, and of the Grammar of the Romance tongue (Grammaire de la langue romane), may certainly be regarded as well acquainted with the idiom of the primitive monuments of that language; yet M. Monastier justly takes notice of inaccuracies into which RAYNOUARD has fallen in the translation of the Nobla Leyezon, in lines 100, 146, 147, 151, 190, 191, 196, 208, 223, 276, 281, 299, &c. May I be permitted also to take notice of similar inaccuracies in modern authors.

M. HERZOG says, at the conclusion of his thesis De origine et pristino statu

¹ For that part of the valleys which is adjacent to the plain of Piedmont has undergone modifications in its language, caused by the admixture of Piedmontese. It appears that this was already the case even in the days of Rorengo; for he compares the old Romance tongue, which he calls the Vaudois tongue, with that which was then spoken in our mountains:—"Sono qui, libri scritti a mano, uno de quali tengo appresso di me in lingua Valdese, o per dir meglio montagnara." (Memorie Storiche dell' introd. degl' eresie nelle valli, p. 20.) At the present day it is in the communes of Bobi, Pral, and Rodoret that it is spoken in its greatest perfection.

Vald. &c. (p. 44), "Secutus sum adiutorem Genevensem, Hahn editoris, linguæ Valdensiæ admodum peritum." And in the first piece published by Hahn, I find the following inaccuracies:—P. 560, note 1, atalentament, translated by desire, signifies in like manner.—P. 561, note 1, Per que . . . non se debia levar, translated how he should not take, signifies that he might not rise.—P. 562, note 7, Paure n'intren, translated we enter there, signifies we enter there poor.—P. 563, note, Frevols et devols . . . This last word, translated devout, signifies weak; the first is not translated, it signifies frail, languishing, and it is difficult to conceive what meaning could have been attached to it by the translator. In the same page, note 10, Local es verms (the word should have been vernīs), e lendenas e peoth abrivol (which should be abimnol). These corrections are derived from the original manuscript. The first part of this line is translated thus, seed of vermin. It should be translated which is varnished (brilliant externally); the word tendenas, which has been translated by slow, signifies the interior, and the conclusion of the line, which is not translated, signifies abominable dust. It may be remarked that the passages which most need explanation, are often those which are left untranslated.—Same page, note 13, neyes translated same, signifies there are some of them. At the end of this line is the word abastat; it is not translated, and probably was not understood, it signifies enough; hence the Italian word abbastanza.—In p. 564, note 1, li seurczis, translated tears away, signifies becomes dim.—Same page, note 3, . . . li colla e lo fla . . ., translated adheres, and his side . . ., signifies slips away from him, and his breath . . .—P. 565, note 7, chaczin, translated bark, should be chamin and the translation way. (Moreover, chaczin does not signify a bark.)—Same page, note 9, pereisere, translated shall perish (plural), should be pareisere, and the translation, shall appear (singular), &c. I shall proceed no farther. I have scarcely gone over one-half of the piece (La Barca) published by Hahn. (Pp. 560–570).

In the few citations of the Vaudois books, for which M. Herzog has not made use of Raynouard's translations, a few inaccuracies might, perhaps, also be noticed. Thus, in p. 8, fourth quotation, the words cum trey de sostenguīs, translated sicut tres Deos sustines, signifies cum tribus digitis sustines. This quotation is taken from the sixteenth stanza of the poem Lo Payre Eternal.

In p. 9, third quotation, the word ordenament is translated conmode, but would, perhaps, be more accurately rendered by regulariter. In p. 10, first quotation, the words sencza defalliment, translated sine vitio, ought to be rendered sine intermissione. In the same page, last line, al segle present, translated hominibus hujus mundi, literally signifies ad seculum præsens. Not being able to comprehend the translation which M. Herzog gives in the next page, p. 11, of the first quotation which appears there, I shall content myself with observing that the first word perque, translated nam, ought to be translated ut, and that the general meaning of the passage has reference to regeneration. In the following page, in the last quotations, De renovellar me al present tu l'affrezca, translated In eo est ut restaures me in presenti, signifies Ad nunc me renovandum te ipsum deprimis. (S'affrezcar, a genuine onomatopoeia to represent the noise made by the wings of a bird when it alights. In the next line, que yo non rimagna en fecza, translated ne remaneam retro, rather means ne morar in cæno. In the next line, de gracious istament, approximatively rendered by full of grace (plena gratiæ), literally signifies of gracious support, &c.

It ought also, I think, to be taken into account, in order that a right estimate may be formed of the probability of very ill-founded opinions having been put forth concerning these VAUDOIS books in the Romance tongue—and I make this remark not with reference to the works of MM. Hahn and Herzog, but quite generally—that Raynouard alone, and persons who were inhabitants of the Vaudois valleys, have successfully attempted to translate any of them entire. (See the translation of an ancient Vaudois poem, recently discovered in the Echo des vallées, t. i., No. 10.)

I think, therefore, it may be said—

(1.) That the idiom in which the old Vaudois books (from the twelfth to the fourteenth century) were written, was not the vulgar tongue of France at that epoch. (Evidence of this will be found in comparing with these books, the writings of the contemporary Troubadours, particularly those of the Lyonnais, Provence, and Dauphiny. I have not room to institute this comparison here.)

(2.) That the idiom of the Vaudois books is called by Raynouard (vol. ii.) the Primitive Romance tongue, and by Rorengo (p. 20) lingua Valdese, o per dir meglio montagnera.

(3.) But where was this mountain tongue spoken? No doubt just where we find it still in use after the fourteenth century. But it was this language which the Vaudois employed in 1520, in writing to Ecolampadius (Perrin, p. 211), and to Bucer (Id. p. 213; the original is amongst the Dublin MSS., Class A, Shelf 4, No. 13, p. 5). It was in this language that they stated to the Reformers their doctrines and usages. (Same MS., of which a passage is quoted in the Israel of the Alps, part I. chap. i., note.) It was in this idiom also that the Acts of the Synod held at Angrogna, in 1532, were written. (Same MS., from p. 118 to p. 125, although the style of the concluding prayer already exhibits some traces of Italian). And this idiom was also employed by the Vaudois of the Alps in writing to one another. (See the letter of the Barba, Bartholemew Tertian, in Perrin, pp. 73–78. This Barba lived in 1470, and his language is still the Primitive Romance tongue, almost without alteration.)

(4.) In comparing the present dialect of different parts of the valley of the Rhone, with that of the Vaudois valleys, we find that it is still the latter which exhibits the greatest number of points of analogy to the old Romance tongue.

(5.) From these different considerations I think I may conclude, [1.] That the Nobla Leyczon, and the other works written in the same language, belong to the people who spoke that language. [2.] That this idiom, called by Raynouard the Primitive Romance tongue (Langue romane primitive), and by Rorengo, Lingua valdese, was really the idiom of the Vaudois, and [3.] That consequently the books are to be ascribed to the Vaudois. See the linguistic considerations in No. 7 of next chapter, relative to the difference which existed in the twelfth century, between the idiom of the Alps and that of the Lyonnais.

§ 2.—Biblical MSS.

Gilles says, “This Vaudois people have had pastors of great learning . . . versed in the languages of Holy Scripture . . . and very laborious . . . especially in transcribing to the utmost of their ability, the books of Holy Scripture, for the use of their disciples.” (Chap. ii. p. 15, paragraph 2.) This explains the circumstance that copies of the books of the Bible, translated into the Romance tongue, are of far more frequent occurrence than copies of any other work preserved in our Vaudois MSS.

1. VAUDOIS BIBLE OF LYONS. (Library of the palace of the arts, No. 60.) This MS. forms a small 4to volume, on vellum (parchment), containing the four Evangelists, the Acts of the Apostles, the Apocalypse, the Epistle of St. James, those of Peter and John, and those of St. Paul. Amongst these last, is to be found the Epistle to the Laodiceans, placed after that to the Colossians, and beginning thus: "Paulus, apostols, no domes ni per liomes, mais per Jesu-Xrist, als fres que son a laudicia: gracia a vos, et patz de Diu lo paire nostre ed el senhor Jesu-Xrist:" a translation of the text given by FABRICIUS (Codices Apocryphorum Novi Testamenti, vol. i. p. 859).—Παῦλος ἀπόστολος. οὐκ ἂν' ἀνθρώπων, οὐδὲ δι' ἀνθρώπου ἀλλὰ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, τοῦ ἐν Δαδοικίᾳ ἀδελφοῦ. Χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπο Θεοῦ πατρὸς. καὶ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, . . . &c.¹

After the Epistle to the Hebrews, which is the last, come the Benedicite and the Pater noster, in Latin, and then follow these words: "Adoremus Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum tres vegadas, gracia domini nostri Iyesu-Xrist, sit cum omnibus nobis." The volume is concluded by six leaves, filled, in like manner, with sentences of a religious character.

I believe this to be one of the most ancient of all the Vaudois MSS.; (1.) upon account of the form of the letters, in which no resemblance to the black letter yet appears; (2.) upon account of the character of the language, which is much nearer to the Latin; (3.) upon account of the absence of ornaments; (4.) because it contains the Epistle to the Laodiceans.

2. Another Biblical manuscript, in the Romance language, is also deposited at Lyons, but in the Archives of the Prefecture. According to a letter from the Archiviste of this establishment, this manuscript was brought from Nîmes to Lyons, a few years ago. It is in small 4to, double-columned, and full of abbreviations. It contains the whole of the New Testament, and concludes with a ritual occupying ten leaves. I have not seen this manuscript.

3. VAUDOIS BIBLE OF GRENOBLE. (Deposited in the public library, being No. 488 of the new catalogue, and No. 8595 of the old.)

This manuscript is 167 millimetres in length, 123 in breadth, and 51 in thickness. The boards are of wood, formerly covered with red skin, and held together by two brazen clasps, one of which has disappeared. It is written in black letter (with a few ornaments made by the pen, and capitals coloured with red and blue) in double columns, except the first page. All the leaves of this manuscript are of parchment, except the last thirty, which are of paper. It contains all the books of the New Testament, also twelve chapters of Proverbs, the book of Ecclesiastes, ten chapters of Wisdom, fifteen chapters of Ecclesiasticus, and the Song of Songs. All these books of the Old Testament are placed after the Apocalypse. The verses are nowhere marked. The divisions of the chapters do not always correspond with those in our Bibles at the present day.

Each of the books of the New Testament is preceded by a little preface, entitled, Prolie. The following is the commencement of the PROLIC SOBRE MATHIO: "Abm Mathio hagues predica premierament en Judea, e volent trapassar a las gencz, fo lo primer loqual scris levangeli en hebraye . . .," &c.

On the thirty leaves of paper, at the end of this volume, are (1.) a list of passages to be read and meditated upon for every Sabbath and festival in the year; (2.) a chapter entitled, De Sanctis; (3.) a little commentary on the Beatitudes (Matt. v. 2-10), entitled, De la oyt benaygranczas scriptas cum breveta; (4.) a paraphrase of the Lord's Prayer; (5.) an extract from the twenty-seventh chapter of Numbers, which terminates the volume.

4. VAUDOIS BIBLE OF DUBLIN. (Library of Trinity College, Class A, Shelf 4, No. 13, ex Biblioth. Usserii.) This manuscript is mentioned by LELONG in his Bibliotheca sacra, vol. i., art. 2, in the chapter on the Italian Bible. It, in many respects, resembles the Vaudois Bible of Grenoble, of which it is probably a copy, for it contains exactly the same books, with prefaces to the Gospels and Epistles corresponding to the prologs above-mentioned. The following is the commencement of the preface to Saint Matthew in the Dublin manuscript: "PROLOGUS SANCTI JEROMI SECUNDUM MATTHEUM. Cum Matthio agues premierament predica lavangeli in Judea, volent trapassar a las gent, scriis premierament lavangeli en abraie," &c. Yet it does not necessarily follow that the one of these two manuscripts has been copied from the other. The date of that of Dublin is indicated at the end of the Book of Revelation, as follows: Deo gras, 1522. The whole MS. is in the same hand, very easily read, on vellum, in 4to, and in good preservation.

¹ "This epistle," says M. E. Reuss, "exists only in Latin. The present Greek translation was made in the sixteenth century; however, it is probable that there was formerly a Greek original." (Letter of 9th July, 1850.)

5. VAUDOIS BIBLE OF ZURICH. (Public Library, Codex MS. N. T. Valdensis, c. 169.) Lelong mentions this manuscript in the following terms: "Novum Testamentum, lingua pedemontana Vallensi, per Barbetum [a Barba or Barbet] quemdam, seu ministrum Valensem translatum. Codex, in-12; scriptus post annum MC." (Bibliotheca sacra, vol. i., p. 369.) This manuscript is upon vellum. I have no particular note of the books which it contains. Lelong's note seems to mention only those of the New Testament. None of these books has any introduction or preface, as in the Grenoble and Dublin manuscripts. The following is the beginning of the Gospel according to John, in the Zurich manuscript: "Lo filh era al comenczament, e lo filh era enapres Dio, e Dio era lo filh. Aiczo era al comenczament enapres Dio. Totas cosas son feitas per luy, e alcuna cosa non es feita sencea luy. Czo que fo fait en luy era vita, e la vita era luz de li ome. E la luz luezic en las tenebras, e las tenebras non cumpresen ley." (Gospel according to John, chap. i., vers. 1-5.)

6. VAUDOIS BIBLE OF AIX. (Indicated by Lelong, vol. i., p. 369.) Contains the four Gospels, the seven Canonical Epistles, the fourteen Epistles of St. Paul, also the Proverbs of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs; the first ten chapters of the Book of Wisdom, and the first fifteen of Ecclesiasticus. The Grenoble manuscript also has only ten chapters of the Book of Wisdom, and fifteen of Ecclesiasticus. Lelong adds concerning the Aix manuscript:—"Codex spissus in-4to, integer, in quo nihil deest, in membranis a quadringentis annis circiter exaratus; at versio antiquior, sicut ad me scripsit dom. Thomasin de Mazangue, filius senatoris Aquensis, penes quem extat hoc exemplar: quod usui Valdensibus fuisse, multis probari potest argumentis," &c.

There is also a description of this manuscript, by Remerville de St. Quentin, in the collection entitled, Pièces fugitives d'histoire et de littérature, Paris, 1704; second part, p. 270. Alexander Natalis likewise speaks of it in his Vindex librorum deutero-canoniconum Veteris Testamenti, &c. But he seems to think that the manuscript mentioned by Remerville, is not the same as that described by Lelong on the authority of Thomas de Mazangue.

7. VAUDOIS BIBLES OF PARIS. The libraries of this capital contain several Biblical manuscripts, which belong or have been ascribed to the Vaudois. Dr. Gilly, in the learned introduction prefixed to the Romance version of the Gospel according to John, published by him at London in 1848, has given a particular account of these manuscripts. I shall follow him rapidly in his examination of them.

A.—MS. No. 8086, of the Bibliothèque Nationale, in Paris. This MS. is mentioned under the head, Nouveau Testament en provençal. It is on vellum, in small 4to, written in double columns, and has suffered much from time or use. The first leaf of the volume is marked as being properly the thirty-second. The Gospel of Matthew, and the commencement of that of Mark, seem to have been removed. It contains the following books:—St. Mark, from fol. 32 to fol. 48; St. Luke, fol. 48-72; St. John, 72-86; Acts, extending to the second page of fol. 114; the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. John, which occupy fol. 114–126. Then come the Epistles of St. Paul, to fol. 182. They are followed by the Epistle to Philemon and that to the Hebrews, fol. 186–196; and the volume concludes with the Apocalypse, from the midst of which also some leaves have been removed. The first verses of the Gospel according to John, are in this volume as follows:—

“Lo filh era al comensament; el filh era am Dieu, el filh era Dieus. Aquest era al comensament am Dieu. Totas canzas foron fachas per el: e nenguna causa non fou fach senz el; so che fou fach, era en lui vida: e la vida era lus dels homes.”

I regard this MS. as belonging, by its language, to the class of Vaudois MSS.

B.—MSS. Nos. 6831–6833 of the same library. Three folio volumes, double-columned, containing the Old and New Testaments. This MS. is set down as a Bible in Provençal, but it had been formerly regarded as a Catalan Bible. (See Le-long, Bibl. Sacra., vol. i., p. 369.) It belonged to the library of Cardinal Mazarin. The first volume begins with Genesis, and ends with the Book of Job. The second begins with Proverbs, contains the Psalms and the Prophets, and ends with a short dissertation on St. Mark, as a transition to the third volume, which contains the New Testament.

The sheets of this MS. are of paper, mingled with vellum, and adorned with vignettes. It is said to belong to the fifteenth century.

A short preface, entitled, prolic, is placed at the head of a few of the books. There is none prefixed to the Gospel according to Matthew; but that which is prefixed to the Gospel according to John, has a great resemblance to the prolic which precedes the same book in the Dublin MS. Other parts of these little prologues resemble those contained in the Vaudois Bible of Grenoble.

The following is the commencement of the Gospel according to John, in our MS. No. 6833:—

“En lo comensament era paraula, e la paraula era ab Deu; e Deu era la paraula. Acso era en lo comensament ab Deu. Totes coses son fetes per ell, e sens ell nenguna cosa non es fata.”

The first volume of this work, which bears the number 6831, and which contains part of the Old Testament, commences thus:—

“En lo principio crea Deu lo ciel e la terra; hera vana e vuyda, e les tenebres heran sobre la fac del abis, e l'esperit de Deu era portat sopra les aigues.”

In the Book of Job, it is to be remarked that the word Leviathan, is translated by lo diabla.

I believe this MS. also, upon account of its language, to belong to the class of Vaudois MSS.

C.—MS. of the same library, bearing the No. 7268^{2.2}, and known by the name of the Bible of the Poor. One vol. 4to, on vellum, written in double columns, with coloured initial letters, which have almost everywhere been taken away. This manuscript formerly belonged to the library of Colbert. It contains the following books:—(1.) Genesis; (2.) Exodus, which begins at fol. 30; (3.) Numbers, beginning at fol. 52—the first leaf of this book has been removed; (4.) Deuteronomy, beginning at fol. 76; (5.) Joshua, fol. 97; (6.) Judges, fol. 3; (7.) Ruth, fol. 125; (8.) The First Book of Kings, of which one leaf has been removed, fol. 128; (9.) The Second Book of Kings, fol. 145; (10.) The Third Book of Kings, fol. 161; (11.) The Fourth Book of Kings, fol. 179; (12.) Tobit, fol. 196; (13.) Judith, fol. 201; (14.) Esther, fol. 209; (15.) Job, fol. 216; (16.) Psalms, fol. 232. The initial letters are preserved in fol. 232, 241, 248, and 252. (17.) The Gospel according to St. Matthew, fol. 270; (18.)

Mark, fol. 290; (19.) Luke, fol. 306; (20.) John, fol. 330; (21.) Acts of the Apostles, fol. 348; (22.) The Epistle of St. James, fol. 368; (23.) The two Epistles of St. Peter, fol. 369. The last of these Epistles is incomplete; the end of the MS. has been torn, and is completely wanting.

Concerning this MS., M. Paulin-Paris, expresses himself in the following terms:—"This precious volume formerly belonged to James Augustus De Thou, whose signature may still be seen upon the first leaf The text is the most ancient that I know of the literal translation of the sacred books; this copy being as old as the earlier part of the thirteenth century The writing, the ink, and the dialect of the marginal notes, all combine to prove this. But it is not so easy to fix the date of the translation itself. Why should it not be as old as the twelfth century? May it not be that famous translation made by the Lyonnese, Stephen De Hansa, or D'Ansa. at the request of Peter Valdo, about 1170—a translation which was called the Bible of the Poor, because of the name which the Vaudois heretics affected? We have no positive proof, but it may be presumed that this French translation of the sacred books, undertaken for the first time under the auspices of Peter Valdo, is the same which was censured by Innocent III., about the year 1200, and the origin of which was unknown to that pontiff. A great number of writers of the thirteenth century, point it out as a book dangerous to read, and no other contemporary author of any similar translation is mentioned."¹ "I doubt not," he adds, in a subsequent place,² "that the MS., 7268²⁻², was executed in the diocese of Reims, or in that of Sens." "Ere we can acknowledge the existence of translations of the Bible anterior to this, in the vulgar tongue," he also says,³ "we must have evident proofs of it, which as yet we have not." M. Le Roux De Liney⁴ has made us acquainted with several partial translations, which he regards as belonging to the twelfth century, but he acknowledges that the known manuscripts are not older than the century following.⁵—"Such is the translation of the four Books of Kings, preserved in the Mazarine Library, and in the Royal Library; the Psalms of Nos. 1152 bis, 278 Latin, and 7887 French; the Apocalypse, No. 7013," &c.⁶

Brief specimens of these various manuscripts will give a just idea of the language spoken in France in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.⁷

First specimen, taken from Psalm xiii. [xiv]—Dixit insipiens in corde suo, &c.—"The fool hath said in his heart," &c.

I.—From MS. 7268²⁻², fol. 234.

"Cil qui estoit neant sages (who has no wisdom) dist en son cuer, Dex n'est pas. Il sont corrompu, et sont fet abhominable. Il n'est qui face bien, de si à un seul."

III.—MS. 6701.

"Li nient sage, dist en son quer (cœur); il n'y al Dieu. Cil sont corruptz et faitz sont

II.—From MS. 6818³, fol. . . .

"Cil qui estoit noient sage, dist en son cuer, Dieux n'est pas. Ilz sont corrompuz e leur fait abhominable; il n'est qui face bien de si à un seul."

IV.—MS. 6816².

"Le fol (or he who lacks wisdom) dit en son cuer, Dieu n'est pas: Ilz sont corrompus

¹ Les manuscrits français de la bibliothèque du roi, leur histoire et celle des textes allemands, anglais, hollandais, italiens, espagnols de la même collection; par A. PAULIN-PARIS de l'académie royale des inscriptions et belles lettres, conservateur adjoint de la bibliothèque du roi. Section des manuscrits. Paris (Techner, Place de Louvre, 12), 1848. Vol. vii., pp. 185 and 188.

² Id. ibid., p. 189.

³ Id. ibid., p. 190.

⁴ Introduction to his edition of the old translation of the Four Books of Kings, Paris, 1841.

⁵ PAULIN-PARIS, vol. vii., p. 192

⁶ Id.

⁷ These quotations are all extracted from the work of M. PAULIN-PARIS, above-named, vol. vii., pp. 194, 195.

abominables. En lour estudies (en leurs études), il n'y a nul qui fait bien; il n'y ad nul, desques (jusques) à un."

et sont fais abominables en leurs estudies; il n'est qui face bien, jusques à ung seul."

Second specimen, taken from the First Psalm, as preserved in MS. 6818³:—

I.—MS. 6818³.

"J'ai ma fiance en Nostre S. comant dites-vous à m'ame (à ma ame) trespasse en la montaigne moysnel. (En moineau; like a sparrow.) Pour ce vées ci les pecheurs, qui ont tendu leurs ars (arses) et ont appareilliés leurs saietes, pour courre qu'il saietent caulx qui ont cuer droiturier, en lieu obscur."

II.—MS. 6818².

"J'ay ma fiance en Nostre Seigneur. Comment dictez vous a mon ame; trespasse la montaigne comme un moinel. Car vecy les pecheurs, qui ont tendu leur arc, et ont appareillie leurs saietes (sajettes; arrows) et leurs tarquois très forts, ad ce qu'il saietent (pierce with arrows) en bien obscur, ceux ont cuer droiturier."

Third specimen, same passage, from the Bible of the Poor, No. 7268^{2.2}.

"Ge ai ma fiance en Nostre Seignor. Coment dites vos a m'ame, trespasse en la montaigne comme moinel."

"Por ce veiz ci, les pecheors qui ont tendu lor arc, et ont appareillié lor saietes (have prepared their arrows) en lor coivre (cuivre; quiver) que ils saietent (sajettent; pierce with arrows) cels qui ont cuer droiturier, en lieu obscur."

I regret that I have not at hand one of the Vaudois MSS. already mentioned, that I might borrow from their translation a passage to be compared with those just quoted. But so many passages of these Vaudois MSS. have been already quoted in this Bibliography, and in the first chapter of the Israel of the Alps, that the reader may easily institute a satisfactory comparison between the dialects of these two classes of manuscripts. It results, I think, from this comparison, that the difference which exists between the Vaudois language and the French of the twelfth century, is still greater than that which distinguishes our present French from the French of that period. The Vaudois books, written in the primitive Romance tongue, do not, therefore, exhibit the Lyonnese idiom, which even then was the French dialect, or the Romance language in a secondary form; they cannot, therefore, have been written by inhabitants of Lyons; they are not, therefore, to be ascribed to disciples of Valdo: there were, therefore, in the Alps, Vaudois anterior to Valdo.

Dr. Gilly demonstrates, by many arguments, that this Bible of the Poor served as the basis of the translation of the Holy Scriptures, by Guiart Des Moulins, the MS. of which is also preserved in the National Library at Paris (No. 6830). I agree with him in thinking that the language of the MS. 7268^{2.2} is not the ancient Romance tongue, and, consequently, that it is not to be classed amongst the Vaudois MSS.

D.—(1.) MS. endorsed No. 6, B. L. F., in the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, in Paris, and indicated by Dr. Gilly, in the first note of p. xlii. of his Introduction, as being, like the preceding MS., a translation of some books of the Bible, not into the Romance tongue, but into old French. This MS. is unknown to me.

(2.) MS. bearing the No. 6833⁵ in the National Library, indicated by the same author (p. lxxv.) as being an incomplete volume. It contains a portion of the books of the New Testament. At the end of it are the words—"Euthonius Satorra fecit iste liber anno a nativitate Domini MCCCCLXI." But Dr. Gilly believes it to be more ancient. He even seems inclined to believe that Reynerus (an author of the thirteenth century) was acquainted with this MS., or with an earlier MS., of which this is merely a copy. This opinion he rests upon the following correspondence:—Reynerus says that the Vaudois "corrupte Scripturam exponunt, ut est illud Johannis I, In propria venit et sui non receperunt, ibi dicunt sues id est porci non receperunt" (Biblioth. Patr. iv., par. ii., p. 478); and in this MS. we read in the passage thus pointed out (John i. 11.)—"En les sues propres coses vench, e los sues non riberan aquell."

(3.) Dr. Gilly adduces also, on the authority of Raynouard, the following MSS. as belonging to the class of Vaudois MSS., or at least, of ancient MSS., in the Romance tongue:—An Abridgment of the Old and New Testaments, with pictures; National Libr., No. 2317 bis.—Abridged History of the Bible, entitled, Bible en langue gascone. Library of St. Genevieve, in Paris, endorsed A. F. 4, No. 32.—History of the Bible, described as en provençal (Rayn. vol. i., p. 605).—The book of Sydrac in the Romance tongue, and not in Spanish, as the title bears. National Library, Fonds de Baluze, No. 590.—Naturas d'alcunas bestias. Same Library, Fond de La Valhère, No. 14.—Sermons en provençal, ibid., No. 3548.—A catechism in the same language (No. 808); and, finally, Lo libre de rices e de vertutz; a treatise which is also to be found in other Vaudois MSS., and which bears the No. 7693. It is to be wished that a careful comparison were made of these various MSS. with reference to the subject now before us.

8. PERRIN mentions (p. 57), "a New Testament on parchment, in the Vaudois tongue, very well written, although in a very ancient character;" and in the margin he adds, "These books, and a number of others, were collected in the valley of Pragela." It has been supposed that this might be the copy now deposited in Dublin, or perhaps that of Grenoble. Vol. vi., in the division F of the ancient Vaudois MSS., deposited at Cambridge, contained a portion of the books of the New Testament, viz.:—The Gospel according to St. Matthew, and that according to St. John; the first chapter of St. Luke; the Acts of the Apostles; six Epistles of St. Paul; the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the two Catholic Epistles of St. Peter. This MS. is no longer to be found.

§ 3.—Genera MSS.

MS. I., No. 43, of the Public Library.

This MS. is noted, by mistake, in several works, as No. 44. It is a large 16mo volume, written entirely upon a thick kind of paper, with the exception of the first leaf, which is parchment, and which contains forty-two lines in the Romance tongue, in beautiful black letter. (This leaf certainly belonged to another MS.) The MS., No. 43, is inclosed in a parchment cover, one side of which is extended and folds round, as is common in pocket books. Upon the back is a label affixed, with these words—Vaudois Manuscript, believed to be of the fourteenth century.

This MS. exhibits two very distinct parts: the first is in Latin, and occupies almost half the volume; the second is the Romance tongue, and fills up the rest. The following is a note of the different pieces which it contains:—

1. The forty-two lines of the first leaf. They are on the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

2. The Apostles' Creed, in Latin. Each of the articles of the Creed is specially attributed to a particular apostle; and there follows a quotation of the prophets, to show that all the events of the life of Jesus Christ had been predicted. This treatise occurs also in the Romance tongue in other MSS. The following is an extract from it, borrowed from Hahn, pp. 608-610:—

"San Peyre, apostol, pausé lo premier article, diczent . . . Sanct Thoma pause lo V, diczent: Descende a li enfern; to tercè jor rexucite de la mort. Coma propheticze Ozea, diczent: O mort, yo serey la toa mort. Per aquest deven creire que Yeshu Xrist descende a li enfern en apres la soa mort, per deslioriar e trayre las armas de li sant paires (to unbind and bring out the souls of the holy patriarchs), e du tuit aquilh que morrion del commencement del mont, en fe e en speranza qu' ilh fossan salva. Car per lo pecca d' Adam, convenia que tuit, bons e mals, descendessan en lenfern ; mas li bon, eran en bona e ferma speranza que lo filh de Dio li vengues liberar e salvar, coma era ista promes per li seo san prophetas."

3. Glosa super symbolum Apostolorum. This gloss was also written in the Romance tongue ; and it is from the Romance text that Léger gives a partial translation (Part I., ch. viii., and Perrin, p. 197). The Romance text is to be found in the Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 4, No. 17.

4. A treatise on almsgiving, entitled, Elemosina. It occurs in the Romance tongue in the Geneva MS., No. 209, and the Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 26.

5. Expositio moralis orationis dominicalis. A number of treatises upon this subject are still in existence in the Romance tongue, Léger, part I., ch. vii., and in a translated form, Perrin, p. 201, and Léger, p. 47.

6. De summo pontifice. This piece, which occupies only one page, differs very much from the usual tone of the Vaudois ; it is full of violent and reproachful expressions, attesting the indignation which the conduct of the popes had at that period excited. These expressions, however, are not stronger than those of Dante and Petrarch on the same subject.

7. Prophetia Hildegardis.

8. Versus magistrales.

9. De gaudiis Paradisi. This last piece occupies only one page.

Such are the titles of the Latin treatises. The latter half of the volume is filled with edifying discourses in the Romance tongue, each entitled Sermo.

MS. II., No. 206.

Until 1825, this passed for a MS. in the Catalan language ; and it is so marked in the catalogue. In that year I examined it, and ascertained and proved it to be a Vaudois MS. in the Romance tongue.

It is a small 12mo volume, containing 121 leaves of parchment, much blackened on the edges, like those of books which villagers have long kept in their chimney. It wants some leaves at the beginning and end. The first leaf, as well as those from the 16th to the 28th, have the margins deeply notched by oblique cuts, which, however, have not reached the text. Fol. 18 is torn out altogether, as well as three or four others, in different parts of the volume. The first fifteen or sixteen leaves are blotted with ink. This MS. is generally very difficult to read, because of the numerous abbreviations, although it is well written in black letter. The initial letters are adorned with red, green, and blue.

1. The first part of this MS. contains the book of the Virtues, thus headed, Vertuez ; but the commencement of the treatise (the first six paragraphs) has disappeared, the first leaves of the volume having been torn out. The end of the sixth paragraph only occupies the four leaves which are now the first in the work. The Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 22, begins also with a treatise on the Virtues, entitled, Liber vertutum. It is there complete. See also Léger, Part I., p. 51.

¹ It would be interesting to compare this treatise with the Sum of the Vices and Virtues, by Brother LAURENT, of which there are a number of MS. copies in the National Library at Paris, Nos. 7018³, 7043², 7044, 7284, &c. It is a point which I have not been able to investigate.

2. In fol. 29, begins an article on Compunction, of which the first sentences are the following: "La composion del cor es humilita de la perfeta naysenza, en lagrimas de la recordanza de li peca e de la temor del medici. Per lo peca es fait ardrament cant quest ardimet es recongta en grant superbia." Farther on appears this remarkable maxim, "La ley de liberta es laqual de la vita" (The law of liberty is that of life.)

3. After this treatise comes the Epistle to the faithful (Pistola fideli). At the top of a single page, it bears this title, Pistola amicus (Epistle of a friend, or to friends). Perrin speaks of an epistle with this title, at the bottom of p. 58. In our MS. it begins thus, "O frayres carissimes . . ." And the last words are "Donca o carissimes, sia curios d'eserquiar limal: tota mala parola non yessa de la vera boca; ma si alcuna bona . . ." The end is awanting, some leaves having been torn from the volume or misplaced. Hahn (pp. 623-626) has published an Epistola amicus, which is different from this.

4. At the top of the first leaf which comes after this, is inscribed the title Isaya (Isaiah).

5. Jeremia.

6. Sermo; occupying three leaves.

7. Job; occupying four leaves.

8. Noczas (Les Noces; the Marriage). The following are the first words of this piece:—"Totas cosas son aparelhas veni a las noczas, enayma es dit en san Matthio. 21. lo rey local fe noczas al sio filh, es dio payre, de la familia del qual son tuili fidel. Lo filh es lo nostre senhor Jeshu Xrist . . .," &c.

9. Sermo; occupying seven leaves.

10. Three other sermons (on Luke, Matthew, and Mark), occupying, altogether, nine leaves.

11. Del judici (Of the judgments); occupying seven leaves.

12. A sermo on Joan, occupying four leaves.

13. A treatise on joys and pains.

14. Glosa pater noster. A Vaudois commentary on the Lord's prayer is published by Léger, chap. vii. Another is to be found in Perrin, p. 201. There is a similar one in the Dublin MS., No. 7 of the Vaudois MSS. That of our MS. goes no farther than the fourth petition, and concludes thus, "La quarta cosa di qual nos deven mastigar aquest pan con devocion: le que nos lo deven rescober en la boca del cor." The last leaves of the volume, which are awanting, contained the end of this Gloss.

This book is unusually difficult to read, because of the numerous abbreviations which it contains, and which produce a frequent running of the letters into one another, even between words which ought to be separate and distinct, whilst also the syllables of the same word are often disunited, and one part attached to the word preceding, another part to the word following. But this MS., 206, is indisputably proved to be a Vaudois MS.; (1.) by the language; (2.) by the sentiments; and (3.) by the fact that some of the treatises which it contains are also to be found in other Vaudois MSS., of which the origin is no way doubtful.

MS. III., No. 207.

Of all the Vaudois MSS., this is the best known, and has been most frequently quoted. It forms a small 18mo volume, bound in wood, covered with skin, written upon vellum, in fine black letter, and in the Romance tongue. It contains 165 leaves, not paged, and has neither gloss, nor preface, nor general title. I have mentioned in this section (§ 1, No. 6) the inscription which it bears upon the first sheet, and which indicates all the books contained in it.

1. Commentary on the Song of Solomon, with this title, "Incipit prologus in secundo libro exponicionum canticon Salomona." It begins thus: "O karissimes, lo nostre cor non se merveilha si una spia (épi, grain, particle,) da questas sentencias engenra moti grande parollas," &c. The following is a fragment, from near the end:—

"Yo, non penso mi haver compres totas cosas, ni aver script tota aquella sciencia, lalcal si rescont encara en aquest libre. E emperco laysant calquecal cosa remen al foc celestial."

"Donca, o legidor karissime, repausa te entre li baron de mira, cum lical hinta lo rey de gloria. Vejas cantas cosas son recoynta de lor meseymes, e cant bella es la ley del Segnor, e cant deleitivol es estudiar en ley."

I do not imagine that I have understood all the things, nor written out all the wisdom (knowledge) which is still hidden in this book. And therefore we leave some things to await the celestial fire (gracious illumination).

Therefore, O dearest reader, repose thou amongst those barons of distinction, with whom the King of glory dwells. Thou seest what things are recounted of them; and how excellent is the law of the Lord, and how delightful is the study of that law.

Notwithstanding all that the author has thus voluntarily suppressed, the commentary now being noticed is of very considerable length; it fills 221 pages (more than half of the volume), and concludes thus: "Enayma dis Ysaya li tio olh vean cum li just to sey en la soa bellezca local vio e regna dio (lequel vit et règne Dieu, i.e., étant Dieu) cum lo payre e cum lo sant sperit, per tuit li segle de li segle. Amen."

2. A poem, entitled The Bark, indicated by these words, Ayci commença la Barca (in p. 222). This poem contains fifty-six stanzas of six lines each. (The fifteenth, however, seems to have only five, because the first and second have been written in one line through evident negligence of the copyist; the forty-eighth, on the contrary, contains seven lines instead of six; and stanzas eighteen and nineteen, forty and forty-one, fifty-five and fifty-six, are not separated from one another in this MS.) It is not until we reach the thirty-sixth stanza, that the course of man upon the earth is likened to the voyage of a bark advancing towards the harbour. The harbour is heaven, the passengers are men. What do they bring with them? All their works are defiled. Let the sinner acknowledge his errors, and let him accept for his pilot Jesus Christ alone, the merits of Christ for his only treasure; such is the conclusion of the poem. Raynouard (Choix de poésies orig. des troub., vol. ii., Monuments primitifs de la langue romane), quotes four stanzas of this poem. Hahn gives it entire (Geschichte der Waldenser, pp. 560–570). I have quoted the first lines in this section (§ 1, No. 2).

3. Lo novel Sermon. A poem of 408 lines, divided into twenty-one paragraphs or sections of unequal length. This poem occupies seventeen pages of the manuscript. It has for its subject, an exposure of the deceitful vices of the age and the necessity of serving God. Raynouard quotes detached portions of it; Hahn publishes it entire, pp. 570–581. This poem commences thus:—

"O frayres karissimes, entende mon parlar. . . ."

and ends with the following lines:—

"Adonca li felhon seren mot engana,
Ma a tart conoisceren quilh auren mal obra.
Adonca sare fait cambi dun chascun istament:
Aquilh que han czay lo deleyt auren lay torment:

Ma li Serf dal Segnor que han czay tribulacion,
 Auren lay eternal gloria e grant consolacion.
 Benaure seren aquilh que seren de li perfeit,
 Cant la sere compli lo nombre de li cleyt!
 La poiscenza del payre et sapiencia del filh
 Et la bonta del sant Spirit nos garde tuit Denfern, e nos done Paradis. Amen."

Of these lines, the following is a translation: "Then the wicked shall be much deceived, but at last shall discover that they have done ill. Then shall there be interchange of every state; those who have chosen pleasures shall have torment; but the servants (serfs) of the Lord, who have chosen tribulations, shall have eternal glory and great consolation. Happy shall those be who shall be amongst the perfect, when the number of the elect shall be filled up! The power of the Father, and the wisdom of the Son, and the bounty of the Holy Spirit, keep us all from hell and give us Paradise. Amen."

4. Le novel Confort. A poem of 300 lines; consisting of seventy-five verses of four lines each. It wants one line in the fortieth stanza. A little red line separates the quatrains from one another in the manuscript, of which this poem occupies thirteen pages. Raynouard quotes eighteen verses of it, selected here and there; Hahn gives it complete (from p. 581 to p. 589). The poem has for its object to confirm the Christian in his detachment from the world, and to encourage him in seeking salvation by the gospel. The seventy-third verse, and the last verse, are as follows:—

"O car amic, leva vos del dormir!
 Car vos non sabe lora que Xrist deo venir;
 Velha tota via de cor en dio servir
 Per istar en la gloria lalac non deo fenir
 "Vene! e non attende a la noyt tenebrosa,
 L'alac es mot scura, orribla e spaventosa;
 Aquel que ven de noyt, ja lespos ni lesposa,
 Non hubrìre a luy la porta preciosa. Amen."

Translation: "O dear friends! arise from your slumber, for you know not the hour when Christ is to come. Watch continually to serve God heartily, that you may abide in glory which shall have no end.—Come! and await not the gloomy night, which is very dark, horrible, and fearful. He who comes in the night, neither the bridegroom nor the bride shall open to him the precious gate."

Raynouard thinks that this poem is of more recent origin than the others, because of the greater perfection of the verse.

5. La nobla Leycon. A poem of 479 lines, having for its object to exhibit the three successive laws which God has given to the world—the natural law, the law of Moses, and the law of the gospel. This object is intimated in line 438. The first part extends from line 57 to line 138; the second, from line 138 to line 207; and the third, from line 207 to line 346. The poem concludes with a general recapitulation and pious exhortations. Morland, Raynouard, Plenderleath, Gilly, and Hahn, have published this poem entire. Léger gives only fragments of it. Part I., chap. iv. The date of this poem is fixed by the sixth line—

"Den ha mil et cent anez compli entierament."

Many writers deserving of consideration think that the date contained in this line is not to be taken as exact, but only as approximative; and that the poem should not be referred to the year 1100, but to about the year 1190, the period when Valdo and his disciples are supposed to have come to the Vaudois valleys, either from Piedmont or from Dauphiny, and that, therefore, it is to be ascribed to the disciples of Valdo.

We are entitled to demand positive evidence in support of this opinion, which those who maintain it do not produce. I shall attempt to bring forward some evidence to the contrary. Let us suppose the Nobla Leyczon to have been composed, not in the year 1100, but in the year 1200; and let us see if it could be the work of the disciples of Valdo. This poem is in the Romance language: it was not the language of Lyons. (See the writings of that period in the vulgar tongue.) The disciples of Valdo left that city between 1180 and 1190.¹ Would they not require some years to acclimatize them in a new country, and is it to be supposed that in so short a time they could have learned a new language, so as to produce in it most perfect works—(most perfect for that time at least); and that amidst the difficulties of their settlement, they could have had leisure for the composition of a poem of such length? Could they immediately after their arrival in these mountains, exhibit the characters of extension already acquired, of firm establishment, tranquillity, and duration, which this poem ascribes to the Vaudois? It appears to me that an impartial mind will find much more difficulty in admitting all these things, without evidence, as those are obliged to do who maintain that the Vaudois are descended from Valdo—than in admitting that they were anterior to him, on the testimony of this work, dated in the year 1100, and of the authors of the twelfth century, whom we have quoted. (Israel of the Alps, part I., chap. i.)

The difficulty becomes an impossibility if we hold to the date of the Nobla Leyczon (and there is nothing to set it aside), or if we merely admit that it was composed before 1180; for nothing at that period can explain the production of it among the disciples of Valdo. The latter not only is not named in it, but there is not the least allusion which can be supposed to refer to him. This is not surprising, if the piece is anterior to him; but it would be very extraordinary if its composition was owing to his direct influence, and if it was produced by his disciples.

It is natural, indeed, to wish for precise information, that we may give a precise account of the origin of things, especially in history; and we cannot give a precise account of the origin of the Vaudois in an historic manner, except by connecting them with Valdo; but this, again, we cannot do except by hypotheses, that is, by uncertainties. To these laborious uncertainties, is it not rational to prefer the inevitable uncertainty which must reign over the origin of the Vaudois regarded as anterior to Valdo, on this very ground, that if their origin had been recent, it must have left traces? I repeat, there is a testimony to the existence of the Vaudois in the Alps anterior to Valdo; but it is disputed. There are only hypotheses to establish their descent from Valdo, and these hypotheses are also disputed. Accurate minds must at least desire that this question should be further studied: it is the part of a superficial or prejudiced erudition, I think, to consider it as decided in favour of the hypotheses.

The Vaudois are named in line 372 of the Nobla Leyczon:—

“Ilh diou qu' es Vaudes e degue de punir.”

The poem concludes thus:—

¹ The Chronique de Laon (published by Douquet, vol. xiii.) places Valdo in 1173. His doctrine was condemned in 1177, 1178, and 1179. It was not till 1183 or 1184 that he was expelled from Lyons; and his disciples did not probably all leave it on the same day.

"Placza ha aquel Segnor que forme tot lo mont
Que nos siam de li esleit per istar en sa cort.
Dio gracias. Amen."

This work is followed in the MS. of which we speak, by two pages of moral sentences.—Not to prolong this article, I shall merely indicate the poems which follow, and which are also to be found in the Dublin MS., Class G, Shelf 5, No. 21. When we come to that MS., I shall accompany the mention of them with some details, as I have done with regard to the preceding poems.

6. Lo Payre Eternal. This poem is composed of 156 lines, divided into fifty-two verses of three lines each. These triplets are separated from each other in the Geneva MS. by a red line which joins the arabesques on the margin. There is a hiatus here and there. The first line of verse thirty-two contains in reality two lines, of which the first ends with the word crescent, and the second with the word ben. The last line of this verse does not belong to it, and ought to be the first of a subsequent verse, which remains incomplete. This poem, which occupies five pages of MS., is simply a prayer in which are introduced many passages of the psalms of David. Raynouard thinks that it is of more recent date than the other Vaudois poems. (Letter of 6th April, 1833.) He quotes thirteen triplets of it, in the Monuments primitifs de la langue romane. (Choix des poésies originales des Troubadours, vol. ii., p. 117.) Hahn gives it entire (pp. 590–594). I quote some passages of it in the next §, vol. iv., No. 4.

7. Lo despreczi del mont. A poem on detachment from the world; occupying four pages of the manuscript, and consisting of 115 lines. Fragments of it are quoted by Raynouard (vol. ii., p. 121), and it is given entire by Hahn (pp. 594–597). A red line has been drawn after every two lines of the poem, between the distiches, in the Geneva MS., but on the first page only. For other particulars, see next §, concerning Dublin MS., vol. iv., No. 5.

8. L'Avangeli de li quatre semenz. (The gospel of the four seeds.) A poem on our Saviour's parable (Matt. xiii.) It occupies eleven pages of the MS., and contains 300 lines, divided into seventy-five quatrains.—Raynouard has published twenty-five quatrains (vol. ii., p. 126). Hahn gives it entire (pp. 598–604). The verses are separated in the MS. 207, by red lines which join the arabesques on the margins. See quotations from it in next §, on vol. iv., No. 2.

9. After this poem comes a treatise on Penitence, indicated by the words La sensec de la penitencia. (Here follows concerning penitence.) It occupies the last twenty-four pages of the MS., and is not complete, because some leaves are wanting at the end of the volume. This treatise contains an interesting passage on Confession, which occurs also in another Geneva MS. (No. 209, fol. 17) and in those of Dublin, Class C, Shelf 5, No. 22, and same series, No. 25, fol. 242.

MS. IV., No. 208.

This MS. is in small 8vo, written upon paper, and bearing upon the back this modern title, Controverses vaudoises. The leaves of this MS. are in very great disorder. That which occupies the first place, ought to be the seventeenth, and to find what precedes it, it is necessary to begin reading at fol. 14. Many other transpositions are also to be observed; they must have been the result of the ignorant handling of a modern binder.

The following are the pieces which this volume contains:—

1. Beginning at p. 29, we find a protest of the ancient Vaudois church against the innovations of the Church of Rome, under this title, Circa là varieta de las cosas emergent. (Concerning the variety of things which now present their-selves.) The following are the first words of this grave and admirable manifesto :—

“A Lausor e gloria de l’eternal Dio comencament et fin de todas cosas, e refugi de tot esperant en si: emperceo comencant de lui, nos preguen humilment la sua magnificencia que el ordone lo comencament daquesta nostra obra, e endreissa lo mecz, e perduca la fin, ha honor e gloria de lui meseynce, e de tota la cort celestial, e ha salu de tot fidel. Amen.”

To the praise and glory of the eternal God, the beginning and end of all things, and refuge of all those who hope in him; therefore, commencing in him (or proceeding in him), we humbly entreat his magnificence, that he would order the commencement of this our work, and rectify the middle and perfect the end of it, to his own honour and glory, and of all the celestial court, and to the salvation of all believers. Amen.

These words are also to be found in the Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 22; in the second page of fol. 176, under the title, Ayczi commenza lo prolic del libre apella THRESOR E LUME DE FE (Treasure and light of faith. Quoted by Perrin, pp. 59, 201; Léger, p. 47, &c.) This preface or prolic is continued in the Geneva MS. (No. 208) as far as p. 32. This introduction has for its object to establish the Bible as the sole foundation of all authority in matters of faith.

2. A statement of the Vaudois faith, indicated by the words, de li article de la fe. To follow the order of the treatise, we must, after having read from p. 28 to p. 32, return to p. 1, and read without interruption twenty-seven consecutive pages, and then resume reading at fol. 17. These Articles of Faith are published by Hahn, from p. 605 to p. 608.

3. Then follows an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed, analogous to that spoken of as in No. 3 of MS. 47 of Geneva, the first in this §. Hahn publishes this piece, pp. 608–611.

4. Des sept sacrements, beginning at p. 17 and occupying nineteen pages of the manuscript. The articles are these, (1.) Del baptismo. (2.) L'imposicion de li mans. (3.) Lo tercz sacrament es la communion del corps e del sang de Xrist. This article occupies five pages, and ends with an &c. (4.) Lo quart sacrament es la penitencia. (MS. 209 bears that, La ley de matrimoni es lo cart sacrament de la gleysa.) A part of the “Treatise on Penitence,” which is found at the end of MS. 207 is the same with this. (5.) Lo quint sacrament, es ordonament de preires e de diaques. (6.) Lo matrimoni. (Placed in the fourth place in MS. 209.) (7.) La honcion de li enferm (the unction of the infirm). “These two sacraments are admitted,” says M. Tron in a note, “but only in the simplicity of the evangelical institution; thus there is nothing of extreme unction, nothing of consecrated oil . . . &c.” A part of this treatise of the sacraments is placed much farther on, and on account of the disordered condition of the MS., is intercalated in the midst of the work following.

5. Exposition of the Ten Commandments. This treatise seemingly occupies eighty-six pages of the MS., but twenty-two pages must be deducted, viz., pp. 30–52, which belong to the preceding work. This treatise enters into its subject at much greater length than the quotations given by Léger (p. 51), and Perrin (p. 182), under a similar title. It is probable that these authors quoted from the “Book of Virtues,” and not from the Thresor e lume de la fe. The first two commandments are united together in one in MS. 208; but the tenth is divided into two, viz., IX., a prohibition of coveting moveable property, and X., a prohibition of coveting fixed property.

6. A Treatise Of Penitence, occupying eight pages of the MS. It is in part also to be found in MSS. 207 and 209, as well as at the end of 208. The treatise in MS. 209 is the same as that in 207, with the exception of a few slight variations in the first lines. That which is contained in MS. 209, in the second part of this treatise, seems to be an abridgment of that which is found in MS. 207. The latter, however, wants the article entitled penitencia exterior. The copy of MS. 208 agrees with that of 209, except that all which relates to la falsa penitencia (the first part of the treatise) is wanting in the former, which, however, is much longer than the other two in what relates to oracion, under the head of penitencia exterior.

7. Of fasting; occupying nine pages of the MS. The object of this treatise is principally to prove that bodily fasting is of no value without spiritual fasting. This treatise, and the preceding, are united in MS. 209, under the title, De la penitencia e del jui.

8. A Commentary on the Lord's Prayer; occupying eight pages of the MS. It appears also in the Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 22, fol. 230. The same commentary, with slight variations, is given by Léger (pp. 40-46), and copied by Hahn, pp. 697-701. A partial translation of another treatise, on the same subject, is given by Perrin, p. 47, and by Léger, p. 201.

9. A Treatise Of Purgatory; occupying forty-six pages of the MS., containing the treatise Of the Invocation of Saints, and that De la potesta dona a li vicario de Xrist (of the power given to the vicar of Christ). This last-mentioned work occupies twelve pages of the MS. Hahn has published a part of it, pp. 611-616. These different treatises are also to be found united in the book Of Antichrist. (Perrin, pp. 253-295; Léger, pp. 71-91.) After this treatise comes in the MS. 208, the sequel of the Exposition of the Ten Commandments, mentioned in No. 5 of this article.

10. Ara sensce de la penitencia (Now follows Of Penitence), as at the end of MS. 207. (See No. 6 in this article.) This treatise occupies thirty pages of the MS., and concludes the volume. The last words of it are the following:—"La deficion de la penitencia part en prima desplaissance e dolor del pecca, en la secunda temor de non recagir. Linconiens prima es abandonar li pecca comes e abandonnans plorar lor e degittar." "The sufficiency of penitence depends, in the first place, on a displeasure and sorrow for sin, and, in the second place, on a fear (attentive observation) not to fall into it again. The consequences are, first, an abandoning of sins committed, and in abandoning them—a deploring and rejecting of them." These last words, lor e degittar, are inclosed in a sort of scroll, made by the pen, with slight arabesques on both sides, and terminated by the figure of a hand with the forefinger stretched out.

MS. V., No. 209.

This MS. is in small 8vo, written on paper, in the Romance tongue, and in black letter. The binding is modern, and upon the back is the title, Conseils des barbes.

The leaves of this MS. are also in disorder, like those of Codex 208.—The commencement of the first page is to be found after the sixteenth, and that first page itself contains only the end of an article, of which the first part must be sought in fol. 20. Not having had time to note the proper place of all the leaves of this MS., I shall now indicate its contents according to the order in which they are at present placed.

Fol. 1.—The first leaf belongs, as has just been stated, to a work which has been placed farther on in the volume. It treats of heritages and the division of goods.

Fol. 3.—In fol. 3, begins Pistoletta (a little epistle), containing pious exhortations. It would seem that this fol. 3 ought to be the first in the volume.

Fol. 6.—La ley del matrimoni (of marriage). Marriage is designated the fourth sacrament of the church. The division of this treatise is extremely simple—(1.) Duties of the wife towards her husband (the husband is called lo Baron).—(2.) Duties of the husband towards his wife.—(3.) Of the two together towards their children; above all, says the MS., that li filli, liqual nayson carnal, sian rendu a Dio spirital (that the children who are born carnal may be made spiritual to God). Is not this the loftiest aim of education?

Fol. 7.—Of justice.—Here we find this recommendation: Non avez recors al judici secular. If you would be just, it is said, see that ye offer “Vos meseymes a Dio, con totas aquellas cosas que son vostras, amor e ajutori al proyme; a vos meseymes, sanctita; al amis, concordia; per lenemis, oracion devota; al rey . . . tribu,” &c. In regard to the love of enemies, it is said, “I well know that you cannot attain to it of yourself, but call God to your aid, and he will put into your heart that love which he has had for us, who have so much offended him.”

Fol. 8.—Detached thoughts, entitled, Pensiers.—It is from this piece that the thought is extracted which is quoted in the Israel of the Alps, part I., ch. i., note. It is to be found upon the second page of fol. 8, which corresponds to p. 16.

Fol. 11.—A treatise Of Penitence, which occurs also elsewhere. See No. 6 and No. 10 in the account of the preceding MS.—In fol. 17 is a piece, entitled, La sancta confession. The following is a brief extract:—“Aquill que se volon confessar vocalment, ilhi dovon cerca preires sapient e discret e dot: car silhi recoraren a li mal preire, ilh seren plus engana que certifica.” Prayers, fasting, and almsgiving are afterwards spoken of. This treatise is very long.

Fol. 21.—About the middle of p. 41, or of the first page of fol. 21, is this title written by itself in red ink. Que cosa sia pecca (What sin is). This new treatise is also of great length. The characters of pride, envy, anger, luxury, sloth (acedia), avarice, &c., are successively examined, with the remedies appropriate to them. The following is a brief specimen of the preliminary part:—“Lo es de saber (il est à savoir) que lo pecca mortal, a receopu lo nom de la mort, emperco car el mortifica l’arma (l’âme). Trey pecca son apella pecca capita, czo es principals de li quals li autre pecca prenen nayssament,” &c. A few of these passages will be found extracted in chap. iv. of Perrin, p. 13, et seq.

Fol. 53.—The Prayer of Manassch.

Fol. 54.—A Commentary on the Lord’s Prayer. “Glosa sobre Pater Noster.” These last words being Latin, would seem to indicate that the Vandois said the Lord’s Prayer in that language. This commentary is published by Léger, pp. 40–46, and by Hahn, pp. 697–701. But the different petitions, or requerenzas, are given by them in the same idiom as the commentary.

Fol. 77.—De las quatre cosas que son avenir. [Of the four things which are to come.] These four things are death, judgment, hell, and paradise. After this treatise three leaves of the MS. are left blank, viz., fol. 118, 119, and 120. From this last to the end of the volume (which ends with fol. 156), is occupied with the following treatise:—

Fol. 121.—Vergier de consollacion. This is one of the Vandois books, the title of which has been most frequently cited, but it has never been published. It contains—

(1.) General remarks on the Divine law.

(2.) On human corruption.

(3.) An examination of different vices. (Part of what is said on this subject, has already occurred in the treatise above-mentioned: Que cosa sia pecca.) In the article De la Tentation, heresy and heretics are spoken of. We cannot but desire to know what the Vaudois understood by these terms.

"Li hereges son dit quelli coma errant de la verita. En ayma las vestimentas cuebron lo cors, en ayma las bonas obras cuebran l'arma de larege, e tollon las vestimentas de liqual ilh destruo li ben."

Heretics are so called as wandering from the truth. As garments cover the body, so do good works cover the soul of the heretic, and come in place of (take away) the garments of which they destroy the possession.

(4.) Faith, hope, and charity are spoken of. Charity, we are told, begins with the love of God; it renders us invulnerable by injuries of men, &c.

(5.) An examination and recommendation of different virtues.

(6.) A long article on Friendship; in which occurs a quotation from Aristotle.

(7.) Of prelates.—A very long article, pointing out the resemblance which they ought to bear to Jesus Christ.

(8.) Of preachers.—They ought to be the light of the world.

(9.) Of Divine chastisements, containing quotations from St. Isidore.

(10.) Of the fear and love of God.

(11.) Of the love of our neighbour, of almsgiving, &c.

(12.) Of penitence and contemplation. This last term is thus defined:—"Es sostracion de ment a Dio, cum desmentigancza de las cosas temporals." (It is the elevation of the soul to God, with forgetfulness of temporal things.)

(13.) Of the praises of the Lord.

(14.) Of perseverance, poverty, obedience, humility, and chastity. May the practice of these virtues, says the author in conclusion, "per tu, Signor, e lo tio nom, sia a mi recreacion!"

This treatise, deficient in method, has evidently received the name of Vergier de consollacion, from analogy to an orchard (verger) in which all sorts of trees grow unrestrained, because of its pages filled with matters, various indeed, but all edifying. It would seem that to have entitled it, Of the virtues and vices, would better have made known its general character. I doubt if this treatise is complete. It contains a number of passages which are also to be found elsewhere; and a number which it is very difficult to read. A copy of the Vergier de consollacion occurs in the Dublin MS., vol. 7, No. 3. It would be desirable to have these two copies compared with one another.

MSS. which have disappeared.

Other MSS. besides these were deposited in the library of Geneva, by John Léger, in 1662. M. Gérard was then librarian. The receipt which he gave for these documents is inserted in the work of Léger, part I., ch. iii., p. 23. According to a letter of M. Raynouard (of 6th April, 1833), the greater part of these documents were sent to England, at the request of Cromwell; but as Cromwell died in 1658, and his son resigned the Protectorate in 1659, whilst these MSS. were not deposited at Geneva till 1662, it is impossible that this can have been the way in which they disappeared. Be it as it might, they are not now to be found in the library of that city.

Amongst these documents there was only one volume in the Romance tongue. It came from the valley of Pragela (Léger, p. 23). All the books which it contained are to be found in other MSS. still existing. The following is a note of them:—

1. La nobla Leyczon.—To be found in the Geneva MS., No. 207, and Dublin MS., vol. iv., No. 6. (Class C, Shelf 5, No. 21.)

2. Lo purgatori soima. (Of the invention of purgatory.) Dublin MS., vol. iii., No. 36. Published by Léger, p. 295, and by Perrin, p. 93.

3. De li tramettament. (Of traditions.) Was to be found in the Cambridge MS., No. vi., t. i. (Indicated by Morland, pp. 95-98, and by Léger, pp. 21-23.)

4. De l'invocassion de li sant. (Of the invocation of the saints.) Dublin MS., vol. iii., No. 57. (Class C, Shelf 5, No. 22.)

5. Lo novel confort.—Geneva MS. 207; and Dublin MS., vol. iv., No. 1.

6. Lo Dottor. (The Teacher, containing sentences from the fathers of the church, on Repentance.) Cambridge, vol. ii., No. 3.

7. Glosa Pater Noster.—Cambridge, vol. ii., No. 1; Dublin, vol. vii., No. 2; Geneva, MS. No. 43, § 3, and No. 209, fol. 54, also No. 206.

8. Glosa symbolum apostolorum.—Geneva, MS. 43, No. 3.

9. Explication of the Ten Commandments.—Geneva, MS. 208, No. 5.

10. Various sermons, or discourses of no great length, on different Scripture subjects. Dublin MSS., vol. iii., fol. 11-17, and fol. 348-368.

These different treatises, of a MS. incontestably of Vaudois origin, being found scattered throughout all the MSS. which bear the general name of Vaudois manuscripts, although an attempt has been made to dispute the claim of the Vaudois to them, establish that claim so that it can no longer be set aside.

§ 4.—Dublin MSS. (Library of Trinity College.)

These MSS. were derived from the library of Usher (in Latin, Usserius) the celebrated author and Church of England divine, who was born at Dublin in 1580, became Bishop of Meath in 1620, and Archbishop of Armagh in 1626, and died in 1655. The Vaudois MSS., deposited in Cambridge by Morland in 1658, and which have never since been to be found, were not in England at so early a date as those of Usher which still exist in Dublin.

Volume I.

(Class A, Shelf 4, No. 13.) Vaudois Bible.—I have already given an account of this MS. in the present section, in No. 4 of § 2, entitled, Biblical MSS.

Volume II.

(Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18.) This MS. is known by the name of the Manuscript of George Morel. It is a volume of paper, six inches in length, by four inches and a half in breadth. It contains a collection of letters and other documents relative to the mission of George Morel and Peter Masson, to the Reformers on behalf of the Vaudois in 1530.

The following is an account of its contents, seriatim, according to a letter of Dr. Todd, inserted in the British Magazine, No. cxiii., p. 397.

1. At p. 1 is a letter of the Vaudois to Ecolampadius, commencing thus—“Salve mi Domine Ecolampadie. Pero aczo que tu dones conselh a nos, e confirmes nos frevols, anne lo present eord^e loqual es entre d' nos ministres. Car moti racontant . . .,” &c.—The remainder as in Perrin, p. 211. This letter occupies only one page.

2. Pp. 2-5.—Reply of Ecolampadius. Perrin, p. 46, and Léger, p. 105. (A letter of much greater length, but commencing in the same way, is published in the Epistolæ virorum doctorum, edited by BIBLIANDER. Basle, 1548, p. 2.)

3. P. 5, Epistola ad Bucerum.

4. Bucer's Reply. Perrin, p. 47.

5. De ministrorum ritibus. Published by Schultet, an. 1530,—Von der Hardt, Pars v., p. 161. In the Dublin MS., in pp. 8, 10, 25, 31, &c., there are words, and even entire sentences, erased by a modern hand. In some places there are words written in, which were not there originally. The words and sentences, erased in the MS., are omitted by Perrin, and the changes made by a modern hand are adopted by him.

The portion of the MS. which treats de ministrorum ritibus, extends as far as p. 116. Each particular is made the subject of a question (peticio), after which follows the reply of Œcolampadius or of Bucer. It is in peticio xii. that the Confession of Faith occurs, which so very strikingly resembles that published by Léger, p. 92. Perrin also, who was the first to publish it, says it is extracted from the Memoires de Georges Morel (the very MS. in question), as well as the Almanack spiritual. (P. I., ch. xii., marginal note, p. 79.)

In p. 56, this question occurs—"Qual cosa se deo entendre par las claus dona a sant Peyre?" The reply of Œcolampadius is identical with the paragraphs de clavibus ecclesiæ, which are to be found in the Epistolæ doctorum virorum, p. 4.

Peticio xxiii. is in these terms—"Item, si tot jurament es defendu," &c.

6. P. 116. Letter of Œcolampadius, of which a copy appears in the Epistolæ doct. vir., p. 8.

7. Letter of Bucer, dated anno salutis 1530.

8. P. 118. Report of the proceedings of the Synod held at Angrogna, 12th Sept., 1532. (See the Israel of the Alps, vol. i., ch. vii.) This piece also exhibits erasures. It is supposed that this is the same MS. which Perrin had in his hands, and which he quotes under the title of the Book, or Memoirs of George Morel and Peter Masson (pp. 46, 106, &c.), because the passages quoted by him exactly correspond with those of the existing MS.

Volume III.

(Class C, Shelf 5, No. 22). Not having before me any exact account of this MS., and not having myself seen it, I can do no more than indicate the subjects which are treated in it.

1. In p. 1, is a little calendar of the church.

2. P. 2—p. 156. The Book of the Virtues (Liber Vertutum), occupying 77 leaves.

3. A treatise on education, contained in fol. 73–83, de l'enseignement de li filh; and from fol. 83–85, de las garda de las filhas.

4. A treatise on marriage, beginning thus—Ayeci vollen parlar del ma rimon, a confort de li bon. This treatise extends from fol. 85 to fol. 91.

5. On dreams. (De li soyme). Fol. 91–94.

6. Ayeci vollen parlar de li pecca de la lenga. This treats of evil-speaking, calumny, false judgments, &c. Fol. 94–118. It is to be found in part in the Geneva MS. 209, fol. 51–53.

7. De la superbia (Of pride). Fol. 118–139.

8. La parolla de Dio. Fol. 139–145.

9. De li perilh. Occupying only the first page of fol. 145.

10. Tot don noble (Eight eminent graces), or Tot don noble (All eminent grace). Between these two versions the general scope of the piece and the view of the MS. alone can decide. This treatise occupies only two pages.

11. Seven sermons, occupying fol. 146–167 of the MS. The following are the first words of each, by which they may be recognized:—(1.) "Aquill que fameian . . ."—Those who are hungry. (2.) "O Seignor, tu me poez mondar si tu voles"—O Lord, thou canst make me clean, if thou wilt. This is to be found also in No. 13 of vol. vi. of this series. (3.) "Sermo d' Erodiana." On Herodias; the death of John the Baptist. (4.) "De la parollas auciosas"—

Of idle words. (5.) Li parlar de li filosofe—The sayings of the philosophers. (6.) “Vevos un filh mort unial de la sua mayra”—The death of the only Son. (7.) “Sermo de las noczas”—Sermon on the marriage feast (the introduction of the elect into the kingdom of God). A few pages on the same subject are to be found in the Geneva MS., No. 206.

12. Various fragments, of which some are also to be found in the Liber vertutum. They extend from fol. 167 to 175. They are (1.) “De la ubrieta”—Of drunkenness. (2.) “Luxuria.” (3.) “De la familiarita de las fennas.” (4.) “De la honesta”—Of modesty. (5.) “De la sapiencia de Dio.” (6.) “Angel . . .”—(The angel . . .). (7.) “La considération de la brevita de la vita.”—Considerations on the shortness of life. (8.) “De li parlar dalcuns doctors.” (9.) “Al enfern . . .” (10.) De la ben del paradis.” (These fragments, (9.) and (10.), are two parts of the same piece.) (11.) “De la Cristianita.”

13. “Trésor e lume de fe.” This important treatise extends from fol. 176 to 271. It contains (1.) the remarkable introduction already noticed in the Geneva MS., No. 208, fol. 15. It is indicated in the Dublin MS. by these words—“Ayczi commenza lo prolic del libre appella TRÉSOR E LUME DE FE.” This introduction extends from fol. 176 to 179. (2.) “Lo simbole d’Anastais.” (3.) “De li articles de la fe.” (4.) “Li sept sacrament,” occupying 16 pages. (5.) “Li commandament de Dio,” occupying 33 pages. (6.) “Tracta del oracion,” 23 pages. (7.) “De la penitencia,” 78 pages. (Concerning this last piece, see No. 6 of Geneva MS. 208.)

14. In fol. 271, we read—“Ayczi comenczan LAS TRIBULACIONS.” This treatise occupies 13 pages. Published by Léger, part i., ch. vi., p. 35, and by Hahn, pp. 692–696.

15. “LAS INTERROGACIONES MENORS.”—This is the little catechism which Perrin (p. 157) and Léger (p. 58) have published, as of date A.D. 1100. There is no Vaudois book which has been so often reprinted. Koecher, Monastier, Dieterici, Brez, Hahn, and others, have given it in their works. It has also been separately printed in Edinburgh.

16. Two fragments: “De li bal” (fol. 292–297) and “De la Taverna” (fol. 297, 298). These passages have been published. They are very severe against balls and public houses.

17. The Apostles' Creed; occupying the first page of fol. 298.

18. “Alcuns testimoni del Apocalis,” from the second page of fol. 298 to the end of fol. 299.

19. “De li VIII. pensiers;” occupying page 600, or the first page of fol. 300.

20. “De las quatre cosas que son a venir.” These four things are death, judgment, hell, and paradise. From fol. 301–304, where commences “Del alegrecza de li Salva,” which extends to fol. 334.

21. Fragments, similar to some which occur in the BOOK OF VIRTUES. (1.) “Del pecca de la desubidienza;” fol. 337–341. (2.) “De la venianca”—Of vengeance; occupying four pages. (4.) “De la desesperacion”—Of despair; occupying five pages. (5.) “Lo fellon abandonne la soa via”—Let the wicked forsake his ways; occupying two pages.

22. Sermons. These pieces are six in number. (1.) “De lo mesquin.” (2.) “En aquella contra de Bethlem eran pastores . . .” (3.) “Yeshu dis a li seo disciples . . .” (4.) “Johan deczia al poble.” (5.) “Jeshu montant en la nauta . . .” (into the boat). (6.) “Le fantin Jeshu . . .” (the infant Jesus . . ., &c.) These six sermons extend from fol. 348 to fol. 373.

23. “Del Purgatori”—A treatise Of Purgatory, extending from fol. 373 to 385, and containing "De la convocation de li san," fol. 378-383, and De l'absolution," fol. 383-385.

24. A Sermon, commencing thus—"O Frayres! sabent aquest tempo, car hora es ja a nos levar del sopn . . ." (from sleep), concludes the volume in fol. 389.

Volume IV.

(Class C, shelf 5, No. 21.) This volume contains the same poems in the Romance tongue which are in the Geneva MS. 207; but in a different order.

1. LO NOVEL CONFORT. I have quoted the last two verses of it in the preceding § (MS. iii., No. 4); M. Monastier gives a passage of considerable length (vol. ii., pp. 278-282) borrowed from the work of Raynouard. There are some variations which would require to be further examined. The following, for example, presents itself in the second line of the third verse:—

"Tota la vostra vita es un petit dormir;
Et dorment vos soyma un soyme de placzir . . ." &c.

"And in your sleep your dreams are all of pleasure . . ." The length of this poem and its principal characteristics, have been indicated in the section above referred to.

2. LAVANGELI DE LI IV SEMENCZ. A poem on the Parable of the Sower. One of the most remarkable of the ancient Vaudois poems, and, perhaps, that which best shows how thoroughly the Vaudois had apprehended the moral import of the Scriptures. (See MS. 207, No. 8, in the preceding §.) It contains also very valuable notices of the different classes of Christians (corresponding to the different classes of the secd) as they appeared at that epoch. There are those who at first receive the Word of God with eagerness—

"E de present qu'ilh senton la perseguecion,
Un poc d'espavament o de tribulacion.
Ilh renean e laysan la predicacion
Lacal ilh scoutavan con tanta devocion" (verse 15).

Time has not, in this respect, changed the heart of man; but the obstacles are no longer the same.—The tares which grow with the good grain, represent the enemies of the kingdom of God—

"Czo, son li filli fellon, plen de tota malicia; De persegre li just han mota cubiticia:"

it is said in verse 65, and in the next verse—

"Ma li just son ferm; en Krist han lor confort . . ."

Accordingly, this strength does not fail them (verse 67)—

"Emperczo temon Dio, gardant se de mal far,
La ley del Segnor s'efforczan de gardar;
E totas adversitas en paciencia portar
Entro que sia vengu lo temp del meisonar."

It has been previously said (verses 39 and 40)—

"Mot son pacific, human e ben suffrent;
Non se volon deffendre, non son mal respondent,
Mas portan en paciencia greo cosas entra la gent;
Emperczo son apella filli de Dio tot poysent.

"Tribulacions suffron e perseguecion grant;
Son tormenta e aucis e en grant career istant;
Per czo son plen de temor e de grant spavant:
Sovent d'un luse en autre fuon transfugant . . ."

Such was the condition of Christians at that time, such was the condition of the Vaudois, in the midst of their adversaries—

“Que volon devorar lo tropelet petit
Del cal es bon pastor lo segnor Jeshu Xrist” (verse 8).

And it is especially worthy of notice, how it is afterwards said of this little flock, or church of persecuted believers—

“Aquesta es la sancta Gleysa, recebent confidanza La parolla de Xrist e la soa amonestanza” (verse 47).

“Molher es de l'agnel e dicta la soa sposa Humil e casta, e vio mot vertuosa” (verse 60).

It could scarcely have been more decidedly intimated that the Vaudois regarded themselves as the Church.

3. LA BARCA. A poem, already mentioned, and an account given of it, in article ii. of the Geneva MS., No. 207.

4. LO PAYRE ETERNAL. (See No. 6 of the same MS.) This poem is a prayer, addressed successively to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, and then to the fortissima Trenita. I give the following verses as specimens of it:—

“O primiera cayson senca defalhiment,
Fin sies de totas cosas, senca comencament:
Mostra me la toa facia alegre e resplendent!

“Consolador dreiturier, sant e prencipal,
Purifica la mia arma d'tot pecca mortal,
Planta hi las vertutz, e dereycza li venial!

“Segnor segnorizant de las tres girarchias,
E de la gleisa triumphant que ufere a tu Messias,
Prego te, fay nos esser d'aquellas compagnias!

“Conselhador fidel, merevilhos e fort,
Conselha lo tio poble, qu'es tormenta a tort,
Que habandone aquest mont per venir al tio ort.”

The word ort literally signifies garden, and metaphorically Paradise.—These four triplets are the 18th, 19th, 21st, and 37th of the poem. I cannot here give a complete translation of these passages, because of the little room which now remains to me within the limits assigned to this Bibliography.

5. A poem which bears no title in the MS. of Dublin, but which is the same with that which, in the Geneva MS., is entitled, “Lo despreczi del mont.” (See MS. 207, No. 7.) This poem (judging from the Geneva MS., which alone I have seen) does not appear to me to have been completed, for in the 95th line, the subject is stated in these terms:—

“Lonor del mont yo te volh recontar . . .”

And twenty lines after, the author unexpectedly comes to a close, the sense being interrupted—

“Aquel non ista segur, ni mot ben alloga
Local po esser de la mort subitament arappa.”

It is evident that the subject is not exhibited in the manner promised at the beginning; and the formula, with which most of the other Vaudois poems conclude, being omitted in this, seems also to indicate that it has been broken off in the middle. I proceed to quote a few lines:—

“Las cosas terrenals totas venon a nient;”

(Earthly things all come to nothing.)—With what wilt thou redeem thyself, when Death comes to slay thee? For Death will acknowledge no paction nor agreement . . . , &c.

“De cal te reconprare cant la mort te auire!
Car pat ni convenenza la mort non recebre;
L’or ni l’argent non te secorrare,
Ni preguiera d’amie non te desliorare
Al dia de la besogna, cant l’arma perire.”

(In the day of need, when the soul shall perish.)—There is no trust to be placed, says the Vaudois author, in any of this world’s possessions.

“Ni en torre, ni en palays, ni en grant maysonament,
Ni en tantas, ni en convilis, ni en li grant manjament,
Ni en ly leyt honorivol, ni en li bel parament,
Ni en vestimentas claras e fortment resplandent;
Ni en grecz de bestias, ni en favor de moti camp . . . ,” &c.

The enumeration of the things of which the men of that time were proud, might, with some study, aid to determine the period at which the poem was composed.

6. LA NOBLA LEYCZON. (See a particular account of it, in the preceding §, MS. 207, No. 5.)

7. LO NOVEL SERMON. (See the preceding §; MS. 207, No. 3.)

8. SERMON, in prose, entitled, Del Mesquin.

9. The original of a fragment, of which Perrin (p. 178) and Léger (p. 57) have given the translation, under the title of CONFESSION OF SINS of the ancient Vaudois. These two authors publish it as being in prose; this fragment is also written as prose in the Dublin MS. The Rev. Dr. Gilly having had the kindness to send me a copy, I perceived that it was in verse; and that this was to be added to the number of the ancient Vaudois poems already known, although Perrin and Léger themselves do not seem to have been aware of it. I procured the publication of this fragment in the Echo des Vallées, first year, No. 10, pp. 154–159, with a very exact translation, executed by M. Meille. The following are a few lines of it:—

“Segnor perdona me, per la toa bointa!
Temeros soy a far ben, e fortment pereczos
E ardi a far lo mal e mot evananzos.
Segnor, dona me gracia, que non sia de li fellon . . .
Hayas marez da mi e dona me humilita . . .
Segnor Dio, tu sabes to czo que yo hay confessa,
Encara hi a moti mal que yo non hay reconta . . . ,” &c.

In the inequality of the measure, and the simple assonance of the rhymes, these verses bear the marks of high antiquity. This must be regarded as one of the most ancient Vaudois poems which has come down to us.

10. “De las proprietas de las animanzas.” A didactic treatise, containing examples and lessons, derived from the habits of different animals. This treatise was in the ancient Vaudois MSS. deposited at Cambridge, and now lost, in vol. i., Div. A, No. 2.

11. “Ayczi comenza algunas sposicions sobre alcuns passages de S. Matth.” Such is the title of the last work in this volume. That it contains a piece in verse written as prose, is sufficient proof that this MS. is merely a copy made at a time very remote from the time when what is contained in it was composed.

Volume V.

(Class C, Shelf 5, No. 25.) This volume begins with a fragment, which in some other volumes forms part of the "Treatise on Antichrist."

1. "Ayczo es la causa del despartiment de la Gleysa roman." In most of the collations hitherto published, we read del NOSTRO despartiment . . . , &c.

2. "Joachim Camerarius," in narratione historica "de Ecclesiis Fratrum in Bohemia et Moravia." Camerarius having lived in the sixteenth century, the MS. which contains his work must necessarily be of a very recent date. But the presence of this work in a Vaudois MS. shows the interest which the Vaudois took in the Bohemian Brethren, and in some measure attests the relation which subsisted between them.

3. "La Epistola al serenissimo rey Lancelau." This piece, if it were published, would perhaps be of a nature to throw more light on the relations of the Vaudois with Bohemia. With it this volume terminates. The work of Camerarius occupies the greater part of the volume.

Volume VI.

I can only mention the first few words of each of the treatises which this volume contains.

1. "A Isach. se tu despartires la preciosa cosa de la vil"—(If thou separate the precious things from the vile . . .)

2. "De las vertucz theologicals."—(Of the theological virtues.)

3. "L'beneuranzas."—(The Beatitudes.)

4. "Oyt cosas son que nos deven pensar per chascun dia."—(There are eight things of which we ought to think every day.)

5. "Cant tu seres envida a las noczas"—(When thou art invited to the marriage feast . . .)

6. "Jo entendo d'dire cal cosa matrimoni"—(I propose to say what marriage is.)

7. "Li filh lical naisson a li payrans carnals"—(The children who are born to their parents carnal . . .) Compare with an analogous passage, noticed in this Bibliography, in art. vi. of the Geneva MS., No. 209.

8. "Del pecca de la desubidienca."—(Of the sin of disobedience.) These last four fragments are probably parts of the same treatise.

9. Sermon. "En aquel temp Herode fey pilhar e ligar e encarcerar Johan Baptista."—(At this time Herod caused John the Baptist to be seized, bound, and cast into prison.)

10. "Nos vesen esser na tres greo perilh."—(We see that three great perils are produced.)

11. "Donca nos mesquins, perque tarden de ben far."—(Why then, poor creatures that we are, do we defer to do right?)

12. "Lo felhon abandone la soa via."—(Let the wicked forsake his way.)

13. "O segnor tu me pocz mondar si tu voles."—(O Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean.)

14. "Tu sies sol pelegrin in Jerusalem."—(Thou art the only pilgrim towards Jerusalem.)

15. "Lo fantin Jeshu."—(The infant Jesus.) "Lo teo payre e io dolent querian tu."—(Thy father is now afflicted and seeks thee, or rather: It is I thy father who seek thee sorrowful.¹) "En aquellas contra te Belem, eran pastors

¹ If it were not that Dr. Muston's familiarity with the Romance tongue is so great, and

. . . (In that country of Bethlehem, were there shepherds . . .)—“E cum Jeshu fossa na en Bellem . . .”—(And when Jesus was born at Bethlehem . . .) “En aquel temp zoes li savi atroba e adora lo fantin.”—(At this time came the wise men, to find and adore the child.) I have joined these five fragments under the same number, because they appear to belong to one piece. They were in part contained also in the ancient Vaudois MSS. deposited at Cambridge, vol. . . . Div. B, No. 21.

16. “Li teo olh vean dreytas cosas.”—(Thine eyes shall behold right things.)

17. “De li bal.”—(Of balls.) “De la Taverna.”—(Of taverns.) “De la Beniancza.”—(Of Benevolence.) “De la Desperacion.”—(Of Despair.) “Yo non volh la mort del peccador . . .”—(I desire not the death of the sinner.) It appears to me that these five fragments ought to be connected with a discourse on Conversion, which follows them.

18. “De las parollas auciosas.”—(A sermon on idle words.) This was also contained in the second volume of the Vaudois MSS. of Cambridge, No. 19.

19. “Yet don noble.”—(Eight eminent gifts.) Perhaps this ought to be Tot don noble: Every elevated quality, &c. . . . In the MS. above-mentioned, there is a treatise concerning the Seven Gifts of the Spirit, which recalls the treatise of Stephen De Borbonne, De septem donis Spiritus sancti, founded upon Isa. ii., and a treatise on the six things honourable in this world, Nos. 15 and 19.

20. Two treatises sobre lusura (on usury).

21. Paraphrase, “Jeshu fo mena del esprit al desert, qu'ilh fossu tempta del diavol . . .”—(Jesus was led of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the Devil.)

22. Three sermons, one of which is entitled, “Lo bon pastor.”—(The good Shepherd.) The second begins with these words, “Petit e non verre mi e dreczo petit e veyre mi.”—(A little while and ye shall not see me, and again a little while and ye shall see me.) And the third begins with the words, “La fenna cant ilh aperturis a tristicia, car lora de ley yo soy conspira al fane” (Job xxx.) The last five words of this sentence must have been inaccurately copied.

23. A treatise de la penitencia, already noticed elsewhere.

24. Six sermons commencing thus: (1.) “Cant vos devian del judici avenador . . .” (2.) “Yo fameiey (I have been hungry) a vos non doner a mi a maniar . . .” (3.) “E vevos fenna Cananea yssic daquellas encontras . . .”—(And behold a woman of Canaan came out of these countries . . .) (4.) “O segnor, filh de David merceneia de mi.”—(Have mercy on me.) (5.) “Vevos aqual que semenava . . .”—(Behold he who sowed . . .)

25. “A Isach, Crisostomo di, Tota la gloria de Dio e tota la salu de li ome es pausa en la mort d'Xrist.”—(All the glory of God, and all the salvation of men, rests upon the death of Christ.)

Volume VII.

(Class G, Shelf 4, No. 17.) Entitled: “Waldensium tractatus tres, veteri lingua Britannica conscripte.” I know not on what ground it could be supposed that this volume was written in the ancient Breton language; the treatises which it contains are in the Romance language, and are elsewhere to be met with amongst other Vaudois MSS.

that I can scarcely pretend even to a slight acquaintance with it, I would suppose this to be from Luke ii. 48, and the translation to be, “Thy Father and I have sought thee sorrowing.”—TRANSLATOR.

These three treatises are—

1. GLOSA SOBRE LO PATER NOSTER. Occurs also in the Geneva MSS., Nos. 206, 209, and 43.

2. DE LA QUATRE COSAS QUE SON AVENIR. Occurs also in the Geneva MS., No. 209, fol. 77. The subject of it is indicated in these terms, “Lo es dentendre dun chascun dias que quatre cosas son avenir; ezo es asaber: la mort, lo jorn del iuiament, las penas eternal, li goy de paradis.” (It is every day to be recollected that there are four things to come, viz., death, the day of judgment, the eternal pains, and the joys of paradise.)

3. VERGIER DE CONSOLACION. Frequently referred to by Perrin and Léger. It is to be found also in the Geneva MS., No. 209, at the end of the volume, of which this treatise occupies the last seventy-two pages. In this treatise it is said of faith, hope, and charity—

“La fe endreyce al sobeiran ben, en crescent e consentent lo ver mediant.”

“L’esperanza endreica en resemlhant e ecompeitant las plus autas cosas, mediant lasquals larma se espert . . . es fianza de li ben avenadors, per la gracia de dio e per la bona consciencia.”

“Carita . . . es lamor de dio e del proyme. La carita donna liberta de grieta; la temor non sent lo lavor, non regarda lo merit.”

Faith guides us (puts us in the right way) to the sovereign good, making us to grow and to consent to the true Mediator.

Hope elevates us (puts us in the right way), assimilating us to, and making us to compete for the highest things, by means of which the soul is encouraged. . . . It is the confidence of good things to come (to be obtained) through the grace of God and through a good conscience.

Charity . . . is the love of God and of our neighbour. Charity gives exemption from the injuries (of self-love); fear (or the solicitude which arises from love) neither feels labour nor regards merit.

See the present section of this Bibliography, § 3, MS. 5.

Volume VIII.

(Relating to the inhabitants of Frayssinières.) (Class C, Shelf 4, No. 18.) Entitled, Valdenseia documenta, and containing—

1. “Poursuites dirigées,” &c.—Prosecutions instituted in 1497, by the Archbishop of Embrun, against some of the inhabitants of Frayssinières.

2. “Sentence contre . . .,” &c.—Sentence against Peter Valois of Frayssinières.

3. “Note sur les événements,” &c.—Note on the historic events of 1488. (Crusade of Innocent VIII.)

4. “Tractatus, seu epitome, eorumque continentur in accusatione et lite intentata coram reverendissimis dominis, domino inquisitore apostolico, atque venerando officiali hujus curiæ, præsentibus ac præidentibus, contra Stephanum Ruffum (Gaspard le Roux) e loco, vel oppido, quod vulgo apud Gallos, vocatur la Frayssinière.”

5. “Requête . . .,” &c.—Petition addressed by some inhabitants of Frayssinières to the Archbishop of Embrun, and dated in 1483.

6. Lis intentata contra duos Barbas.—This piece is apparently the same with that which occurs in vol. ix., No. 7, letter I.

7. A letter of the Archbishop of Embrun.

Volume IX.

(Historic Documents, generally relating to the Vaudois of Dauphiny.)

1. Origo Valdensium et processus contra eos facti.

VOL. II.

2. A French translation of the piece, No. 5 of vol. viii.
3. Bull of Innocent VIII. against the Vaudois. (Albert Cattanée, Legate.)
4. Copia protestationis factæ per Castellatum Vallis Loysie una cum omnibus habitatoribus dictæ vallis, declarantes se esse bonos et fideles, orthodoxos, præceptis ecclesiæ obediētes, et quod nullam intendunt prosequi causam in curia christianissimi Francorum Regis.
5. "Processus factus et formatus in facto sanctæ fidei, per reverendum in Christo pastorem et dominum Johannem Episcopum Ebreduensem.
6. Bull of Alexander VI. to absolve the Vaudois. (See the Israel of the Alps, Part I., chap. iii. and iv.) This is followed by two other bulls of the same pope, for the same purpose.
7. Judicial Pieces.—A. Examinations of divers Vaudois.—B. Compareance of Anduin Crispin (Crespin) of Val-Loise.—C. Translation of the piece noticed under No. 3 of vol. viii.—D. Copy of No. 4 of same vol.—E. Examinations of divers prisoners.—F. Other informations.—G. Examination of Peter Valois.—H. Sentence against the same.—I. Case against two Barbas, Martin and John.—K. Case against Peyronnette (published by Allix).—L. Other papers relative to the same affair.
8. Various Pieces.—A. Discourse, by Rostaing, Archbishop of Embrun.—B. Trial and abjuration of Antoine Blaise.—C. Letter of Archbishop Rostaing.—D. Copy of the Letters-Patent of Louis XII., in favour of the inhabitants of Frayssinières.—E. Mandate of the king, to restore to the inhabitants of Frayssinières and Val-Loise, their properties which had been confiscated.—F. Letter to the Bishop to the same effect.—G. Another letter (of the king), to the same effect.—H. Incomplete papers relating to the affair of Odin Crespin.

§ 5.—Ancient Vaudois MSS. deposited at Cambridge.

In this library there was for some time the most voluminous collection known of ancient Vaudois MSS., and documents relative to our history. LÉGER furnished seven volumes of it, and MORLAND fifteen—in all twenty-two. (For these numbers, compare what LÉGER says, part I., chap. iii., p. 21, with GILLY's Waldensian Researches, chap. i., and MORLAND, p. 95.) There were other small articles also deposited with them, under the designation of documents. (LÉGER, p. 23.) The seven volumes which came from LÉGER, and of which he gives a particular account, pp. 21–23, were sent by him to Morland, Cromwell's ambassador at the Court of Turin in 1655; Morland himself brought back from this embassy, fourteen or fifteen bundles of documents, which are now bound up in five volumes. (These papers mostly relate to the events which took place in the Vaudois valleys, from 1650–1656.)

The seven volumes, deposited by LÉGER in the Cambridge library, are no longer to be found there. They are not mentioned in a catalogue of that library, printed in 1690. The new catalogue, printed in 1753, mentions only the bundles sent to the library by Morland in 1656. These are the pieces which originally formed fifteen unbound volumes, and which having recently been bound, now form five volumes, still remaining.

The MSS. which have been taken away, alone contained Vaudois treatises in the Romance tongue. They were the most valuable. "It is probable," says the Rev. Dr. Gilly (Waldensian Researches, chap. i.,) "that they were secretly removed or destroyed during the reign of James II." A letter which I received in 1845, informed me that these MSS. had been discovered at Oxford; but this news has not been confirmed.

Being under the necessity of restricting this Bibliography within as narrow limits as possible, I do not here give a list of these MSS., which may be found in MORLAND, pp. 95-98 (edition of 1658), LÉGER, part I., chap. iii., pp. 21-23, and MONASTIER, vol. ii., pp. 235-239.

§ 6.—A Note of what has been already published of the ancient Vaudois MSS. in the Romance tongue.

I.

Brief fragments, quoted by Perrin:—

1. Letter of the Vaudois to King Lancelau (Wladislas), Perrin, p. 14.
2. "Of Luxury," extracted from the Book Del remedi de pecca de luxuria, chap. xxi. (probably forming part of the treatise entitled, Cal cosa sia pecca), Perrin, p. 15.
3. "Of Marriage," extracted from the book of Virtues.—Pp. 16, 17.
4. "Of Baptism," extracted from the Almanach spiritual, fol. 45.—P. 18.
5. "Of Swearing," from the same book.—P. 20.
6. "Of the Pope," from the book Ayczi es la causa del nostro despartiment de la gleysa romana, p. 235.—P. 21.
7. "Of Holy Places," from the same book, p. 125.—P. 23.
8. "Of Judicial Authority," from the Thresor e lume de fe, fol. 214.—P. 24.
9. "Of Civil Authority," from the book named in No. 6, p. 41.—P. 25.
10. "Of the Trinity," from the Thresor e lume de fe, art. 2.—Pp. 25, 26.
11. Against Revenge, from the book De las tribulacions, p. 224.—P. 27.
12. Against Astrology, from the book of the Exposition of the Ten Commandments (found also in No. 6 of the Book of Virtues).—P. 29.
13. Against belief in sorcerers and conjurers, from the same book. Pp. 30-32.

II.

Fragments of which the original text is published by Perrin and Léger:—

1. "On the Education of pastors." Taken from the Book of George Morel, p. 8. Three pages. Perrin, pp. 70-73; Léger, p. 190. Hahn gives articles x. and xi. of it, p. 702.
2. "Letter of the Barba Bartholemew Tertian."—Entire; Perrin, p. 73; Léger, p. 200.
3. "Athanasian Creed," as in use among the Vaudois.—Perrin, p. 91; Léger, p. 116.
4. "Letter of the Vaudois to Ecolampadius."—A fragment. Perrin, p. 211. (Léger does not copy this fragment.)
5. "Interrogations menors." A Vaudois catechism, of date A.D. 1100. Entire; Perrin, p. 157; Léger, p. 58; Monastier, vol. ii., pp. 296-315; Hahn, p. 673.
6. "Discipline of the Vaudois."—Perrin, pp. 225-252; Léger, p. 190.
7. "A treatise concerning Antichrist."—Perrin, p. 253; Léger, p. 71; Monastier, p. 323. This treatise sets forth (1.) The marks of Antichrist; Perrin, pp. 253-261; Léger, pp. 71-73. (2.) His works, distinguished into eight classes; Perrin, p. 262; Léger, p. 73. (3.) How his adherents seek to justify them. Nine means are pointed out. Perrin, p. 269; Léger, p. 76. (4.) How he is combated by the Bible; Perrin, p. 273; Léger, p. 77.
8. "Chapters on Antichrist," sometimes separately referred to. (1.) Causes of our separation from the Church of Rome.—Perrin, p. 281; Léger, p. 79. (2.) The iniquities of Antichrist, essentially contrary to the Apostles' Creed, exhibited under four heads.—Perrin, p. 285; Léger, p. 80, near the bottom.

9. "Chapters on Antichrist," separately referred to by Perrin and Léger. (1.) Of the invention of Purgatory (Del purgatori soima); Perrin, p. 295; Léger, p. 83; Monastier, vol. ii., pp. 365-375. (2.) Of the Invocation of Saints. Perrin, p. 310; Léger, p. 87. (3.) Of the Sacraments; Perrin, p. 324; Léger, chap. xii.

10. This treatise on the Sacraments is also to be met with in a number of other Vaudois works—in the Almanach spiritual, the Thresor e lume de fe, &c. Perrin (p. 211) gives a translation of a similar treatise, which Léger copies (p. 65), making its paragraphs alternate with those of another treatise inserted under the same title in the book Of Antichrist. The latter is the treatise now under notice. The chapter on the Lord's Supper (Léger, p. 66) is derived from this book; those on Orders, Chrism, and Extreme Unction (Léger, p. 67, at the bottom) are derived from the Almanach spiritual. Perrin, without stating where this treatise occurs, places it at the end of the book on Antichrist; but a number of passages of this treatise correspond exactly with the translation which he gives of that which is found in the Almanach spiritual. (Compare p. 324 of Perrin, with p. 213.) The following are the chapters of this treatise on the Sacraments:—

(1.) Of Baptism. Perrin, p. 324; Léger, p. 65.

(2.) Of the Lord's Supper. Perrin, p. 325; Léger, p. 67.

(3.) Of Marriage and Orders. Perrin, p. 327; Léger, p. 67 (for what relates to orders solely).

(4.) Of Chrism or Confirmation. Perrin, p. 328; Léger, p. 68.

(5.) Of Extreme Unction. Perrin, p. 330; Léger, p. 68.

(6.) Of Fasting. Perrin, p. 331; Léger, p. 69. With this article is united in Léger that on the Visitation of the sick, given by Perrin, p. 219. It will be perceived that the number and order of the Sacraments are not entirely the same as the Church of Rome holds at the present day. I believe this treatise may be regarded as containing a summary of what is contained on this subject in the Almanach spiritual. Compare, as to the divisions, Perrin, p. 211, and Léger, p. 65; as to the subject, Perrin, p. 331 and 219, with Léger, p. 69; and as to the expressions, Perrin, p. 213, with p. 324, and with Léger, p. 67.

11. A Confession of Faith, of date (according to Léger) A.D. 1120. (This author says it is extracted from the Book on Antichrist, Léger, p. 92; and Perrin, that it is extracted from the Almanach spiritual, and from the Book of George Morel; Perrin, p. 79, marginal note). See No. 1 of chap. i. of sect. 3, of this Bibliography.

III.

Fragments and Treatises from the ancient Vaudois books, in the Romance tongue, of which Perrin and Léger have published translations only:—

1. A Confession of Sins, beginning thus: "O Dio de li rey, et Segnor de li Segnor." Léger, p. 57; Perrin, p. 178; Hahn, p. 687; Monastier, vol. ii., p. 376. All these authors give this piece as being in prose. The original exists in the Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 21, art. ix. It is indeed written as if it were prose; but it has been published in the form of verse in the Echo des vallées, first year, No. 19, pp. 154-159.

2. "An Exposition of the Ten Commandments." Taken from the Book of Virtues. Perrin, p. 182; Léger, p. 51; Hahn, pp. 679-687.

3. "An Exposition of the Lord's Prayer." Taken from the Thresor e lume de fe. Perrin, p. 201; Léger, p. 47. This last-named author gives under the same title the original of a similar piece in the Romance tongue. Pp. 40-46.

4. A Treatise on the Sacraments; extracted, it is said, from the Almanach spiritual. Perrin, p. 211; Léger, p. 65. A portion of the original, relating to the sacrament of Baptism, is given by Perrin, p. 18.

5. Of Marriage; extracted also from the Almanach spiritual. Perrin, p. 211. This fragment is not copied by Léger.

7. Of the Visitation of the Sick; from the same book. Léger, p. 69; Perrin, p. 219.

IV.

Fragments and original works in the Romance tongue, published by LÉGER; and by other authors, but not by Perrin.

1. "La nobla Leyczon." (See sect. ii., § 3, of this Bibliography, MS. 207, No. 5.) Léger gives only a fragment of this poem, part I., chap. iv., p. 25.—Raynouard (vol. ii., pp. 73–102), Monastier (vol. ii., pp. 246–269), and Hahn (pp. 628–647) give it entire.

2. "De la temor del Segnor"—A Sermon on the fear of God. Léger, chap. v., p. 30; Hahn, pp. 689–692.

3. "De las tribulacions."—A treatise on afflictions. Léger, chap. vi., p. 35. Hahn, pp. 692–696.

4. "Glosa pater noster"—An exposition and commentary on the Lord's Prayer. Léger, chap. vii., p. 40; Hahn, pp. 697–701.

V.

Vaudois poems in the Romance tongue, published for the first time in a complete form by Hahn; and fragments of certain other works of the ancient Vaudois, first published by the same author. (Geschichte der Waldenser und verwandter Sekten. Stuttgart, 1847; 8vo, pp. 822.)

A.—Works in Verse.

The works mentioned below, are poems extracted from the Geneva MS., No. 207:—

- | | | | | |
|---------------------------------------|-----|-----|-----|--------------------|
| 1. "La Barca," | ... | ... | ... | Hahn, pp. 560–570. |
| 2. "Lo novel Sermon," | ... | ... | „ „ | 570–581. |
| 3. "Lo novel confort," | ... | ... | „ „ | 581–589. |
| 4. "Lo payre eternal," | ... | ... | „ „ | 590–594. |
| 5. "Lo despreczi del mont," | ... | ... | „ „ | 594–597. |
| 6. "L'Avangeli de li quatre semencz," | ... | ... | „ „ | 598–604. |

The various fragments of these poems, which are published by M. Raynouard, in the second volume of his Choir des poésies originales des Troubadours, are copied by M. Monastier, in his Hist. des Vaudois, vol. ii., pp. 272–288.

B.—Works in Prose.

1. "De li article de la fe." Hahn, pp. 605–608.
2. "Le credo." (Each of the different articles of the creed, is ascribed to one of the twelve apostles.) Hahn, pp. 608–611.
3. "De la potesta dona à li vicari de Xrist? (Extracted from the Geneva MS., No. 208.) Hahn, pp. 611–616.
4. "Sermo del judyci" (on the judgment). Hahn, pp. 617–623.
5. "Epistola amicus." (A similar epistle is in the MS. 206.) Hahn, pp. 623–626.
6. "Epistola fideli." (Extracts only given.) Hahn, pp. 626–628.

VI.

Other recent publications.

In "L' Echo des Vallées vaudoises," the publication of various hitherto unpublished fragments of the ancient Vaudois books was begun, and was meant to have been continued. (Vol. i., No. 10, p. 154: the poem, No. 9 of vol. iv. of the Dublin MSS.) This journal having been given up, I believe I may express a hope that the Bibliothèque de l'école des Chartes will supply its place in respect of the publication of these works.

SECTION II.—MS. DEPOSITED IN VARIOUS ARCHIVES.

This section ought to be divided into two chapters: (I.) Public Archives; (II.) Private Archives. It would have been much longer than the preceding section. Its magnitude compels me to suppress it. I shall content myself by reminding the reader that the principal archives from whose contents I have derived information in preparing this work, are, In Turin, the State Archives, the Archives of the Senate, and those of the Court of Accounts;—In Pignerol, those of the City, of the Intendance, and of the Bishop's Palace;—In the neighbourhood, those of the Vaudois Table, and of the municipalities of Lucerna, La Tour, La Perrier, Fenestrelles and Briançon;—In Grenoble, those of the department of the Isère, of the Bishop's Palace, and of the Court of Accounts;—In Paris, the National Archives of France, the MSS. of the former Royal Library, and the State Diplomatic Archives;—In Geneva, those of the Hotel de Ville, of the Council of State, and of the Venerable Company of Pastors.—In most of the other towns of Switzerland and Germany, which interested themselves on behalf of the Vaudois, or in which they settled, are also to be found treasures of greater or smaller amount, but it would be useless to enumerate them without giving some further account of them.

PART III.—DETACHED DOCUMENTS, PRINTED AND IN MANUSCRIPT.

CHAPTER I.—CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PUBLISHED BY THE VAUDOIS, OR IN THEIR NAME, IN DIFFERENT LANGUAGES.

I.—(1120.)

A Confession of Faith, called George Morel's Confession.—Léger gratuitously assigns to it the date 1120, saying that it is "extracted from the old manuscript mentioned above" (Léger, p. 92, line 16); but the last manuscript mentioned above, is that concerning Antichrist, which, indeed, Perrin dates in 1120 (Perrin, p. 57¹); but Perrin himself, in speaking of this Confession (chap. xiii.), says it is extracted from the Book of George Morel (Perrin, p. 79, marginal note), in which it is to be found to this day. (Dublin MSS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18.) But that MS. is not older than the year 1530. Moreover, this Confession says, nos non aven conegu autre Sacrament que lo Baptisme e la Eucharistia—We have not known any other Sacrament than Baptism and the Eucharist—(Hahn, p. 651), which is true of the Vaudois only since the Reformation. The characters of the language, the spelling of the words, and the use of capital letters in the middle of sentences; above all, the composition of the Canon which this piece contains (see Part II., sect. i., § 1, art. v., note 2, of this Bibliography), compel us to assign this MS. a date posterior to that of the MSS. of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The Confession contains fifteen articles, and is published by Léger, chap. xvii., p. 92; Monastier, vol. ii., p. 316; Hahn, pp. 647–651; and Beit, p. 416. For a critical examination of it, see the Revue théologique, vol. i., p. 337.

¹ Even this date is doubtful, for Perrin indicates it thus:—"Item, un livre intitulé l'Antechrist, lequel commence ainsi: Qual cosa sia l'Antechrist, en datte de l'an mil cent et vingt." These last words, although in Italics, are not in the Romance language, and are not to be found in the text of the original. They have therefore been added by Perrin; it may be supposed that he did so by reason of a date inscribed upon the volume which he had in his hands; but there is no proof whatever of the authenticity of this date. See also Part II., section i., § 1, No. 5, of this Bibliography.

II.—(1431.)

Under this date, Léger places a Confession of Faith of the Bohemian Brethren, erroneously attributed to the Vaudois of Piedmont. It was directed, as a protest, against Rokenzana or Rockyzane. (Léger, p. 108.) Léger gives only a summary of its contents; but it is to be found entire in the Waldensia of L. Lydius. (See this Bibliography, Part I., sect. ii., § 3, No. 1.)

III.—(1488.)

In the MS., entitled, “Histoire générale des Alpes maritimes ou Cottiennes, et particulièrement d’Embrun, leur métropolitaine: chorographique, et mêlée de l’histoire séculière avec l’ecclésiastique: divisée en cinq parties; composée par le Révérend P. Marcellin Fournier, de la compagnie de Jésus;” in p. 356, mention is made of a Confession of Faith of the Vaudois, drawn up in opposition to the Bull of 1487, by which Innocent VIII. confided to the legate Cattaneo the charge of persecuting them. This MS. is in the library of the Little Seminary at Gap. The original is in Latin, and is in the library of the Syon College; there is a copy of it in Paris. The MS. of Gap is a translation made by Raymond Juvenis, royal procurator in the bailiwick of Gap in 1680. Fournier’s history ceased with the year 1640; Juvenis continued it to his own time, and added many notes. He is the author of the unpublished Mémoires historiques, preserved in the libraries of Grenoble and Carpentras.

IV.—(1532.)

The Confession of Angrogna or Farel’s Confession, drawn up by a Synod held at Angrogna on the twelfth of September, 1532. Such is the date given by Gilles and in the Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18, fol. 59; but Léger (p. 95) says the twelfth of December, 1532; and Perrin (p. 157) the twelfth of September, 1535. This Confession was composed under the direct influence of Farel and of Saulnier, who were present at the meeting of Synod in which it was adopted. It contains seventeen articles, very concisely expressed. It denies free-will and asserts predestination. I have spoken of it more at large in the Israel of the Alps, Part I., chap. vii. It is given entire, in a translation, by Perrin, p. 58; Léger, p. 95; Moser, p. 319; and Hahn, p. 652. Gilles softens down the terms of it in his work (chap. v.,) as if the opinion expressed in it had only obtained a temporary triumph in the valleys.

V.—(1535.)

The Confession of the Magnates of Bohemia, “presented to the King of Bohemia," says Léger, "by his subjects, the Vaudois, in the year 1535, who, after an excellent preface of the Picards or Vaudois . . . and another . . . of the Barons of the country, set forth the causes for which they had embraced their religion." But this style is too confused and full of inaccuracies to convey any clear idea. This Confession is not of the year 1535, for Melancthon speaks of it in a letter dated from Wittenberg, in 1533.—(D'Argentré, vol i.; see also the separate pamphlet which contains this piece.) Nor is it a Confession of the Vaudois of Piedmont. It is preceded by a preface by the Magnates of Bohemia, on the reasons which have induced them to embrace the Reformation, and not the religion of the Vaudois, as Léger seeks to insinuate by his ambiguous expression. There follows a letter of Luther on the Picards, whom Léger calls the above-mentioned Vaudois (p. 104), and an eulogy of this letter by Wesembecius. This Confession of Faith contains twenty long articles. It is in Latin, and is mentioned only by Léger, pp. 96–104, and Hahn, pp. 654–665 (Léger, in p. 111, quotes also, as Confessions of the Vaudois, two Confessions of Faith addressed by the French refugees, in 1532 and in 1538, to the Marquis of Brandenburg.)

VI.—(1543.)

Confession of Faith of the Vaudois of Cabrières to Cardinal Sadolet, then Bishop of Carpentras. It contains a statement of the primitive doctrines, without a trace of predestination, and contains twenty-six articles. Léger gives only an extract of it (p. 107); but it is given entire in Pantalcon's Martyrologe (Basle, 1563; book v., fol. 130 of the second part). In 1541, the Vaudois of Merindol presented to Francis I., a petition, which also contained a profession of faith, and which is given in CRESPIN (edition of 1619, fol. 138).

VII.—(1544.)

Confession of Faith of the Vaudois of Provence to Francis I.—The preceding (the first of No. 6), was only made in name of the inhabitants of Cabrières du Comtat; this was made in name of those of Cabrières d'Aignes, of Lourmarin, of Merindol, &c. It is conceived in a very good spirit—evangelical, rational, and practical. It contains twelve articles, and is to be found in Perrin, p. 87; Léger, p. 109; Du Moulin, De Monarchia Francorum, p. 60; Hahn, p. 665. It was after reading this document that Francis I. exclaimed, "I would like to know what they can get to reply to that!"

VIII.—(1550.)

Confession of Faith of the Vaudois, according to Vignaux (cited by Perrin, pp. 49, 50). It bears no precise date; that which I give is only an approximation, and determined by the period at which Vignaux was a pastor in the Vaudois valleys. This Confession of Faith regards certain practices of the Church of Rome merely as superfluous (art. vii.) It admits of no other degrees in the ecclesiastical hierarchy than those of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons (art. viii.) It contains, in all, eleven articles; and does not appear to have been drawn up under the influence of any of those temporary causes, the effect of which may too often be traced in similar productions, whilst the authors who have written under such influences have neglected to refer to them. It must have been drawn up previous to the Reformation.

IX.—(1556.)

Confession of Faith, presented to the Parliament of Turin, by the Vaudois church, in reply to the edict of 23d March, 1556. It accepts the Creeds of the first four general councils (those of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon), and also the Athanasian Creed. It contains five articles of doctrine, very brief; and five paragraphs in reply to the charges brought against the Vaudois in respect of doctrine, in the above-mentioned edict. It is mentioned by Gilles, p. 59; and given by Léger, p. 106.

X.—(1572.)

Confession of Faith of the Vaudois of Bohemia, mentioned by Calvin in one of his letters.—(Letter 204 of the Collection). I have sought for this Confession in various works, but have not been able to assure myself of its identity: and I have not at present any opportunity of repeating this search.

XI.—(1603.)

Confession of Faith of the Vaudois of the valley of Suza and the Marquisate of Saluces. This piece is drawn up in the form of articles. It is rather a manifesto than a confession. It affords evidence of the necessity which the Protestants of Piedmont felt, of keeping on such terms with foreign powers as to secure their political support. To be convinced of this, we have only to read the declaration which terminates this piece, and which Léger has published (p. 115) after the Confession of 1655. For the original words of the manifesto of 1603, see Perrin, p. 185, and Léger, p. 111.

XII.—(1655.)

A Confession which might be named the Anathematizing Confession, as it is the only one of all the published writings of the Vaudois, or of those published in their name, which pronounces an anathema against those who do not agree with their views.—(See Léger, p. 116, line 8.) Léger entitles it a “Brief Confession of Faith of the Reformed Churches of Piedmont, published with their manifesto, upon occasion of the dreadful massacres of the year 1655.”—(Part I., ch. xvii., p. 112). These words do not say where, nor how, nor by whom this Confession of Faith was drawn up. They only tell us that it did not exist before 1655; but, in 1655, no Synod was held in the Vaudois valleys to draw it up; it first appeared in a book published in a foreign country without place of publication.—(See Part I., sect. ii., § 2, No. 2, of this Bibliography). This book could not at that time penetrate into Piedmont; the Confession of Faith which it contains was therefore not published there. Its origin is very doubtful.—(See Part I., sect. i., § 2, No. 2, of this Bibliography). It may, however, be safely asserted, that the Vaudois church (as represented by a regular Synod) took no part in its preparation; it is probable that the majority of the members of that church did not know of it when it appeared; it is certain that it does not at all agree with the ancient doctrine of the Vaudois. Any other Confession of Faith, emanating from any of the numerous sects of Protestantism existing at that time, might just as well have been ascribed to the Vaudois, in virtue even of the declarations which it contains.—(See Léger, p. 115, lines 20–23.)

The Vaudois, in fact, here renounce the title of a special church (see Léger, p. 112, third paragraph); they reject even the name of Vaudois, and take only that of Reformed. It might be said that they renounce at once the name and the doctrine of their fathers, if this Confession were really their work; but, on the contrary, everything shows that they had (as a church at least) nothing whatever to do with it. The most probable opinion is, that one of their political friends, with the consent, no doubt, of a few Vaudois, produced it in their name in a foreign country, to rally all the Reformed Churches in their defence.

This Confession of Faith contains thirty-three articles, modelled after those of La Rochelle. It is published by Léger, p. 112, and by Hahn, p. 668.

The doctrine which predominates in it is that of absolute predestination. All men are damned from their mother's womb.—(Art. 9 and 10). God withdraws the predestinated ones from damnation, and leaves the others in it, without any possibility of our prayers, our virtues, or our efforts producing any change in these destinies which are independent of us and fixed beforehand.—(Art. 11, 16, and 18.)¹

"This doctrine," says M. Guizot, "is as old as the fifth century. Its origin is obscure and doubtful. Saint Augustine earnestly defended himself from the charge of having taught it. But from the time when it appeared, it clashed with the good sense and moral equity of the greater part of Christians."—(Cours d'Histoire moderne, Lect. IV., Brussels edition of 1835, vol. i., pp. 178, 179.)

We find no trace of it in the ancient books of the Vaudois in the Romance tongue. "We have always believed," say they, on the contrary, "that God has given to man a principle of spontaneity and of virtue (action, force), by means of which he may labour for his salvation, according to the gifts which he has received, as the parable of the talents appears to teach; and with the aid of God, according to what is said, I stand at the door and knock; and that the reprobate were made so by their own fault, agreeably to these words—Every man shall receive according to his works . . .," &c.—(Extract and abridgment of articles xv. and xvi. of the statement of the Vaudois faith made to the Reformers; Dublin MS., Class C, Shelf 5, No. 18.—Sculctetus, Annales evangelii renovati, anno MDXXX.—Ruchat, Hist. de la réformation en Suisse, vol. iii.—Ecolampadius, Epistole . . . , &c.) Of all that I have found in the ancient Vaudois books, the strongest opinion of an opposite character, is expressed in the following terms:—

"La potesta natural, laqual es to libre arbitre, se po, alcuna veez, alargar per grazia e alcuna veez restregner. . . ."

"Lo libre arbitri, se po perder per lo peccia. e accreisser per grazia. . . ."

"E similliant razon es del retenament e del ligament de li peccia."

The natural power, which is free-will, is capable of being sometimes extended by grace and sometimes restrained. . . .

Free-will may be lost by sin and increased by grace. . . .

And a similar account is to be given of the retaining and of the binding of sins (of the remission or responsibility of sin).

(De la postesta donna a li Vicari de Xrist; published by Hahn, Geschichte der Waldenser . . . , &c., pp. 611–616; end of the first paragraph). But even these words suppose the existence of free-will, which the Confession of 1655 denies (art. ix.)

It cannot be denied that a severe logic conducts us to the doctrine of predestination. But it ought not to be forgotten that logic is a form of our understanding; and that without this form, and not within it, lie the bases of life. Faith in God, in our own existence, in the immortality of the soul, &c., are not the result of a syllogism. It has not pleased God that our life should depend upon our good or bad reasoning. It is in vain that an irreproachable logic leads us to fatalism: a reasoning not less correct tells me also that if God could not be moved, our prayers were useless; that the laws of causality annul moral liberty; that our physical existence is merely an hypothesis, &c.; but I feel that I exist, I feel that I am free, I feel that prayer does me good; and I thank God that he has put within me something which reasoning can neither prevail over nor destroy.¹

¹ I translate these paragraphs as I find them. This is no place to discuss the subject, or to prove that the learned author himself has not been free from the influence of prejudices. But the reader will easily perceive their nature and tendency.—TRANSLATOR.

It has been attempted to bind the conscience of the Christians of our times to this Confession of Faith of doubtful origin; but any authority whatever, external to the Bible, which proposes to limit at once the meaning of the Bible and the conscientious opinions of men, is nothing but a disguised Popery. It supposes that the faith of the framers of a Confession is capable of being transmitted to those who adopt it by the mere fact of its adoption. The result is the formation of two classes of believers: the one class composed of those who believe of themselves; and the other, of those who believe in virtue of the church's code, on the authority of the former. This delegation of faith has no foundation in the gospel. It is, moreover, incompatible with the principle of private judgment; for we cannot say to any one—"I grant you the right of private judgment, on condition that you arrive at results previously determined by me." Such a pretension would be the seal of bondage placed on human thought. Moreover, convictions are necessarily individual; they concern things which the person understands; they are, therefore, relative to our means of understanding; and as they vary according to the individuals, we can never, in a society composed of people of all ages and all diversities of character, consider a single formulary as the sincere expression of the convictions of all. The same conviction would suppose the same moral type, and therefore the same life, which is not the case. Finally, such a formulary would be a Procrustes' bed for the minds of men, if they were really to be subjected to it; but they cannot be so; it is, therefore, only a fiction; and those who maintain it, or submit to it, by reason of its official character, are tacitly involved in falsehood. Again, what is an official faith? Under all religious forms, whether dogmatic or ceremonial, there are hearts without life. The life of the soul is the only condition of salvation; this life is obtained by the grace of God, and not by assent more or less enlightened to matters of doubtful speculation, nor by practices of devotion more or less puerile. Indeed, life is not incompatible with these forms; but it does not proceed from them: and if the disciples of Christ were called Christians (Acts xi. 26), it was because they led a Christian life. It was on the same ground that the Vaudois of ancient times might be called the heirs of the primitive church.

CHAPTER II.—HISTORIC DOCUMENTS AND NOTES ANTERIOR TO THE BULL OF INNOCENT VIII.

(1487.)

The events anterior to the epoch indicated at the head of this chapter occupying little space in this history, I think it right to point out here some of the documents of which, in a more extended work, use might be made to throw light upon them. The question how the Vaudois valleys became part of the dominions of the Duke of Savoy, is one of the first which presents itself.—The name of Savoy is not met with before the fourth century. Ammianus Marcellinus is the first author in whose work it occurs. After having formed part of the kingdom of Burgundy, Savoy was annexed to the Empire in the tenth century. In 1050, Peter Damian complains to the Countess of Suza (in whose county the Vaudois valleys were), that part of her domains did not observe the ordinances of the church; (Damiani opera, p. 566, quoted by Gilly, Waldensian Researches, p. 88, and by Coste De Beauregard, vol. i., p. 111), and a short time afterwards, the Chronicle of Saint Thron (from 1108 to 1136) mentions, without naming the Vaudois, a country in the Italian Alps, celebrated for its heresy.—(Dacherii Spicilegium, vol. viii., p. 493.) The documents which follow would seem to determine this country to be the Vaudois valleys on both sides of the Alps.

¹ [The Translator refrains from appending any remarks of his own on this and the following paragraphs, but he feels called upon to guard himself against being supposed to assent to all the opinions and reasonings of the author.]

1056. A Bull of Pope Victor II., addressed to Viminian, Archbishop of Embrun, in which are the words—"Ecclesiam Ebredunensem . . . mirabiliter est corrupta."—(Quoted by Father Albert, vol. i., p. 56. For the exact title of this work, see Part I., sect. vi., chap. i., § 1, No. 14, of this Bibliography.)

1064. Foundation of the convent of Pignerol, by Adelaide of Suza.—(Chronologie de chiesa, chap. xxiv.; Rorengo, p. 41; Monumenta patriæ, vol. i.)—In 1076 and 1078, she endowed it with the neighbouring lands.

1081. Gift of properties situated at Saluces, to the same convent, by the Countess of Suza.—(State Archives at Turin.) If the domain of the Countess of Suza extended from Pignerol to Saluces, the Vaudois valleys must have been comprised in it.

1096. A Bull of Urban II., in which he makes mention of the same valleys, but on the French side, as infested with heresy. The Val-Louise is designated in this Bull the Vallis Gyrontana.—"Recueil des actes, pièces et procédures sur l'emphythéose des dymes du Briançonnais;" note in p. 55; and Father Albert, vol. i., p. 56.)

1100. Supposed date of the Nobla Leyczon, in which the Vaudois are designated by name; and of the catechism, Interrogations menors, which they were accustomed to use.—(Léger, Part I., pp. 26 and 58; Perrin, Part II., p. 157; Buxhorn, Hist. Néerland, pp. 36-48, &c.)

1119. Council of Toulouse: decrees of the Inquisition, against the heretics who existed partly in Italy and partly in France.—(Gallois, Hist. de l'Inquis., pp. 81, 83, 84.)

1130. About this period Peter De Bruys began to propagate his opinions in the south of France. According to the Catholic authors of Dauphiny, he was a native of the Val-Louise (Hist. du diocèse d'Embrun, by Father Albert, vol. i., p. 56; Fournier, MS. quoted in No. 3 of the preceding chapter, &c.) Concerning the doctrine of Bruys, see the letter of Peter the Venerable, of Cluny.—(Biblioth. Cluniacensi, pp. 1117-1230.; Bibl. Max. P. P. Lugdun., vol. xxii., p. 1033, &c.)

1144. The heretics of Dauphiny were denounced by Pope Lucius II. (Veter. monumentorum amplissima collectio, vol. i.—Quoted by GILLY, Waldensian Researches, chap. ii.)—"The passage to which he alludes, occurs in a letter written by the Chapter of Liège to Pope Sixtus II.—Martène and Durand, vol. i., p. 776.) In this letter mention is made of the heretics established at Mons-Guimari; Martène makes a conjecture, forte Mons-Limarii (Montclimart), in Delphinatu. But the place intended is the castle of Monte Vimers, near Châlons-sur-Marne." Note by M. Schmidt.

1165. "A numerous detachment of Albigeois, leaving the south of France, took refuge in the valleys of Piedmont, where they united themselves with the Vaudois, both in doctrine and worship."—(Morison, Hist. of the Ref.; translated by Burnier, p. 35.) The author gives no proof of this fact; but this is the date at which Gilles places the arrival of the disciples of Valdo, in the

Vaudois valleys.—(Chap. iii., p. 17.)—He had previously said 1160. (Chap. i., p. 2.)

1188. Thomas, Count of Savoy, seizes the Vaudois valleys.—(Old Chronicle, deposited in the Library of Carpentras. MS. of Peyresk, Register LIX., vol. i., p. 27.)

1190. The period about which Valdo of Lyons may have retired into the Vaudois valleys. The History of the town of Pernes, by Giberti, vol. i., p. 101, says, that Valdo retired to Freyssinières (MS. of Carpentras, No. 606).—Raumer (Hist. des Hohenstaufen, vol. iii., p. 273) places the conversion of Valdo in the year 1173. This is also the date assigned to it in the Chronique de Laon, published by Bouquet, (Recueil des Histoires de Gaule et de France, vol. xiii.)—Valdo was condemned in 1179, by the Council of Lateran; his disciples were condemned in 1186, by Lucius III., in the Council of Verona.

1192. "Statuta synodalia Odonis Episcopi Tullensis, de hereticis . . . qui vocantur Vadoys."—(Martène, Thes. anecdotorum, vol. iv., p. 1182.)

1194. Edict of Alphonso II., King of Aragon (and Marquis of Provence), against the Vaudois and other heretics.—(Nicol. Eymeric, Directorium Inquisitorum, p. 282.) Mansius attributes this decree to Peter II. (vol. xxii., fol. 673),—other authors to Alphonso, or Hildefonso, of Aragon, but under the date 1192.—(D'Argentré, Collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus, vol. i., fol. 33.—Biblioth. Max. P. P. vol. xxv., fol. 190.—Bert, Valdesi, p. 424, &c.) This latter date also appears to me the more probable.

1200. Origin of the Inquisition. (Perrin places it in 1206. P. 104.) It was not established in an active form till 1208 in France, 1224 in Italy, and 1231 in Spain.

1209. Decree of Otho IV. (passing through Piedmont, on his way to be crowned at Rome), by which he authorizes the Bishop of Turin to employ temporal arms against the Vaudois.—(Monumenta patriæ, vol. iii., col. 488.)

1211. Refusal of the Count of Toulouse, to whom the Council of Narbonne offered the restoration of his dominions, upon condition that he would expel the heretics from his territories.—(History of the Albigenes.)

1213. Letter of the Emperor Frederic II. to Pope Innocent III., in which he promises to the Pontiff that he will exert himself for the extermination of heretics.—(Raumer, vol. iii., p. 304. Bert, p. 427.)

1215. The Council of Lateran (the fourth of that name; the twelfth general council), assembled by Innocent III., condemns the Vaudois. The Council of Cremona, held in 1226, treats also of the extirpation of heretics in Italy. (Art de vérifier les dates.)

1220. Decree of the municipality of Pignerol, forbidding any one to show hospitality to a Vaudois man or Vaudois woman, under pain of a fine of twelve sous. "Liber statutorum civitatis Pinarolii." Turin, 1602. Cap. 84. "Monumenta Patriæ," vol. ii.

1224. Edicts of the Inquisition against heretics in Italy. (Gallois, "Hist. de l'Inquisition," p. 81.)

1228. Conferences of monks in Dauphiny against the Vaudois. (Perrin, pp. 104, 105.)

1231. Bull of Gregory IX. against the Vaudois. (M'Crie, "Hist. of the Reformation in Italy, chap. i.—Gallois, Hist. de l'Inquis., p. 84.)

1233. Thomas, Count of Savoy, makes himself of Pignerol, under pretext that the race of the Counts of Piedmont is extinct. (Historians differ from one another as to this fact.) Amadeus III., or IV., according to other chronologists, succeeded Count Thomas, his father. He was appointed Vicar of the Empire in Lombardy and Piedmont, in 1241, by the Emperor Frederic II. (Art do vérifier les dates.)

1235. A Synod held at Avignon, concerning the Vaudois and Albigeois.

1238. Quotation of a MS. concerning the Vaudois, according to Usher and Cappel. (Léger, pp. 328-331.)

1240. Concilium Rituricense, in which a new crusade against the Albigeois was proposed.

1242. Acts of the Synod of Tarascon, held against the Vaudois. (Mansi, vol. xxiii., p. 553.)

1265. Brief of Alexander IV., to the Prior of Paris, against the heretics. (Martène and Durand; Thes. nov. anecdotorum, vol. v., p. 1814.—Hahn, p. 735.)

1273. Instructions of Gregory X., regarding the Inquisition.—(Same works; Martène, vol. v., p. 1817; Hahn, p. 739.)

1300, or thereby.—Wars of Amadeus V., Count of Maurienne and of Savoy, with Humbert, first Dauphin of Le Viennois. Settlement of the Vaudois, who came from the valleys of the Po, on the banks of the Durance. Foundation of Mérindol, Cabrières, &c.—(Numerous authors.)

1315. Accounts of the Delphinal châtelain of the valley of Pragela, containing a statement of the sums which he had furnished to the inquisitors for the destruction of heresy in the Vaudois valleys. (Archives of Fénestrelle.)

1332. Brief of John XXII. (dated from Avignon, 8th July), in which he says: "Multiplicati sunt hæretici . . . præcipue, de secta Valdensium . . . frequentes congregationes, per modum capituli, habent . . . in quibus aliquando quingenti simul fuerant congregati." (Rorengo, Memorie storiche, 4to edition, Turin, 1619, p. 16.—Léger, part. ii., p. 20.) According to Platina, the pope who issued this brief, must have borne the title of John XXIII. (De vitis Pontificum Rom., 4to edition; Cologne MDC., p. 255.)

1335. Bull of Benedict XII. to Humbert II., Dauphin, against the heretics of Dauphiny. (Valbonays, Hist. du Dauphiné, p. 326.—Raynaldi, Annales, No. 63.)—At the same date there occurs an extract of the accounts of Borelli, Baillif of Embrun, "pro persequendis Valdensibus et aliis expensis." (Valbonays, p. 326.—Raynaldi, Annales, No. 68.)

1344. Pastor began to act against the Vaudois of Dauphiny. (Fournier, MS. already mentioned, translation of Juvenis, p. 361.—1712.)

1345. Accounts of the Delphinal châtelain of the valley of Pragela, for the purchase of various instruments of torture, for the use of the inquisitors. (Archives of Fénestrelles.)

1348. Letter of the Dauphin, Humbert II., to the Baillif of Embrun and other civil officers, "quibus injungit ut quoties fuerit requisitus ab Archiepiscopo Ebredunesii, ei auxilium præstet contra Valdenses." (Records of the Court of Accounts at Grenoble, vol. K, p. 301.)

1349. Dauphiny ceded to France.—In 1347, the Republic of Quiers in Piedmont, voluntarily submitted to Amadeus VI., Count of Savoy, and to the Princes of Achaia. (Hist. de Quiers, vol. i., p. 891. Cibrario, p. 143.)

1353. War between Maurienne and Dauphiny, about the boundaries of these provinces. Guillaume de Bordes, Archbishop of Embrun, and Guillaume Dupuy, Inquisitor sent by Innocent VI. against the Vaudois, destroy their place of meeting in Vallouise, and put numbers of them to death. (Fournier's MS., already quoted. The author adds after this, "I can learn nothing of what was done against the Vaudois in the end of this century, because the papers are wanting.")

1354. Order of the Prince of Achaia to the Governors of La Tour in Val Lucerna, against the Vaudois. (Rorengo, Mém. Hist., p. 16, first paragraph.)

1360. Maxims of the Inquisition reduced to practice with regard to the Vaudois. (Perrin, pp. 102 and 127; Léger, p. 337.)

1369. Commission given to Borelli and to Bertrand de St. Guillaume to persecute the Vaudois, in virtue of a bull of Urban V. (Chorier, Hist. gén. du Dauphiné. Book xii., chap. v., p. 392.)

1373. Bull of Gregory XI., addressed to the inquisitors Borelli and Bertrand de St. Guillaume, calling upon them to destroy the Vaudois. (D'Argentré, Collect. judic. de novis erroribus, vol. i., p. 392.)—Some authors, and amongst others, Raymond Juvenis, in his Mémoires Historiques (MS. preserved at Carpentras), ascribe this bull to Gregory IX. Father Albert places it in 1365. (Hist. ecclési. du diocèse d'Embrun, &c., vol. i., p. 59.) Gregory XI. addressed private letters, with the same view, to the Emperor Charles V., to the Bishop of Paris, to the Archbishops of Vienne, Embrun, &c., to the Governor of Dauphiny, and in particular to the Count of Savoy (Amadeus VI.)—The pontifical letters, addressed to the latter, are of date 20th March, and of 7th May, and 17th June, 1373. (Extracted from various archives.)

1375. Repetition of this Bull. (Mém. Hist. of Juvenis, unpublished.)—Prosecutions in virtue of it. (Same MSS., also Mémoires Hist. of Dominique Rochas, quoted by M. Gautier, author of the Letters Hist. sur le Gépençois.)

1380. New orders to destroy the Vaudois given to Borelli by Clement VII. (Perrin p. 113. This author says that this is the first persecution which had come under his notice.) New pontifical letters were then written, with the same view, in Dauphiny and Piedmont. It must be remarked, that at this period, Clement VII. was pope in Avignon, and Urban VI. in Rome.

1386. The towns of Nice and Barcelonnette withdrew themselves from the dominion of the Count of Provence, to put themselves under the protection of the Count of Savoy. (Art de vérifier les dates.)

1390, &c.—Judicial investigations directed against the Vaudois of Dauphiny by the inquisitors. (Bossuet, Hist. des Variat., liv. xi., § ciii.) These investigations must not all be referred to one year. They took place in 1344 (Fournier, MS. of Gap, Hist. des Alpes, &c., p. 361); in 1353 (id. p. 355); in 1393 (Perrin, p. 114, lines 1, 29, and 30, compared with the first lines of p. 115). They were especially numerous from 1487 to 1497. (For the intermediate dates, see Perrin, pp. 127, 131, 132, 134, and 137.)—In 1485, the papers connected with them were so voluminous, that by themselves alone they formed the burden of a mule (Perrin, p. 141, marginal note). They were then transported to Paris by order of the Grand Chancellor (Adam Fumée, whose father was physician to Charles VII., Louis XI., and Charles VIII.) New ones succeeded, which were also transported to Paris, in 1501. (Mémoires of Rostaing, Archbishop of Embrun, quoted by Perrin, pp. 140–143.) Similar investigations taking place again, it came to pass that in 1585, when Embrun was taken by Lesdiguières, the papers fell into the hands of the Reformed. (Perrin, Dedication, p. 2, l. 22; marginal notes, pp. 47, 63; p. 128, &c.) Part of these papers seem to have been preserved for some time at Grenoble, in the Archives of the Parliament (Rorengo, Memorie Hist., p. 12); but they can no longer be found. Perrin had access to them (Dedication to Lesdiguières). Those which belonged to the libraries of Colbert and the Marquis de Seignelay (Bossuet, Histoire des Var., liv. xi., § ci.) have also been lost. Part of these processes were in the hands of Léger, for the years 1475, 1478, 1483, and 1497 (Part I., p. 23, No. 7); these were deposited at Cambridge, whence they have also disappeared. Allix

(Some Remarks, &c., end of the 4to vol.; Lond. 1590) has published some considerable fragments of them. Basnage (vol. ii., p. 1440) and Perrin (p. 133, &c.) speak of them; and Léger gives a translation of one of them (Part II., p. 21). Various fragments of these processes are now amongst the Vaudois MSS. of Dublin (Class C, Shelf IV, No. 18). Father Bonnet and Lelong speak of them in their dictionaries. In 1838, the Minister of Public Instruction caused researches to be made in Paris for the recovery of these documents, but they were unsuccessful.

1393. Sentence of the inquisitor Borelli, who delivered to the fire 150 Vaudois of Dauphiny (Perrin, p. 114). Chorier makes the number 230 (Hist. gén. du Dauphiné, liv. xii., § v.) Joseph Dominique Rochas, in his Mémoires Hist., follows Chorier's version (MS. above quoted, second series, p. 71). Brunet places at this date, and ascribes to Borelli, the events which took place in 1487, at the instigation of Veyletti, according to Perrin and Chorier. (See Brunet, Seigneur de l'Argentière, Recueil des Actes, . . . &c., p. 55; Perrin, p. 127; Chorier, under date above mentioned).

1400, or thereby. A part of the Vaudois, settled in Provence, being persecuted, says Gilles, at the instance of the pope, whose seat was in Avignon (Gregory IX.), retired to the valleys, and thence proceeded to Calabria (Gilles, p. 19). At the same period, the valley of Pragela was invaded (Perrin, p. 116).

1413. The Count of Saluces is compelled by force of arms to render homage to the Count of Savoy (Amadeus VIII.)

1416. The county of Savoy is erected into a duchy by the Emperor Sigismund, passing through Piedmont, on his way to seek the antipope, Benedict XIII., at Perpignan.

1419. Iolande of Arragon relinquishes to the Duke of Savoy (Amadeus VIII., who was only count in 1413) the country from Nice to Ville-Franche. (By treaty signed at Chambéry, on the 5th of October.)

1434. Amadeus VIII. retires to the priory of Ripailles, where (on 7th November, 1434) he instituted the order of secular knighthood, de l'Annonciade (which was only a transformation of that of the Lacs d'Amor, established in 1355). The Council of Basle (in its session of 5th November, 1439), having previously deposed Eugenius IV. (session of 25th June), elevated Amadeus of Savoy to the papedom, whose coronation took place at Basle (24th July, 1440). He assumed the pontifical name of Felix V. The Council of Florence, under the presidency of Eugenius IV., declared Felix V. an antipope, heretic, &c. (Session of 23d March, 1440, the fourth of the Council.) He retained the tiara, however, till 9th April, 1449, when he laid it down to prevent a schism. Amadeus then returned to Ripailles, and died at Geneva, on 7th January, 1451. (Art de vérifier les dates.)

1448. "Privileggiî, immunità e franchigie, concesso alle communita e nomini della valle di Luserna." Dated 14th September. (Deposited in the Archives of the Court of Accounts at Turin, under No. 576.) Numerous ratifications of these Patents are to be found at Pignerol, under the title of "Libertates et franchisiæ, Dominis vallis Lucernæ et hominibus suis . . . concessæ." (Civil Archives, Categ. Lucerna, Mazzo di Bobio.)

1453 (16th July). Brief of Nicholas V., addressed to the Bishops of Turin and Nice, authorizing them to relieve those of the inhabitants of Lucerna who should renounce their heresy from the interdict under which the valley had been laid. (Rorengo, p. 19.)

1475 (29th November). Orders by John de Compesio, Archbishop of Turin, to the inquisitor Andrew d'Aquapendente, to punish in various ways the Vaudois who had relapsed—i.e., who having become Catholics, had afterwards returned to their former doctrines. (Rorengo, pp. 22-24; Gilles, p. 24.)

1476 (23d January). Edict of the Duchess Yolande, to cause the Vaudois to observe the orders of the Inquisition and the ceremonies of the Church of Rome. (Raccolta dagl. editti . . . &c., p. 1; Rorengo, p. 24; Borelli, under the date mentioned; Hahn, p. 705.)

1477 (27th April). Brief against the Vaudois, mentioned by Sclopis in his Storia della legge di Piemonte, p. 487.

1478 (18th May). Letters of Louis XI. to put an end to the persecutions to which the Vaudois, and in particular those of Freyssinières, were subjected in Dauphiny. (Perrin, pp. 118-124; Hahn, p. 725.) Ten years after, their brethren of Vallouise were completely destroyed. These letters are dated from Arras.

1483. Petition of some of the inhabitants of Freyssinières to the Archbishop of Embrun. (Vaudois MSS. of Trinity College Library, Dublin, Class C, Shelf IV., No. 18, piece 5. Other historic documents are also to be found in this volume and the next.)

1484. Edict of investigation into the conduct of the Vaudois, issued by the Duke Charles, and "registrato nel protocollo del Bessone, nel Archivio di Chamberi." (Rorengo, p. 25.)

1484 (29th August). Election of Innocent VIII. to the papedom. It was he who published the celebrated tariff of the indulgences, the traffic in which awakened the indignation of Luther. The following is the title of this rare book, preserving the orthography of the time: "Rubrica, regule, ordinationes et constitutiones cancellarie, sanctissimi domini, domini Innocentii, divina providentia Pape viij, scripte et correcte in cancellaria apostolica. Roma MCDLXXXVII." According to this tariff, all possible vices might be redeemed for so much money. For parricide, eight gros; for fratricide, the same price; for a husband killing his wife, six gros; for incest, seven gros, &c. (The gros was worth about sixteen sous, and corresponded in value to eighteen or twenty francs [fifteen or seventeen shillings], at the present time.) During the time of this tariff appeared the following bull:—

1487 (27th April). Bull of extermination fulminated by Innocent VIII. (octo nocens, according to a saying of the time) against the Vaudois. The legate to whom the execution of these sanguinary orders was confided was Albertus Cattaneus Cremonensis (Albert Cattane of Cremona), often called De Capitaneis. The bull is dated by Innocent VIII., "On the 5th of the Calends of May, in the third year of our pontificate." It is to be found amongst the Vaudois MSS. of Dublin, Class C, Shelf IV., No. 18, vol. II. (vol. IX. of the MSS.), article 3. It is published entire by Léger, Part II., pp. 8-20; and by Hahn, p. 744. M. Bert, in his work I Valdesi, p. 438, gives an abridgment of it. Other documents which I have not had opportunity of consulting, but some of which most probably relate to the events of the same period, are also to be found in vol. IX. of the Dublin MSS. already mentioned.

APPENDIX, No. II.

NOTE ON THESE PASSAGES OF PART I., CHAP. IV. (Vol. i. p. 50), "The victorious Protestants incurred the guilt of bloody reprisals," AND (Vol. i. p. 51) "Cruelties and spoliations, unworthy of their name, were perpetrated by the Protestants."

The Catholic historians pretend that at Molines they buried the parish priest of that place alive, leaving only his head above ground, which they used as a mark for bowls, and that the priest of Reortier was rolled from the summit of the mountain in a cask filled with nails, &c. These atrocities, although very improbable, cannot be disproved. The first printed work in which they are mentioned is a publication of the year 1783, an anonymous History of the Diocese of Embrun. The author of this history was an abbé, named Albert. The occurrences which he relates took place two centuries before (from 1583 to 1586); he cannot, therefore, have received his information from an eye-witness, and where did he find any account of them? In an unpublished work of a Jesuit, entitled, A History of the Maritime or Cottian Alps, by Father M. Fournier, a voluminous manuscript, preserved in the library of Gap. To this manuscript Father Albert has been indebted for almost all that his book contains, as any one may easily be satisfied who will undertake a comparison of the two works; but the history of Father Fournier has been written without judgment, and is replete throughout with errors, now well known as such, so that I could not use it as an authority. Every one knows how readily false reports arise and spread in troublous times, how everything is exaggerated and perverted; the Jesuit may have admitted, without due examination, statements which perhaps were false; he lived, moreover, at a great distance from the valley of Molines. I could not reckon his testimony sufficient; but I had no other of earlier or of the same date by which it could be set aside, and impartiality required that I should make mention at least, in a general way, of the atrocities which he alleges to have been perpetrated.

Since the Israel of the Alps was published, I have, however, become acquainted with a testimony anterior to his, and that, too, of a Catholic, and of one living in the village of Molines itself, at the very time when these things are said to have taken place, which I think I may adduce as proving the falsehood of all the stories which he tells. A number of families in the high Alps were in the habit of keeping, under the title of Trançetons, which signifies a relation of strange or extraordinary events, a simple chronicle of the history of their locality. A chronicle of this kind, kept at Molines, from the year 1469 onwards, contains only the following particulars concerning the period to which our present inquiry relates:—"On the 8th of January, 1551, died M. Chaffre Gourdes, parish priest of Molines, who had held that office for thirty-two years. During this time, he caused the church to be rebuilt," &c. "In the year 1584, the Sieurs Constant Bonnet and Augustin Chabrans were consuls." After this there is no entry till 1590. But if the atrocities mentioned by the authors above cited, had taken place in 1586, the village chronicler could not have failed to have noticed them, as under date 1591 he notices the expedition of the Vaudois into Queyras, in these terms:—"On the 30th of March of this year, the Vandois came to La Monta and La Chalp, and after having pillaged all, they came to Ristolas, where they burned nine houses, and killed nine persons." And in the year 1555, he had already said that 400 Vaudois women from the valley of Lucerna, "sought refuge in this commune of Molines," &c.

The manuscript from which these extracts are made, is a folio, entitled, Livre de Mémoires par moy Chaffrey Roulph de Fougillarde, hamcau de la commune de Molines . . . tirés des trangetons les plus anciens que j'ai pu trouver. . ., &c. [Book of Memoirs, by me, Chaffrey Roulph of Fougillarde, a hamlet in the commune of Molines . . . derived from the most ancient trangetons which I have been able to find. . . , &c.] It is in the library of M. Aristide Albert, advocate in Grenoble, the author of a learned monograph on the Oisannais, &c.

APPENDIX, No. III.

JOURNAL OF A VAUDOIS OFFICER, CONCERNING THE MILITARY OPERATIONS WHICH FOLLOWED THE RETURN OF THE VAUDOIS TO THEIR OWN COUNTRY IN 1639, AND PARTICULARLY THE SIEGE OF THE BALSILLE IN 1690.

The work from which these extracts are made, is a quarto manuscript of seventy-two pages, written in a neat hand. On the margin of the first page is the following note:—"Mr. G. ROBERT, the author of this narrative, was afterwards a lieutenant in the service of the Republic [of Holland]. In the year 1716, he sent to me at Voorburg this narrative, written with his own hand."

Arnaud, in the enumeration which he gives of the Vaudois troops and their officers, says, that the troops from Pramol and St. Germain were placed under the command of Captain Robert. (Glorious Return, First Day, p. 46.) It is probable that Captain Robert was compelled to leave the Vaudois valleys in consequence of the new vexations to which their inhabitants were subjected in 1693, and that he repaired to Holland, and there followed the profession of arms. M. Clignet, postmaster at Leyden, of whom Arnaud speaks in his preface (p. 54) resigned his office in 1734, in favour of a person named Robert, of Neuville, who was his relative. Perhaps this relationship may have helped to attract the author of the following memoir to the United Provinces.

Our extracts begin at the moment when the expedition reaches the Vaudois country.

When we reached Pragela, M. Arnaud offered up a prayer full of thanksgiving, for the goodness of God to us in having enabled us to surmount all the difficulties which we had experienced on our way. We saw some cavalry on the heights above Fenestrelle, which had been detached in order to cut us off; but as soon as they perceived us in the valley, they withdrew. Fifteen or twenty young men of that valley joined us.

Having passed the night here, we set out next morning to enter the valley of St. Martin. Our route lay by the Col du Lis. This mountain makes the entrance to that valley very difficult. The first opposition which we met with there, was from a company of soldiers of the army of His Royal Highness; but after having rolled down some stones upon us as we approached, they fled. We pursued our way to the highest part of the mountain, where, unknown to us, the Marquis of Parele awaited our coming, at the head of 800 men. Besides that this number was superior to ours, they were so advantageously posted, that it would have been impossible for us to have forced the pass, if the heavens had not favoured us in the way which I am now to relate. The air was as calm and serene as possible, when suddenly there came on a mist, so thick that a man could scarcely be seen at the distance of a few paces. Thus it happened that one of our people, who was a short distance from the rest, came unexpectedly upon a sentinel. He became aware of this fact by hearing before he saw any one; but marching right up to the sentinel, until he almost touched him, he was addressed in the words, "Say who you are, or I will shoot you;" upon which, without any answer, he shot the sentinel dead. A tumultuous noise arising from the ranks of the soldiers when this first shot was heard, we fired in the direction of the sound, and without giving the enemy time to make any observation as to the amount of our force, we rushed forward, and they, who had not imagined that we were so near, fell into confusion, and fled. Ten or twelve of them, wandering in the mist, fell into our hands. These we put to death.

The mist not permitting us to pursue the enemy, our further gains consequent upon this exploit, were limited to the capture of a flock of sheep, which we found upon this mountain. We proposed to kill them at the village of Barsile, the first to which we came, and the prospect of such food was most acceptable to us, exhausted as we were in consequence of the great scarcity of provisions which we had experienced from the commencement of our expedition. But we had scarcely begun, when our sentinels descried the company of soldiers which has been already mentioned. They also perceived us; but supposing that it was the Marquis of Parele, they imprudently advanced with their handkerchiefs on the ends of their muskets, to signify that they were friends. We surrounded them on all sides, and they discovered their mistake, but rather too late, for it cost them their lives. It may seem that we dealt too severely with our enemies; but it ought to be borne in mind that we had no place in which to keep our prisoners, and that to have allowed them to escape, would have been in two ways destructive to us, by their again fighting against us, and still more by the information which they would have given as to our numbers, which were not known, and were supposed to be greater than they were. Above all, it should be considered that any of our people who were taken by the French, were either hanged or sent to the galleys, and we were firmly persuaded that the Savoyards would not treat us with greater favour.

After this success, all the Vaudois who were amongst us, wished to proceed at once to their own respective villages. But M. Arnaud represented to them so well the certain destruction which they would thus bring upon themselves, that they remained together.

We next went to Pras, where we found some Savoyards, who had come into the place of the Vaudois when they were expelled. The avidity with which they had come to seize on possessions which did not belong to them, cost them their lives. None of them were spared whom it was in our power to kill. We found there also a little Protestant place of worship, which the Savoyards had used for saying their mass. We threw down the altar and cast out the images. Here M. Arnaud preached his first sermon to us. His text was, "Our help is in the name of the Lord."¹

¹ Psal. cxxiv. 8.

After we had remained in this place for some time, it was resolved to go into the valley of Lucerna, as being more habitable than that of St. Martin. However, a troop of our people remained there until we should return. As we were on the way, two battalions of a regiment of guards of His Royal Highness awaited us on the Col Julian, and seemed determined to dispute our passage. But having put our forces in order, we attacked them with such success, that we compelled them to take to flight, and pursued them for a good hour to a position still more advantageous, called the Sere-de-Cruel. But in this new position they made even less resistance than in the former. They abandoned it to us at the first discharge, and passing through the village of Beubisout in haste, they beat a retreat, and at the same time abandoned to us a part of the valley of Lucerna. We then made our cantonment in the hamlet above Beubi, whence we afterwards sent out different detachments.

One of these having made an incursion into the valley of Cayras, we brought back from it a considerable booty of cattle. This enabled us to change our diet, for we had lived for many days upon nothing but chesnuts. The animal food coming after this, we had it for ten days without mixture of any other thing whatever. At the end of that time, there came to us some peasants of that valley, asking us to restore them a part of their cattle, and promising to pay us a certain sum agreed upon, and to furnish us with some salt and other things of which we had need. We were very glad of this interview, and hoped that we might in future have some intercourse with them; and it was very much on this account that we granted them their request, although, indeed, some such arrangement was very necessary for us. They demanded an escort to conduct them over the mountain, and to which they should give the things that had been agreed upon. We gave them a few men for this purpose; but instead of keeping their word with us, they brought the men into an ambuscade of a company of French soldiers. Our people discovered this just in time to throw themselves into a building of four stone walls which had served as a sheepfold, and which became a sort of rampart for them, in which they defended themselves like lions, till the captain who attacked them, enraged that four men should resist him so long, resolved to storm their fortress, and rushed on, sword in hand. But his boldness cost him his life, and the lives of some of the bravest of the soldiers who followed him. The rest, finding that only death-strokes were to be got by fighting with men thoroughly desperate, thought proper to retire. Our men then left the scene of combat unharmed. It may easily be conceived, that although those who had deceived us in this case had failed in their design, we did not like them the better upon that account, and did not omit the first proper occasion which presented itself of punishing them.

We sent another detachment to make an incursion into the valley of Angrogna. But the Marquis of Parelle had occupied a position which commands the entrance of the valley, and after a whole day spent in a combat of musketry, without our being able to force it, we were obliged to return without having gained anything by our enterprise.

On our way back, however, we attacked the garrison of Le Villars, and carried the outwork which defends the entrance of the place, whereupon the garrison threw themselves into the church, making use of it as their last entrenchment. To carry this stronghold, we rolled great casks before us, always advancing nearer; but when we were just near enough the gate and ready to enter, there came a detachment sent by the enemy from the town of Lucerna. As we were not strong enough to make head in two directions at once, we left the church to oppose the relieving party; and whilst we were engaged with them, the garrison in the church issued from it and fled. Upon this the detachment which came to their assistance also retired. Not being able to pursue them, and being unwilling that all our efforts should end in accomplishing nothing, we demolished the church. The enemy, however, being reinforced by a new detachment, returned to attack us. Being thus opposed by a force greater than our own, and feeling ourselves to be the weaker party, we retired with the loss of a few men killed and taken prisoners. M. Montoux, minister, was amongst the latter. The enemy, having set fire to the village, retired also.

Upon this, it was thought proper to form a little flying camp of ninety men to scour the valley and observe the enemy. Being near the fort of La Tour, we came upon two women who were gathering chesnuts, and to whom we did nothing except questioning them. On finding themselves at liberty, they went and gave information to the Marquis of Parelle of the place where we were and our supposed numbers. The marquis did not allow the opportunity to pass unimproved, but despatched a party during the night to form an ambuscade and surprise us. When the day broke, unarmed men were sent out, who made a pretence of gathering chesnuts. We, having perceived them without suspecting the artifice, ran after them to the place where the party in ambush arrested us by a discharge of musketry. We replied in a similar style. At the sound of the firing, one of our captains, who had come to the vicinity with the view of seizing some grain, attacked the enemy on another side, and we had begun to pursue them, when a double detachment of horse and foot came to reinforce them. The foot soldiers advanced to take possession of a height to which we might have retired, and the cavalry followed the course of a river, thinking to place us between the foot soldiers and themselves. But perceiving their design, we saved ourselves by running with all speed till we gained Le Villard. Deeming this position strong enough to arrest them, we barricaded a bridge which was there, and entrenched ourselves behind the walls of a garden which fronted the bridge. A portion of the enemy having pursued us, delayed to attack us, that they might give time to the other detachments to come up and take us in the rear. But discovering their scheme, we abandoned this post. We were pursued beyond Beubi, which is more than a league and a half from the place we were first attacked. They left a garrison at Beubi, and we rested at Serre-de-Crust, rather less than a quarter of an hour's march from that place.

All this trouble having been caused to us by those two women, and we considering that all with whom we had any intercourse must be proper objects of suspicion to us, as all conspired to seek our destruction, and moreover, that these people followed us in order to gather our chesnuts and grapes, which was to deprive us of the means of subsisting for any considerable time, it was resolved that, in future, no quarter should be given to any one.

The new garrison of Beubi was a great annoyance to us, as we could no longer move about with the same freedom as before. But we kept the garrison also very closely shut up, and no convoy could reach it without a strong escort. We occupied the heights in the neighbourhood, and as soon as we discovered a convoy, we were ready to fall upon it. We had always the heights to retreat to. The enemy placed a watch at the distance of a musket-shot from the gate of their garrison, and we surprised it during the night and put all who composed it to the sword except two, who escaped and carried the tidings to the garrison.

About this time a Vaudois named Gros, who had hitherto preferred his patrimony to his religion, came and joined us. But being unable to submit to the fatigue and hunger which we were obliged to endure, he took the first favourable opportunity of deserting us again; and having asked a cousin whom he had in our troop to accompany him a little way, he conducted him to the enemy. He played us another trick, which we discovered a few days after, on the death of a captain whose detachment we defeated. Those who killed him found in his pocket a memorandum of the places of concealment in which we had stored up the little provisions which we had. It was in the handwriting of Gros himself. Hereupon, having made a serjeant of the guards prisoner, we pretended to consider that Gros was a prisoner also, and proposed an exchange. He fell into the snare, thinking that he would find opportunities enough of escaping again. But being convicted by the memorandum in his own handwriting, and having no answer to make when he was asked for news of his cousin, he was immediately incapacitated for any further treachery.

There was yet another Vaudois who, being won over by the two capuchins and the Chevalier De Molte, whom we still kept prisoners, fled along with them.

The Savoyards at Roura thought themselves pretty secure, because of their greater distance from us, and of the garrisons which were between, but we came upon them by surprise. We killed all whom we could find of both sexes, carried off much cattle, and set fire to the village. We burned also every house in the neighbourhood where the enemy could find shelter; and they doing the same thing on their part, it was in a short time so completely done, that it would have been difficult to have found in the whole valley a roof under which to be protected from the rain.

His Royal Highness having sent three regiments to join the garrison of Beubi, they proceeded to attack us. It became necessary for us to beat a retreat, having first sent away forty cows and 800 sheep which we had on the mountain. But whilst we were retreating, a lamb fell behind on the way and its mother left the flock to seek it, whereupon she was followed by a second and that by a third; and so one after another all the sheep went over to the side of the enemy, who raised shouts of joy as if they had gained a battle. Having taken up a position at a place called Le Quille, we were there attacked by the enemy on more sides than one, but we repulsed them at all points; and they, having continued these assaults against us all day, retired in the evening. We, seeing no good prospect of being able to maintain our ground much longer in that valley, adopted the resolution of returning to the valley of St. Martin. Fifteen of our friends, however, spent the winter there, moving rapidly about amongst the rocks from one hole to another, and living on whatever they could contrive to get hold of. We passed the Col de Julian again, and went to Pras, where we found the troop still remaining which we had left there. They had found means to make some bread, and upon our arrival they shared it with us, of which we had much need.

After having reposed there for two days, we proceeded to seize the villages of Périer and Villesèche, which are situated at the entrance of that valley and at no great distance from Peyrouse and Pignerol. A small garrison which was in Périer retired at our approach. There we burned a monastery, and demolished it to the foundations. It was within that monastery, according to the Vaudois, that most of the woes inflicted upon them were devised. The vintage not having yet taken place, we replenished our cellars. We collected also a large quantity of chesnuts, with the design of drying them for winter use. Being near La Peyrouse, we attacked a post which was about a cannon-shot from it, and having driven out the French who occupied it, and killed some of them and taken others prisoners, we caused one of them to be hanged by his comrade in the sight of our enemies.

We had here too good a position for the French, with whom we had to do, to permit us long to occupy it. A great detachment was sent out from Pignerol and passed the Col du Pis, the highest mountain which bounds that valley. We encountered them, dividing our forces so as to meet them in each of the defiles by which they had to come. But being inferior to them in numbers, and being attacked in different parts at once, we were compelled to give way, but not until we had disputed, as well as we could, all the passes in which we could act against them with advantage. They set fire to every habitation which they found in their way, from the highest to the lowest part of the valley. They burned the chestnuts which we had laboriously collected, poured out our wine, and retired by Peyrouse. We returned to re-occupy our position, wasted by fire as the place was, and thence we continued to make our excursions. Being generally upon the heights, to see what could be seen, we one day descried three mules approaching, two of them laden with bread, and one with wine for a post in the neighbourhood, and conducted by two companies of Piedmontese. Upon this, a Vaudois captain, named Tron, exclaiming, "He that loves me, follow me," eighteen of us went with him in pursuit of the mules. We could not come up with them until they reached the post whither they were going, but the two companies abandoned it to us. Thus, we had bread and wine, which we carried off, after having killed the mules, for we could not bring them by the paths which we were accustomed to use. The chestnuts now began to fail, and we were at a loss to find anything on which to live. This was the reason that thirty French refugees, losing courage, resolved to return to Switzerland by the mountains of Dauphiny. But they had the misfortune to be taken by the French, who conducted them to Grenoble, where sentence was passed upon them, and some were hanged and others sent to the galleys. One of them was put to a cruel death for having assumed the title of Commandant, which, however, the Vaudois had not accorded to him. He was broken on the wheel. A dozen Vaudois, who also thought fit to leave us, were arrested as they were passing by the . . . They had chosen this route in the hope that, on account of the language, they might have less difficulty. His royal highness merely kept them prisoners.

The French being informed of our condition by those of our people whom they had taken prisoners, again sent out a great detachment to seize upon the villages of Périèr and Villesèche. They came again by the Col du Pis. Although we were only about 480 men, we did not hesitate to go to meet them. But not being sufficiently strong to occupy all the defiles, as would have been requisite, and fearing that we might be cut off, we retired after a few discharges. They thought to fortify themselves at Macel. But as this would entirely have cut off our communication with Pras and the valley of Lucerna, we took post on a height above the village, from which we fired upon them, so that they were obliged to retire.

They placed garrisons at Le Périèr, Villesèche, and Le Becet, by which we were so closely hemmed in, that we could no longer find anything on which to subsist. We spent some days to no purpose in moving about around their garrisons, thinking that some convoys would make their appearance. Three days having passed, during which we did not succeed in seizing anything, we were reduced to the necessity of feeding on the coarsest wild fruits which we found in the woods. One of our parties having gone in the direction of Angrogna, surprised a small body of the troops of his royal highness, who fled and abandoned their very camp, and thirteen mules which had brought them munitions of war. Our people killed the mules, set fire to the tents, and carried away some provisions which they found there.

We then resolved to seek a proper place to winter in. That which seemed to us the best, was a little hill at the base of the mountain of Le Clapié. It is called the Four Teeth [Les Quatre Dents.] I suppose it has received this name from its form; for this little hill has four points in the form of teeth, which served us for bastions and half-moons; the second commanding the first, and the last commanding all the rest. It is situated above the village of La Balsille. We there made some entrenchments and barracks, which we dug in the earth, in order to render them less subject to cold, covering them with hay, straw, or boards, as we could find materials for our purpose. Thirteen days were employed in this work, during which we had no food, except some coleworts and radishes, which we boiled without salt, fat, or butter. Often, indeed, we ate them without taking time to cook them.

We afterwards discovered a few houses on the mountain, which had escaped burning, with corn unthrashed, of which several barns were full. We carried it to our post. There were two mills in the neighbourhood, one at the distance of a musket-shot, and the other of half-an-hour's walking. But the millstones only were there without any machinery. We fitted them up again at the expense of two other mills which we plundered in Dauphiny, and we laboured so assiduously, that in a few days our mills began to yield us flour.

The enemy, contrary to their usual conduct, had given us time to accomplish all this, without incommoding us, till one morning they surprised those of our men who were at the mill farthest away, of whom they killed two and carried other two to Pignerol. When we heard the firing, we ran to the spot, but were not able to reach it soon enough; so that the enemy broke the millstones, and set fire to the building, after having thrown the corn and flour into the river. But we gave them something to do at the two most difficult parts of the way which lay between them and our stronghold, keeping them in check so long, that our people who were at the other mill had time to retire. This they did after taking away all the machinery and some boards which covered it. The whole place seemed nothing but a paltry ruin; for our people had also taken the precaution to cover the millstones with water. The French, arriving and seeing nothing but a ruin, planted themselves behind it to fire at us. There they remained till evening. And when they retired we convoyed their rear-guard with discharges of musketry, which were not all thrown away. They returned afterwards several times to attack us, but managing always in the same way, we preserved our mill during the whole winter. As we continued to make incursions into Dauphiny, the enemy being apprised that one of our detachments had gone towards Bouriet, sent a party from Villesèche to cut it off. But we seeing them, advanced to meet them. We found them just arrived at the base of the mountain. But as it was of importance to gain the height, by which our people must return to their own place, we climbed within pistol-shot of each other, without a musket being fired. We very soon, however, got before them, being better used to that sort of climbing than they were, and seized the pass. There they attacked us several times, but they were repulsed. In the evening, our people arrived, and we returned to our fort, and the French to their garrison.

There now took place so great a fall of snow, that it was almost impossible for us any longer to make incursions into Dauphiny. Moreover, there was no village on the frontier, when there were not now troops, and when we approached any of them, the enemy entrenched themselves in the churches, in which also they slept, so as to prevent us from taking them by surprise. Sometimes we made an attempt upon one village, sometimes upon another. When we arrived, we divided our force into two parts, the one half confronting the enemy, whilst the other entered the houses and loaded themselves with bread or flour. Those who had confronted the enemy, then became the rear-guard, and then we divided what we had got, which often was very little, among the whole detachment.

Towards the peasants of that region, we conducted ourselves in a very different way from that which we adopted towards the Savoyards. For we frequently paid for the victuals which we took, when no resistance was made to us. Whereupon, some of the people of the village of Bourcet came and offered them to us for payment. They added, that we must go to their village and take them. We sent eight of our men along with them, who, on arriving at the village, found themselves surrounded by soldiers; and the soldiers hastily firing on them, killed one of our captains. The rest found means of escaping. We soon punished this treachery, one of our detachments burning the village.

We afterwards made an expedition to . . . , passing by the Col du Pis. This mountain being very high, there was so much snow upon it, that for two leagues we found it in many places more than four feet deep. And as no previous parties of any kind had passed that way, we found it necessary to make a path for ourselves, which was not done without much labour. Arriving in the neighbourhood of the village during the night, we sent scouts to reconnoitre, who brought us word that the garrison was stronger than we, and entrenched in the church. We did not think our force sufficient to attack them; we therefore found ourselves obliged to return without doing anything, and without gaining anything by our toil but a great appetite. Many had brought no bread with them, some, because they had it not, and others, because they counted upon getting it; so that those who had a little were under the necessity of sharing it with their companions.

On our way back to our fort, we did not know what was to become of us. We were surrounded by mountains covered with snow, with enemies at the mouths of all the passes which led from them, and without any provisions. In this hard extremity, having no longer any help to expect from men, we lifted up our hearts and our hands to God, whose Providence and infinite goodness had already supplied our wants before we had even asked it. He had preserved a kind of manna in our frightful wilderness, by which we saw that he never utterly abandons those who have really put their trust in him. Thus it was. When we arrived in the valleys, there were some fields in elevated situations which had not yet been reaped, and the corn having been laid flat upon the ground by the rain, had been afterwards entirely covered with snow. All who are acquainted with that country, are aware that these heights are covered with snow during six months of the year. But by a special interposition of Providence, at the very time when we were at the point of perishing for hunger, there came a south wind and melted the snow which covered the corn, and had preserved it for us. Hereby we saw that God was always for us. This wind began in the month of January, and continued till the end of April. In this wonderful and peculiar manner we were supplied with bread all the time that we were shut in upon every side. The enemy also ceased to harass us, because the snow made the roads impracticable. And as they were not aware of the source from which our means of subsistence were derived, and had been informed that we were destitute of provisions, they thought themselves sure of having us without any risk.

Here I must not omit to state what our conduct was amongst ourselves. In general it was founded upon perfect mutual confidence. Therefore, whatever was done, and whatever happened, every one was contented. When the whole body went on any expedition, and left only a detachment to guard the stronghold, everything that we had was equally divided on their return. When a small party went out, the members of it were allowed to keep to themselves for their reward, whatever they might get. Our barracks contained each a company, which was as a family residing under the same roof. However, as there is a great depth of corruption in most men, there were some individuals of our body who did not do exactly as they ought. They had in some excursion made prize of a little money. But instead of making this known, they even denied it. Against this conduct our minister spoke very strongly in some sermons which he made upon the subject. He declared that those who kept the forbidden thing, put themselves in danger of the chastisements of God. Time shewed us how foolish it is to despise such warnings; for the most of these persons, and particularly those of them who were Vaudois, being tempted by their money to return to Switzerland, were taken on the way, as has been already related.

M. Arnaud preached three sermons to us every week, and conducted prayer twice every day, when the enemy left us at peace to meet for it. He led forth no detachment without having first implored the Divine aid, and when they had reached any place where they were to spend the night, they did not lie down nor rise up without engaging again in prayer. In our barracks, some of us read aloud one or more chapters at daybreak, a psalm or two were then sung, and this was followed by a prayer. This exercise was repeated three times a-day. Thus it was that our time was spent on that mountain. In spite of us, indeed, it was a Lent, kept with very meagre fare. We ate nothing for some months except bread made of the grain which Providence had led us to discover, as I have already mentioned. This bread was very brown, and had little substance in it. We had nothing to drink but water.

The month of April being come, we began to be released from winter bondage so as to be able to renew our excursions. Every one, as it may well be imagined, was anxious to see an end of our Lent. We sent out a detachment to try if anything could be got with which to keep Easter. It was necessary to march by night, to avoid being discovered by the French, for we passed very close by them. We passed over a mountain where there was still much snow, and were exposed all night to snow then falling. But notwithstanding all this, we arrived an hour before daybreak at a place half a quarter of a league from Pramort. There part of us awaited the dawn, and the rest went on to St. Germain. These two places, both in the valleys, were inhabited by Savoyards, who dwelt in great security, trusting to their garrison, and imagining, as others did, that we must all have died of famine in course of the winter. This being the case, they were, in no small degree, astonished when we burst into their villages, which was at daybreak, and just about the same time the garrison beat the alarm. We did not succeed in surprising the garrison, which fled by the one end of the village as we entered by the other. Not many, even of the peasants, lost their lives. After having collected together all the cattle, we set fire to the village. Whilst we were thus occupied at Pramort, our comrades were doing the like at St. Germain, and from these two places we carried off a considerable booty. Towards evening, the party from St. Germain rejoined us, and we re-passed the mountain. We thought to have kept the same road, under cover of the night, by which we had come. But the French having been apprised, posted themselves at a pass which we could not avoid, without retracing our steps. This, therefore, we were compelled to do; and, after having passed over the mountain, we were under the necessity of ascending it again on the other side.

We were so fatigued, and so overcome by sleep, that we flung ourselves down upon the snow to sleep. But the cold soon compelled us to rise, and when the one left us, the other laid hold of us. In this condition it was that we moved along the mountain side, not far from its summit, till we had reached the vicinity of our fort. In this counter-march we lost some of our cows, which, sliding and falling upon the frozen snow, were seized by the enemy, who followed closely on our track. It was the only advantage that they gained. We arrived happily at our fort, without any other loss.

In the beginning of May, the French came, in order, as they said, to exterminate us. They were 11,000 men, as we afterwards learned; and having made themselves masters of all the positions around our entrenchments, they remained there within pistol-shot. The sentries were obliged to keep themselves concealed, because there was a continual firing on the one side or the other. As their intention was to cut off all possibility of our escape, by occupying all the passes; they were obliged, for this purpose, to place some of their troops on the highest parts of the mountain, where there was a considerable quantity of snow, and where they had not even wood to make a fire. Besides which, all the time that they remained in our vicinity, snow, hail, or rain never ceased to fall; and, what was most remarkable, was, that every time they attacked us, the weather was almost the same, which made them say, that we had the command of the winds and of the rain.

All their precautions did not hinder one of our detachments from making a sortie by night, in order to annoy a regiment of dragoons, encamped on a wooded slope, above which was a great rock. There our people, having gathered a great quantity of large stones, and arranged them as well as they could on the edge of the rock, launched them all at once. As they fell, they set loose other stones, and all together came down with a terrible din upon the poor dragoons. The dragoons having been obliged to kindle fires upon account of the cold, the light of their fires enabled us, amidst the darkness of the night, to see burning billets thrown up as high as the tree-tops when the stones came in contact with them. We learned afterwards that many of the dragoons suffered upon this occasion. Those who were struck by the stones, escaped death only by the loss of a limb. Some were cut through the middle. When it was day, they placed a guard at the spot from which the evil had come upon them; our people, in the meantime, having left it as they went to it.

This regiment of dragoons was encamped by itself, apart from the rest of the enemy's troops, so that their provisions must of necessity be carried past our fort. They were carried past it only during the night. A corporal of our company, and three men with him, meeting this convoy upon one occasion as it passed, without regard to the number of the enemy, fired upon them, and each of our men killing his man, they seized what these men had carried, and each brought back to us a bag of bread, which served as a supply for us all. The corporal who performed this exploit, found himself seized by the collar when he had fired, but as he was stronger or more adroit than his adversary, he threw him down and killed him with his bayonet. The French being apprised of what was taking place by the noise that arose, and more perfectly by the fugitives, marched their piquet towards the scene of action. We descried them by the light of the moon, and saluted them with great discharges of musketry, upon which they made haste to get out of the way again.

We were at this time 370 men in all, divided into fourteen companies. Each company had its assigned post, more or less dangerous according to the strength of the company. There were two stationed at one point, which was the most exposed of all, but they did not amount together to more than ninety men. M. De La Parat, lieutenant-colonel of the regiment of Artois, having been commanded to carry this position by force, advanced at the head of 700 grenadiers, and taking advantage of a thick fog, he was not discovered till he was close to the sentry, who had scarcely time to cry "To arms." Our men, promptly seizing their arms, and rushing from their barracks, were the first to fire, and having discharged their pieces, they dashed forward sword in hand. This movement was executed so rapidly, and was attended with such success, that the enemy were seized with a panic and took to flight, and not knowing how to find the gorge by which they had come, many of them flung themselves headlong over the rocks. Besides these, however, seventy were left upon the ground where the action took place. M. De Parat being wounded in the thigh, we made him prisoner, along with two serjeants who were attempting to bear him off. There was also a captain of grenadiers found amongst the slain. Our people were in too great haste to take the spoils of the slain; had this not been the case, only a very small number of the enemy would have escaped, unequal as was the force opposed to them. We saw their extreme disorder without being able to aid our comrades, because the French were within a short distance of all our posts, and would not have failed to embrace the opportunity of entering if we had left any of them unguarded. The most remarkable thing in this action was that none of our people received any injury, except one man whose musket burst and slightly wounded him in the hand. This was all that we suffered from an army which ought to have exterminated us at once. And, indeed, it was not their fault that they did not. They had the best possible intention of doing so, but God being for us, all their efforts were necessarily fruitless, and turned to their own disadvantage. Behold another manifest proof of this.

We had neglected a place where the hill sloped suddenly away from the very centre of our fort, because of the extreme difficulty of ascending there. The French, perceiving this, caused a detachment to advance upon this point, whilst M. Parat made his assault. This design succeeded so well, that they had reached the base of a poor entrenchment of dry stones which we had made there. There was no guard there, for the reason which I have already stated; and they were on the point of entering, when a woman prevented them. She had gone for water and was returning by this place, and perceiving the enemy, she began to roll down the stones of the fortification upon them. They had no opportunity of firing at her; and she ceased not from her efforts till they were constrained to retire, which was very soon the case, as they were upon a very steep slope, where the stones that were thrown down produced an extraordinary effect.

But for this opposition which Providence seemed to have prepared against the enemy, there can be no doubt that we were in great danger of utter destruction. The good woman to whom, under God, our preservation was to be ascribed, was a Savoyard, whom we had found in the country, and who had always followed us, taking great care of our wounded. We became the objects of this affection to her, because she embraced our religion.

About an hour before the enemy attacked us, we had sung, at the post where my company was stationed, the sixty-eighth psalm, which the enemy might well enough hear. When we brought in the lieutenant-colonel, he told us that when he was ordered upon that duty, and had made himself acquainted with the place, he had sworn an oath that he would sleep that night in our barracks. But he did not think that it was to be as a prisoner. Next day, our people cut off the heads of all the dead, and fixed them upon the points of the palisades where they had entered. This was done in sight of the enemy. They sent us a surgeon to heal M. De La Parat, with a ridiculous stipulation, that we were to get no benefit of his medicines. However, we paid no attention to this, but kept them carefully because we had none ourselves. And here I ought to mention that after we lost our own, we had nothing to apply to our wounds, but a composition which the Vaudois make, and of which human fat is an ingredient. Every kind of sore was bathed, not with spirits, but with cold water. Notwithstanding all this, almost none died. So true it is that he whom God keeps is well kept.

The enemy having intimated to us that they would give us what ransom we wished for the lieutenant-colonel, we replied that we could not think of selling the blood of our brethren, and that if they would give us prisoners in exchange, we would be very happy to give him into their hands. But they would do nothing. We said to them that they could not wonder if we made reprisals. Our mode of proceeding seemed very strange to them, and great exaggerations were published by them on this subject, as that when we took prisoners we put them to cruel deaths, flaying them alive, or subjecting them to other torments equally terrible. I was present when the greatest numbers of prisoners were taken, and can protest that I never saw anything of the kind; and that when the prisoners were put to death, it was from mere necessity, because of the injury which we might have sustained from letting them escape, or to try if there was no way of putting a stop to that barbarity which the enemy had always shown, both in this war and the preceding ones, sparing neither men, women, nor children. The story current amongst the enemy that we flayed the prisoners alive, may have arisen from the circumstance already mentioned, that the Vaudois made use of human fat in preparing a salve for wounds. When, therefore, they found a fat corpse, they opened it to take out the fat, and the enemy, finding the bodies in this condition, were apt to imagine what I have above stated, their own treatment of us tending to confirm them in such an opinion. But this error was advantageous to us: for they conceived at last a notion of this thing so terrible, that they no sooner saw us appear than they became completely panic-stricken. The following circumstance I saw with my own eyes, and could not have well believed it otherwise. Two of our people, creeping along to surprise an advanced sentry of that regiment of dragoons which I have already had occasion to mention, and being discovered, the regiment quitted its post and ascended a height, from which they began to roll down stones upon the two men.

The enemy, seeing how little success had attended all their enterprises, and distressed by the continual snow and hail, were compelled to decamp. As this movement took place entirely under our eyes, we waited until they had all defiled, to make an attack upon them, which we did at the descent of a hill. They did not perceive us till we were upon them. They fell into confusion and fled, without having time even to form a rear-guard. We pursued them for a league and a half, firing upon them continually, whilst they never fired a single shot. The most remarkable thing was, that the weather became fine as soon as they were gone.

It was not long, however, till they came back, with a reinforcement of 3000 men of the troops of his royal highness, making, with the French troops, a total of 13,000 men. They brought with them two cannons, and with great difficulty dragged them to a height from which they might act against our fortifications. As we had always a detachment out somewhere, and it so happened that we had then one of forty men in Pragela, we numbered in fact only 330 men. They invested us again on all sides. They then sent several communications to us, promising to give us good terms if we would surrender, but declaring that if we waited till the first cannon was fired we should have no quarter. We having rejected this proposal, they afterwards added, that if we would retire into Switzerland they would send hostages whom the Swiss should keep till we were all arrived there, and that the king would give each of us 900 louis d'or. As these were mere Machiavellian proposals, the whole object of which was that they might have us without peril to themselves, we replied that they must fire their cannon and we would find means to answer them. They again demanded the lieutenant-colonel, offering us whatever money we might wish for his ransom. We made them the same answer as before, that we wished only to get other prisoners in exchange; and at the same time we gave orders to the man who kept ward over him, to kill him in the event of our fort being stormed, which he did. We also intimated to the enemy that we wished to have no more conferences with them. They continued, however, whilst they laboured at their battery, to call to us very often through a speaking trumpet, to surrender before the cannon began to fire, if we would save our lives, to which we replied only by discharging our muskets.

The battery having begun to fire, made terrible havoc of our entrenchments, which consisted only of dry stones, and it became impossible to remain behind them. A sufficient breach having been made, the enemy divided themselves into several bodies, in order to attack us on all sides. We were thus obliged to retire to our innermost stronghold; and to do this we were under the necessity of exposing ourselves to the fire of more than 3000 men, who kept up an incessant fire on the points against which they had been led, whilst the rest pursued us. Yet we had none killed, although many were wounded. Being no longer able either to advance or retreat, we arrested the enemy by musket shots, and by rolling down stones upon them. However, we could not have continued our resistance much longer, if the night had not come on, when the enemy relaxed their efforts; but keeping us shut in upon all sides, and doubling their guard, which was now limited to a much narrower space than before, they had no thought that we could escape from them. Thus were we reduced to a most deplorable condition, and to all appearance it was a thousand to one that we should all perish. But God yet once more displayed his power in our behalf, employing as his instrument for our deliverance an old Vaudois captain called A'Polet. This good man, who had been a great hunter of roebucks, and knew all the paths, encouraged us, and promised that with the help of God he would extricate us from the midst of our enemies. As the first step towards the execution of his plan, we kindled a number of fires, as if we had intended to pass the night where we were. Then we moved off in single file, each man holding by the coat of the man before him, for the night was so dark that if any one let go the coat of his comrade, it was necessary to cause the head of the file to halt. We were often compelled to hold by the brambles and bushes to keep ourselves from falling down the steep. Besides all the other risks which we ran, we passed close by several of the enemies' posts, so near, that to avoid being heard, we all put off our shoes. At last, after having marched all night, with extreme toil and incredible danger, we found ourselves at daybreak out of danger. Of course the enemy did not fail to attack our fortress, as they were commanded, and it is easy to imagine how great must have been their surprise. The greater part of them believed that our minister was a magician, and that he had transported us from thence in the clouds. We continued to march all day without finding anything to eat. Next day we arrived at Rodoré, where we found herbs beginning to grow in some of the meadows, and halted to gather them; but as we were going to cook them, the enemy, who had come by a shorter road in order to cut us off, appearing at hand, we were compelled to decamp in haste. We did not fail, however, to carry with us our pots, and some as they ran ate the half-cooked vegetables without any seasoning. We succeeded in increasing our distance from the French on paths which we knew much better than they. And having passed over the mountain, we arrived at Pramort, where there were four companies of Piedmontese. On our arrival, two of them threw themselves into a church, and the other two into a house. There we besieged them, and some of our people having found means of mounting on the roof of the house, made an opening in it by which we entered and were hand to hand with these two companies. We gave quarter for the first time to a captain, two lieutenants, and a surgeon. We would have dealt as tenderly with the other captain, but he was too aged to be able to follow us, which cost him his life. As for the soldiers who were in the church, we had already applied fire to the door, which was burning satisfactorily, when the French made their appearance, and we were obliged to relinquish this enterprise. Having sent our prisoners on before us, and also some cows which we had found at this place, under the care of our wounded men, we amused the enemy for some time until they should reach a sufficient distance; after which we retired to a place called Les Clots, a narrow pass at the base of a mountain bordering on the valley of Lucerna.

When we were established in this stronghold, his royal highness sent us word by a special messenger, that he had entered into the grand alliance with England and Holland, and that he would soon give us proof of it. But seeing his troops acting against us in conjunction with those of the French, we supposed that this was merely a snare to entrap us, and accordingly this message produced no further effect. But whilst we were still in the same place, another message came to us to the same purpose, with the addition, that to prove the truth of it, we had only to fix a place where as much bread would be brought to us as we had need of. We fixed a place, and took all possible precautions against being surprised, if there should be any design of the kind. Finding that the promise which had been made to us was kept, we took as much bread as we could carry, and returned to the place from which we had come. On this and the cows which we had brought from Pramort, we were able to subsist for some days.

The French did not now know where we were, till they were conducted to the spot by one of our detachments, which having attacked them, and having been repulsed, was pursued by the enemy to our very hold. This led us to send away our wounded men and our prisoners, with the surgeon, who had been sent for M. de Parat, into a hole of the rock upon the mountain.

The enemy having sent out a number of detachments with a view to cut us off, we did as much in the same way on our part against them as the disproportion of our forces would permit. We anticipated the design of a party of forty grenadiers, which was marching to intercept our passage by the summit of the mountain, and intercepted theirs. After we had thrown them into disorder, eighteen of our number pursued them, sword in hand, for half a league, till they reached their reserve, with which they took shelter. M. De Clerembeau was not more fortunate. For, having ascended in another place with a large detachment, he was attacked by our people, and so roughly handled, that such of his men as escaped slid down the mountain in a sitting posture to the base. The snow being frozen, was in excellent condition for such an amusement. But, unfortunately, these fugitives came upon the place where our wounded men were, who, not being in general so severely wounded that they could do nothing to preserve themselves from capture, all contrived to make their escape except two. These two were captured, and the surgeon was recaptured, and the two Piedmontese officers set at liberty. Our two wounded men were tied together by the neck, and so conducted, thinking that it would have been an act of kindness to have killed them on the spot, and their lives were prolonged only that they might die in public. Having passed through the valley of Lucerna, and arrived at Villarod, which was in their path, they thought it desirable to have some refreshment. There was there a Vaudois captain, with a detachment, who, having abjured his religion, had entered into the service of his royal highness. M. De Clerembeau, not knowing that his royal highness had entered into the grand alliance, asked the captain if he would have the goodness to give some refreshment to the remains of his detachment, which had escaped from the fury of the barbas, saying that they had had almost nothing to eat for some days. The Vaudois captain affected to sympathize very deeply in his misfortunes, and said that nothing could be more reasonable than his request; that he would go to give orders about everything, and that in the meantime he must cause his men to lay down their arms and go into a house where he would see that everything that was necessary should be brought to them. All this being done as the captain desired, he caused his own detachment, whom he had close at hand, to seize the arms of the enemy, after which he told M. De Clerembeau that he arrested him and all his men, in the name of his royal highness. This was cause of no little surprise, but at the same time of very great joy to our two wounded men, whom the captain ordered to be set at liberty. Those of our people who had so severely handled this detachment, returned to us laden with their spoils.

All this did not prevent the French from finding means of hemming us in. We were compelled to fight every day, and often in such close combat, that not having time to charge our muskets without giving our enemies opportunity of rushing upon us, we made good use of part of the weapons with which David slew Goliath, and drove them back with stones. At this crisis, his royal highness again sent a messenger to tell us to take courage, and that if we could contrive to get out of the dangerous place in which we were, and would come into the valley of Lucerna, we would find plenty of provisions for our use. He knew our malady; for hunger was the worst enemy with which we had to contend. He added also, that he had a regiment of French refugees on the march to join us. It was the regiment of Loche. All this gave us so much the more pleasure, because till this time we had still feared that his royal highness was against us. This good news being soon diffused, the courage of our men at all our posts was redoubled, and that very evening we found means of making our escape.

We reached Beubi, where the garrison had orders from his royal highness to yield that post to us, and to leave us some flour and some wine which they had. This order was executed even before our arrival, for they got out of our way with as much haste, as if we had still been enemies. We, for our part, carried what we found there to a height at a small distance, where we resolved to remain until we should have a perfect certainty of the alliance of which we were still in doubt. But to put an end to all our suspicions, his royal highness sent us some convoys of ammunition and provisions, and caused those of our people that had been taken prisoners to be restored to us. The detachment which had gone to Pragela, before we were besieged in our fort, rejoined us now, and we received confirmation on all hands of the news that his royal highness was really our ally. Our wounded men, who had been dispersed by the fugitives of M. De Clerembeau's detachment, also returned. There was one of them who having wandered among the mountains and having nothing to eat, killed a young wolf which he came upon, and subsisted for some days upon its raw flesh. He rejoined us about the end of this time, his wound being healed, for which he had never done anything except to wash it with fresh water, which served him instead of spirits, and balsam.

Shortly after this, his royal highness sent the Chevalier Verecil to take command of us . . . , &c.

The remainder of the memoir is chiefly filled with particulars already known, and which are related in the Israel of the Alps.

APPENDIX No. IV.

NOTE, BY THE TRANSLATOR, ON THE PRESENT STATE OF THE CONTROVERSY RESPECTING THE ORIGIN OF THE VAUDOIS.

It is my wish merely to present, in the following pages, such a view as the necessary limits will admit, of the opinions and arguments which have been advanced by two or three of the authors who have taken the most prominent part in this controversy, and whose works appear most deserving of attention. The temptation to enter into the discussion of the subject, will, as far as possible, be resisted; but I do not hold myself bound to abstain from the expression of opinion or the indication of an objection to an argument.

Were I to enter into the discussion of the important subject to which this Appendix relates, I would arrange my observations according to the parts of that subject. But my present intention will perhaps be better accomplished, consistently with the narrow limits to which I must confine myself, by a different mode of procedure. I propose, therefore, to exhibit a concise analysis of a few of the most important recent works upon this subject, in the order of their publication. The first of these, and the only one which I shall notice of which the author belongs to the Church of Rome, is the work anonymously published in 1836, but afterwards acknowledged by M. CHARVAZ, then Bishop of Pignerol, "RECHERCHES HISTORIQUES SUR LA VÉRITABLE ORIGINE DES VAUDOIS ET SUR LA CARACTÈRE DE LEURS DOCTRINES PRIMITIVES," an octavo volume of considerable thickness.¹

M. Charvaz begins by assuming that Bossuet did not feel it to be necessary to discuss the question of the origin of the Vaudois in his History of the Variations of Protestantism, because most of the writers of his own and of preceding times held the same opinion upon that subject with himself.¹ Yet afterwards, apparently unconscious of the inconsistency, he refers the opposite opinion to the period of the Reformation, and to the dishonesty both of the Vaudois and the Reformers, whom he represents as more anxious to establish an apparent apostolic descent, than scrupulous about the means of accomplishing it.² In addressing himself to his task of proving that the Vaudois had no existence prior to the latter part of the twelfth century, M. Charvaz singles out two advocates of the opposite opinion, against whom more especially to contend with the weapons of argument, sarcasm, and ridicule. These are two Vaudois ministers, M. Brez, the author of a History of the Vaudois, published in Paris in 1796;³ and M. Muston, now the author of the Israel of the Alps, but who had then only given to the world the first volume of a History of the Vaudois on a different plan,⁴ upon account of which he was banished from the land of his fathers, and separated from his friends and from his flock.

¹ See the "Bibliography," pp 411 and 412 of the present volume.

It may be noticed in passing, that M. Charvaz descants not a little upon the uncharitable spirit displayed, as he thinks, by these writers, and by the whole class to which they belong, in the use of such expressions as atrocities, ferocious fanaticism, and the monstrous tyranny of Rome. He wonders at their want of gentleness, but ascribes it to their religion!⁵ His own gentleness and charity prevent him from giving utterance to any severe censure of the deeds which have formed, as he says, "the text for the outrageous declamations of the Vaudois historians." He describes only the declamations as outrageous [bloody];⁶ he applies no such epithet to the deeds. Thus he affords an illustration of a kind of charity very peculiar, but sufficiently familiar to those who have read much in the writings of the controversialists of Rome. That the treatment to which the Vaudois were subjected, can be appropriately characterized in language less severe than that which Protestant historians have employed, M. Charvaz does not think it necessary even to attempt to show. But he would fain relieve his church from the blame, if the deeds are blameworthy; and whereas the want of gentleness and charity seems at first to be in the mere use of the severe condemnatory language, it by-and-by seems rather to be in the application of that language to the Church of Rome, to which the events which are the text of the outrageous declamations ought by no means to be ascribed. No, the Vaudois were never persecuted on account of their religion; they suffered only as rebels against the state!⁷ The effrontery with which such an assertion is hazarded, can only be excelled by the parade of charity with which it is accompanied. And when we find M. Charvaz charging Vaudois authors with dishonesty in the use of documents, or seeming to establish a point by quotations from authors not easily accessible for verification, it is right to bear in mind not only the common tricks of the apologists of Rome, with whom dishonest quotation is habitual, but also how, in this instance, he shows himself capable of misrepresenting the surest and plainest facts of history.

For sources of true information respecting the Vaudois, M. Charvaz refuses the Vaudois historians, because (he says it with pain!) they are not to be trusted; they abound in falsehoods and contradictions.⁸ And in support of his strong statements upon this point, he quotes a letter of Morland, which is nothing to the purpose. Morland complains of the difficulty which he finds in obtaining exact information concerning the events of a period of war and trouble, and that

¹ Avant-propos, p. ii.

³ See "Bibliography," in the present volume, pp. 408, 409.

⁶ Avant-propos, p. x. ⁶ Sanglantes. ⁷ Avant-propos, p. xi.

² P. 96, et seq.

⁴ Ibid. p. 405.

⁸ P. 19.

the published narratives are inaccurate in many things. And this M. Charvaz is pleased to accept as a proof not only of the unfaithfulness of the Vaudois pastors, by whom some of these narratives were written, but of Vaudois authors in general. Had not this conclusion been one which it suited his purpose to draw, M. Charvaz would have easily found many reasons for inaccuracy of details in the contemporary narratives of a time of trouble, quite consistent with truthfulness, and would have seen the folly of extending an inference from a few such narratives to all the writings of Vaudois pastors.

He has yet another reason for refusing to admit the Vaudois historians as authorities in the earlier periods of Vaudois history: they do not write the history of the sect of Valdo, but that of an imaginary sect which nobody ever knew anything about till they proclaimed it. But this is so manifestly the very question at issue, that it is hard to imagine how even a Popish controversialist could venture to introduce it, at the outset, as a reason for his choice of authorities.

Prevented, by these strong reasons, from giving any heed to Vaudois evidence, M. Charvaz has recourse to the evidence of old authors who have written concerning the Vaudois sect. That the evidence thus obtained may be a little one-sided, does not appear to occur to him as any objection to its absolute sufficiency. His mode of procedure, in these historic researches, is to fling aside at once all that comes from a Vaudois source, and to receive with full confidence all that is said of the Vaudois by their adversaries.

No fact, he says, is more clearly established by contemporary evidence, or unites more perfectly all the characteristics of historic certainty, than that the Vaudois were regarded as a sect of quite recent origin at the beginning of the thirteenth century, and that they first made their appearance in the latter half of the twelfth.¹ The first witness whom he adduces is Bernard, abbot of Foncauld, who, in the end of the twelfth century, wrote a Treatise against the Vaudois.² He rests much upon the fact, that this author designates the Vaudois as new heretics, who suddenly made their appearance in the time of Pope Lucius (Lucius III., 1181-85), and were condemned by that pope, and by the Bishop of Narbonne; and he argues that even if some years elapsed between the first promulgation of their errors and the condemnation of them, these heretics must be held not to have appeared till towards the end or within the second half of the twelfth century.³ But he forgets that if the existence of the Vaudois in the earlier part of the second half of the twelfth century can be proved, it is as fatal to the supposition that they derived their doctrines and their name from Valdo, as if they were proved to have maintained the same doctrines and borne the same name in the previous century: for it was not till 1173 that, according to the Chronicle of Laon, Valdo began to devote himself to a life of piety and evangelistic zeal; it was not till 1178 that he went to Rome to lay before Pope Alexander III. his scheme of a religious fraternity, and it was shortly after this year that he became the object of dislike on the part of the bishops and clergy, and that he and his disciples incurred ecclesiastical censures, and finally excommunication, which was confirmed by Pope Lucius in 1184.⁴ Moreover, the words of Bernard of Foncauld, "Subitò extulerunt caput novi heretici," do not very clearly declare that the heresy originated at the time of which he speaks, but may signify no more than that these heretics then, for the first time,

¹ P. 33.

² See the Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 18, note, and the "Bibliography," in the present volume, p. 414.

³ Pp. 33-38.

⁴ See Gilly, article "Valdo," in the seventh edition of Encyclopedia Britannica.

attracted attention by new efforts for the promulgation of their opinions. And if the words were more precise, yet they could not well be admitted as proving more than that Bernard, his perfect truthfulness being taken for granted, was not aware of the previous existence of the sect. His evidence on this point cannot well be regarded as more than merely negative, seeing that he does not declare the connection between the Vaudois and Valdo, but gives another derivation of the name of the Vaudois, "Nimirum a valle densâ."¹ However, this derivation may be regarded as merely a jest upon the part of the old abbot;² yet his omission of all mention of Valdo is not only important, as rendering his evidence concerning the novelty of the sect merely negative, but also as showing either that he was very imperfectly informed concerning the subject of which he wrote, or that the connection between Valdo and the Vaudois was much less intimate than even Vaudois and Protestant historians are accustomed to represent it. The testimony of this witness, viewed as a whole, is certainly not favourable to the case, in support of which M. Charvaz has called him.

The second witness whom he adduces is Alain de l'Isle (Alanus Magnus de Insulis),³ a celebrated professor of theology in the university of Paris, towards the end of the twelfth century. This author certainly says that the Vaudois derive their name from their heresiarch Valdo,⁴ but his distant residence renders his testimony on such a point of little value,⁵ whilst his spirit is displayed in bitter and ridiculous declamations against Valdo and his disciples. Moreover, he speaks of the new heretics of his time as the promulgators both of new and old heresies, "Imò veteribus et novissimis heresibus debacchantes." But that the "heresies" of the Vaudois were more ancient than the days of Valdo, is the very point with reference to which the question of the origin of the name is of importance.

M. Charvaz next quotes from Eberard of Béthune,⁶ but to what purpose does not appear, as Eberard never mentions Valdo, and, like Bernard of Foncald, gives a derivation of the name Vallenses from vallis,⁷ making the supposition not improbable⁸ that he wrote before Valdo had done anything to attract notice. Peter of Vaucernay, whom M. Charvaz next adduces,⁹ and whose history of the Albigenses was probably written in 1212, certainly derives the name of the Vaudois from Valdo, but his whole account of them is such as may be supposed to have been written by a credulous and bigoted monk, but could never have proceeded from the pen of a well-informed and trustworthy historian. As to the inhabitants of the Alpine valleys, Peter of Vaucernay might very probably know little about them; and even as to the Albigenses, the main subject of his history, he relates things utterly absurd and incredible.¹⁰

After these witnesses, M. Charvaz brings forward, with no little parade, ¹ See Israel of the Alps, vol. i. pp. 13, 14, and notes there.

² His words are, "Qui quodam presagio futurorum sortiti vocabulum, dicti sunt Vallenses; nimirum a valle densâ; eo quod profundis et densis errorum tenebris involvantur." The passage is given by Charvaz in his Appendix.

³ See "Bibliography," in this volume, p. 413.

⁴ "Illi Valdenses dicuntur a suo heresiarchâ qui vocabatur Valdis."

⁵ It is perhaps worthy of notice, as bearing on the value of the testimony of Alanus Magnus, "the universal doctor," that he records the familiar appearance of Satan to the Albigenses in the form of a great cat. (See Faber, Vallenses and Albigenses, pp. 253 and 255.)

⁶ P. 40, &c. See Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 18, note, and p. 413 of the present volume.

⁷ "Quidam autem qui Vallenses se appellant, eo quod in valle lacrymarum maneant, Apostolos habentes in derisum," &c.

⁸ See Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 18, note.

⁹ P. 42, &c.

¹⁰ See Faber, Inquiry into the History and Theology of the Ancient Vallenses and Albigenses, p. 255, note.

"one who, of all that were contemporary, or nearly contemporary, with Valdo, has recorded, with the greatest minuteness and precision, everything relative to the time, the place, and other circumstances, of the appearance of this sect."¹ This important witness is Stephen of Belleville, or of Borbone,² who certainly gives a sufficiently minute and circumstantial account of the commencement of Valdo's evangelistic labours, and declares him to have been the first author of the heresy of the Vaudois ("Valdensis autem dicti sunt à primo hujus hæresis auctore, qui nominatus fuit Waldensis"). The passage quoted from this author, M. Charvaz thinks, leaves nothing to be desired, the evidence which it contains is so conclusive as to the origin of the Vaudois heresy. Father Stephen, however, was not quite a contemporary of Valdo; the date assigned by M. Charvaz, for his having already acquired a great reputation by the exercise of his ministry at Lyons, is 1223, fully thirty years after the events which he relates; and whilst allowance ought certainly to be made for the influence on his mind and narrative of the prejudices of his class, it seems worthy of notice, that he calls the Lyonese reformer not Valdo, but Waldensis, or Valdensis, which seems an appellative, and as such needs to be accounted for; and also that he speaks of Valdo's followers, the Poor Men of Lyons, as having joined with other heretics of Provence and Lombardy, whose errors they adopted and propagated. ("Postea in Provinciæ terrâ et Lombardiæ cum aliis hæreticis se admiscentes, et errorem eorum bibentes et serentes.") M. Charvaz thinks himself entitled to ridicule M. Muston for assuming, as he says (in his first work), that these pre-existing heretics, of Provence and Lombardy, were the Vaudois of Piedmont. But the proof that the Vaudois doctrines existed in Lombardy and Piedmont before Valdo's time, is as complete as M. Charvaz's own witness can make it.

His next witness, whom he thinks as good as those already adduced, is Father Moneta, "a celebrated professor of philosophy, in the university of Bologna,"³ to whose work he assigns the date 1244, and who speaks of the Vaudois heresy having originated with Valdo about eighty years before—"Non sunt plures quam octoginta anni, vel si plures aut pauciores, parum plures vel pauciores existunt"). This statement Moneta makes for the purpose of arguing that the Vaudois cannot be the church of God—"Ergo non sunt successores Ecclesiæ primitivæ; ergo non sunt Ecclesia Dei"). "But if the Vaudois assert that their way existed before Valdo, let them prove it by some evidence," says Father Moneta, "which," he adds, "they can by no means do."⁴ Father Moneta may not be a very good witness to prove that the Vaudois originated from Valdo, although, certainly, a very willing one; but he is not a bad witness to prove that in his day already the Vaudois represented themselves as having existed before Valdo, so that this is not, as is sometimes alleged by Popish writers, a novel claim of comparatively recent times.

M. Charvaz's next witness is Reynerus Saccho,⁵ who, having been for some time a Vaudois minister, became a Popish priest and inquisitor of the province of Lombardy. These circumstances, M. Charvaz thinks, entitle him to the highest possible credit; and a passage in which he declares the Leonists, or Poor Men of Lyons, to have originated from Valdo, is vauntingly adduced as decisive; and because it is so decisive concerning the origin of the Vaudois, the Vaudois authors, M. Charvaz says, have not ventured to quote it! It is not necessary to follow him into any question concerning the identity of the Vaudois and the Poor Men of Lyons. Admitting all that he asserts on this point, the testimony of his witness, Reynerus, on the question of the relation of the Vaudois to Valdo, is manifestly worthless.

¹ P. 43.² See p. 414 of this volume.³ Ibid.⁴ See Charvaz, pp. 49-52, and Appendix, p. 457.⁵ See p. 412 of this volume.

Not much more to the purpose is that of Peter de Polichdorf,¹ whom he next quotes, and who, he says, "lived, according to Basnage, towards the middle of the thirteenth century, and must have been perfectly acquainted with the Vaudois."² Incidentally, however, it appears from the passage which M. Charvaz quotes from Polichdorf, that the Vaudois of his day by no means recognized Valdo as the founder of their sect, and on this point his testimony is liable to no suspicion. He is very angry with these "sons of iniquity," for referring their separate ecclesiastical existence to the time of Pope Sylvester, when they represented the Roman church as having become corrupt by the acquirement of temporal possessions—"Ortus et origo Waldensium hæreticorum talis est: licet iniquitatis filii coram simplicibus mentiantur, dicentes sectam eorum durasse a temporibus Sylvestri papæ").³ That Polichdorf makes such mistakes in matters of fact, as to make the author of the Vaudois heresy a rich citizen of *Walden*⁴ instead of Lyons, and to give the time of Pope Innocent II., who died in 1143, as that in which his heresy originated, does not seem to M. Charvaz a reason for doubting his evidence concerning the connection of the Vaudois with Valdo. These are mere errors in matters of detail,⁵ he says, and easily accounted for, by considering that Polichdorf was a German, and somewhat more remote than the previous witnesses from the scene of the events. With still greater absurdity, if possible, M. Charvaz goes on to quote a fragment of uncertain authorship, sometimes ascribed to Polichdorf, from which he tries to make it appear that the Vaudois of Polichdorf's time were accustomed to mention more than one date of their origin, and more than one founder of their sect; that if their fiction (mensonge) regarding the times of Pope Sylvester were not credited, they might, at least, get credit for having existed from the time of Valdo. The probability that his author may have blundered in some of these matters of detail, does not occur to M. Charvaz.

And now he proceeds to adduce his last witness, an anonymous author, by some supposed to have been Ivonetus,⁶ but of whom he does not himself pretend to fix the precise date, and who, after all, only says that the Poor Men of Lyons derived their origin from Valdo (Valdensis). He thinks it unnecessary to go farther in the way of quotation, because "the depositions of witnesses, posterior to those who have been cited, could add nothing to their authority." He might have made the same reflection rather sooner; but with prodigious complacency, he tells us that these "contemporary, or almost contemporary" authors whom he has quoted, must be the source and authority of all history upon this subject.⁷ Let the reader look again to the dates of the contemporary, or almost contemporary authors, and compare them with the date of Valdo's labours. And let the character and prejudices of the witnesses be duly taken into account, that it may be seen whether M. Charvaz has established the point with regard to which they were adduced. A very little inquiry into the stories told concerning the heretics of these ages, by contemporary or almost contemporary monks and priests, is enough to deprive their testimonies of much value, even as to those things which they might have known with greatest certainty.⁸

M. Charvaz now takes up a new branch of his argument. He undertakes to

¹ See p. 413 of this volume.

² Charvaz, p. 62.

³ Charvaz, Appendix, p. 460.

⁴ "Que in finibus Franciæ sita est," says he; but the site of Walden has never been discovered.

⁵ Charvaz, p. 65.

⁶ See p. 414 of this volume.

⁷ Charvaz, pp. 75, 76.

⁸ See Faber, Ancient Vallenses and Albigenes.

account for the alliance of the Vaudois and the Reformers, and after a description of Protestantism, to which it is hard to say whether ignorance or wilful falsehood has most largely contributed, he sets forth, with all the confidence of a historian stating the most notorious facts, the motives by which both Vaudois and Protestants were basely animated, the hatred of the Roman Catholic church which impelled the Vaudois to embrace the new tenets of the Reformers, and the anxiety for some show of antiquity which made the Protestants value such feeble auxiliaries. After this characteristic display of generous and charitable feeling, he goes on to state that a descent from Valdo not appearing sufficient, a claim to higher antiquity was invented, and Valdo was represented not as the founder of a sect, but as a disciple of a sect long previously existing.¹ It can hardly escape observation, that this account of the origin of the Vaudois claim to an antiquity reaching back beyond the time of Valdo, is directly contrary to the admissions of the old Catholic authors, just before adduced as witnesses by M. Charvaz, who, in the very passages quoted by him, plainly speak of such a claim as already put forth by the Vaudois in their time. It seems, however, to have escaped the observation of the Bishop of Pignerol. He had not a sufficiently good memory!

Proceeding to another part of his subject, he discusses the origin of the name Waldenses or Vaudois, a point, however, upon which he does not throw much light. He, indeed, affects to despise the derivation of Valdo or Valdensis from vallis (a valley); but seems to admit, that the latter form of Valdo's name has been used upon the supposition of its being a name derived from the name of a place.² As to the old Catholic authors who derive the name from vallis, playfully adding pleasant fancies of their own as to the kind of valley, M. Charvaz does not hesitate to set aside all that they have said of this sort, keeping firm hold, however, of their statement, that Valdo founded the Vaudois sect. Polichdorf was "certainly mistaken" when he made the heresiarch a citizen of Valden; but Polichdorf does say that Valdo founded the Vaudois sect (Petrus Valdensis . . . ex quo secta Valdensis est orta), "and this is enough for us (et cula nous suffit)," adds M. Charvaz, with no apparent consciousness of absurdity.³

M. Charvaz devotes a number of pages to the other names borne by the Vaudois, in what he calls the first ages of their existence, and to their union with other sects, in which will be found little that is relevant to the question of their origin: but an argument which he founds upon a passage of William of Puy Laurens, perhaps deserves to be noticed. That author mentions amongst heretical sects, the Vaudois or Lyonese (Valdenses sive Lugdunenses). It is impossible, says M. Charvaz in a note, to imagine how this historian could call them indifferently Vaudois or Lyonese, unless they really derived their origin from Lyons and from Peter Valdo!⁴ It is impossible for him to imagine that the new impulse given to their cause may have given rise, and particularly amongst those who knew nothing of them before, to a new name.

It may not be improper to mention also, an attempt which M. Charvaz makes to show that the advocates of the antiquity of the Vaudois are at variance amongst themselves as to the date to which they make it remount, some going back only to Claude of Turin, some to Popo Sylvester, and some to the apostles. This is only worthy of notice, however, as showing the unfairness which characterizes M. Charvaz as a controversialist. He is one of those who misrepresent their opponents, and to whom no sort of argument comes amiss.

¹ Charvaz, pp. 86-103.² Ibid. p. 117.³ Ibid. p. 133.⁴ Ibid. p. 153.

A large part of his work is devoted to an examination of the proofs which have been adduced to show that the Vaudois existed before the days of Valdo. He expresses himself in very strong terms against the Vaudois historians for resting too much upon certain passages which they quote from Reynerus Saccho and from Polichdorf, and dishonestly keeping out of view the great number of other writers, some of whom are more ancient than these, who testify expressly against this pretended antiquity. We have seen already who these other writers are, and what their testimony is. We may take for granted that M. Charvaz has not failed to supply this defect of the Vaudois historians. The passage of Reynerus, quoted by Léger and other authors as supporting the Vaudois claim of antiquity, causes him no little trouble. No sect is more pernicious, Reynerus says, than that of the Leonists, and this for three reasons, first, because it is of longer endurance, some saying that it has endured from the time of Sylvester, and some, that it has endured from the time of the apostles; secondly, because it is more general, there being almost no country in which it does not exist. ("Inter omnes has sectas, quæ nunc sunt, vel fuerunt, non est perniciosior Ecclesiæ quam Leonistarum. Et hoc tribus de causis. Prima est quia est diuturnior. Aliqui enim dicunt quod duraverit a tempore Sylvestri: aliqui a tempore Apostolorum. Secunda quia est generalior. Pere enim nulla est terra in qua hæc secta non sit. Tertia," &c.) In his next chapter, Reynerus gives an account of the origin of the Leonists, deriving them from Valdo of Lyons, and which we have already seen that M. Charvaz adduces in support of his view of the origin of the Vaudois. But it is in vain that he alleges that chapter to have been intended by Reynerus as a refutation of the higher antiquity ascribed by some to the Leonists, or claimed by themselves. The passage bears no such shape; and Reynerus remains a witness that in his day the claim was well known, which Popish writers would now fain represent as a novelty of modern times. And, moreover, it may fairly be taken for granted, that if Reynerus, who wrote little more than half a century after the days of Valdo, had regarded the claim to antiquity as utterly unfounded, he would not have failed to have exclaimed against those who had the audacity to advance it. The writers of his class and time do not generally err on the side of excessive gentleness. Nor does M. Charvaz himself, notwithstanding his pretensions in that way, when he calls Léger a liar, for asserting, as on the authority of Polichdorf, the prevalence of an opinion amongst the Vaudois of his time, that they had existed, at least, from the beginning of the sixth century. The words of Polichdorf have been already quoted, and the reader may judge for himself as to their import. It may be here mentioned, once for all, that M. Charvaz perpetually reiterates charges of dishonesty against the Vaudois authors, and makes it an argument against their religion, that it was found to have need of such support!

It is not necessary, for our present purpose, to follow this author very closely in the part of his work to which we have now come, nor even to inquire whether he is or is not successful in setting aside some of the arguments adduced by Vaudois authors. Let us pass on to his examination of the Vaudois documents. He begins by saying that Léger published many in his History, but that the Vaudois writers of the present day have prudently reduced the number to two—the Book of Antichrist and the Noble Lesson. The truth of this statement may be, in some measure, tested by reference to Part II. of the Bibliography in the present volume. As to the BOOK OF ANTICHRIST,² M. Charvaz refuses to admit that it can be a production of the twelfth century, because of the quotation which it contains from the Milleloquium, a work of which the author was born in 1243.¹ He also denies that it is a Vaudois work at all, and his reasons are curious. He not only argues from the absence of anything distinctively Vaudois, or which did not equally belong to the Cathari, and from the want of any mention of the Vaudois by name (he does not say that the Cathari, or any of the other sects whom he would represent as so distinct from the Vaudois, are mentioned by name), but he actually finds an argument in the absence of any mention of the founder of the Vaudois, and of the time and circumstances in which they originated.²

¹ Quoted by M. Charvaz, in Appendix, p. 474.
VOL. II.

² See pp. 443, 444, of this volume.

Having thus satisfactorily disposed of the treatise Of Antichrist, he proceeds to consider the Noble Lesson.³ On this he ventures an opinion similar to that which he has expressed concerning the treatise Of Antichrist, that it may not be a Vaudois work at all, but that the author may have belonged to the Cathari, or the Petrobrusians.⁴ It is curious, then, not only that the work, along with others, should have been preserved by the Vaudois only, but that the author should have mentioned the Vaudois only, and in the manner he does,⁵ and not his own sect. M. Charvaz feels this difficulty, and tries to get quit of it by saying, that such compliments are common amongst friends associated in the same cause!⁶

But, according to M. Charvaz, the most eminent philologists and paleographers assign to the Noble Lesson the date of the thirteenth century, or not earlier than the twelfth, so as to place it after the appearance of Valdo.⁷ Philology and paleography must be nicely accurate, to determine, in such a case, as to a few decades, less or more. But for the greater assurance of his readers, M. Charvaz favours them with a facsimile of a few lines of the Noble Lesson, from the Geneva MS.—As to the important line which fixes, or seems to fix, the date, he accounts for it by reference to the prevalence of the notion that the world was to be destroyed about the year 1000, and by the supposition, which many others have made, and the probability of which every one may estimate for himself, that such a date might be used at any time till the end (and his theory, of course, brings it very nearly to the end) of the century.

These are the parts of M. Charvaz's work which chiefly demand attention in connection with the present question. It is not necessary to examine, in the same manner, the chapters which he devotes to the pretensions of antiquity made by the Vaudois in their petitions to the Dukes of Savoy, the testimonies in favour of their antiquity which have been derived from the writings of Protestants, their alleged separation from the Church of Rome in the days of Claude of Turin, &c. Were there space for it, a few extracts might be given of his vilifications of Claude of Turin, on whom he heaps abuse, partly original, and partly collected from the writings of Theodemir, Dungal, Jonas of Orleans, and other eminent contemporaries of the iconoclast bishop. Towards the conclusion of his work, he turns to account the outward conformity of the Vaudois before the Reformation to the Church of Rome; contrasts the doctrines of Valdo

¹ On this point see Dr. Muston's remarks, in p. 444 of this volume.

² Charvaz, p. 242.

³ See the Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 15 and p. 28; and the present volume, pp. 420-422 and 458-460.

⁴ Charvaz, p. 250.

⁵ See Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 28.

⁶ It appears to me that the argument of Dr. Muston, in pp. 420-422 and 458-460 of this volume, derives additional force from a consideration of the form of the name Vaudois in the Noble Lesson, "Ih dion qu'es Vaudes e degue de punir." Without pretending to know much of the Romance tongue, I think I may venture to express the opinion that this is not an adjective formed from the name Valdo, or from the name of any man whatever.

⁷ Charvaz, p. 253.

and his followers, in the thirteenth century, with those of the present Vaudois; exclaims against Valdo's vain imagination that he could understand and explain the Scriptures, and his error of thinking that laics can preach, and finds occasion to bestow a few passing words upon Bible Societies. There is nothing in this latter part of the work of any real importance, except what relates to the doctrines of the Vaudois; and in the works which still remain to be noticed, this subject is both more fully and more fairly treated.

I proceed now to give some account of an academic thesis (ad sacra Christi natalitia anni 1848 pié ritéque celebranda) by Dr. Herzog, ordinary professor of theology in Halle, "DE ORIGINE ET PRISTINO STATU WALDENSIUM SECUNDUM ANTIQUISSIMA EORUM SCRIPTA CUM LIBRIS CATHOLICORUM EJUSDEM ÆVI COLLATA." The plan of this thesis has been stated by Dr. Muston in the "Bibliography" of the Israel of the Alps.¹

Dr. Herzog begins by expressing his opinion that the disputed question of the origin and pristine state of the Vaudois, admits of being much elucidated by a comparison of the most ancient Vaudois documents with the writings of the Roman Catholic authors who have mentioned them since the end of the twelfth century, and his surprise that this comparison has not already been made. He blames those who have written on this subject, for confining themselves too much to one class of authorities, and applies this censure to Muston on the one side,² and to Bishop Charvaz on the other. Even the writers who attribute the greatest authority to the Waldensian documents, have not, he says, closely enough examined them.

The whole controversy, he says, may be reduced to this, Did the Vaudois exist under that name before the year 1170, when Valdo made his appearance as a reformer, or is Valdo himself to be regarded as the founder of the sect? With which question another is connected, Did the Vaudois, before the time of Valdo, occupy the same regions which they now occupy? This is certainly the question to be tried, but it is not so easy to agree with Dr. Herzog, when he goes on to state the test by which he thinks it may be determined, namely, to examine carefully if those things which the "Catholics" report concerning the Vaudois doctrines and institutions agree with the things which are to be found in the books of the Vaudois themselves; for if so, he thinks it plain that the account given by the Roman Catholic authors must be received, and the Vaudois accordingly held to have originated from Valdo; but if the Vaudois documents do not correspond with the Roman Catholic report of the doctrines and institutions of Valdo's followers, then he thinks it may be concluded that there was another and more ancient sect separated from the Church of Rome, and occupying those same regions in which the documents were found. "Nam si demonstrari potest, libros Catholicos eandem hominum societatem spectare quam Waldensium libri produnt, liquido patet, Catholicis fidem adhibendam esse, nec dubitandum, quin Waldenses omnino a Waldo illo oriundi sint. Quod si contra," &c.³

Now, that which Dr. Herzog thinks so plain ("liquido patet"), I think by no means plain at all; and as this is of so great importance, it may not be improper to pause here for a little and consider it. The fruits of his learned researches still remain in this and his other work, hereafter to be noticed, undiminished in value by any fallacy which may be found in his argument; but if that argument shall be found based upon an entirely fallacious principle, the conclusion at which he arrives may be regarded as probably erroneous, and the materials which he has provided ought to be gratefully accepted and used anew. Now, surely it is not enough to warrant a conclusion in favour of the accuracy of the account given by Roman Catholic writers of the origin of the Vaudois, that it shall be found from comparison of their writings and the Vaudois documents, that they relate to the same sect. Dr. Herzog himself afterwards admits that the Roman Catholic writers are by no means accurate in all their statements regarding the Vaudois. That the authors of the Vaudois poems, and other works, were of the number of those whom the Catholics called Waldenses ("ex numero eorum fuisse, quos Catholici Waldenses vocarunt"), is a conclusion which he reaches, notwithstanding discrepancies of some things contained in these books from the things reported by the Catholics; for who does not at once perceive, he asks, that these and such like things were unjustly imputed to the Vaudois by those who hated them, or were true only of some small part of them? ("Attamen quis non statim intelliget, hæc et alia ejusdem generis exosis hominibus ab adversariis injuste imputata esse, vel nonnisi paucos spectare?") Is it difficult to suppose, then, that the same untruthfulness extended to the other and very important point of the origin of the Vaudois? The supposition does no injustice to these Roman Catholic authors, nor to the class to which they belong; and if known prejudice and a motive to deceive make probable the falsification of history, the probability is not in this case wanting. There is no point on which authors, zealots for the Church of Rome, and full of passionate hatred against the Vaudois, ought to be read with more suspicion than that of the antiquity or recent origin of the detested sect. And Dr. Herzog ought surely to have considered, and given some weight to the consideration, that those who hold the opinion of the existence of the Vaudois anterior to the time of Valdo, do not regard his followers as forming an entirely distinct and separate sect; for this renders it of still less consequence as to the question now at issue, to prove that the accounts given by the Roman Catholic authors relate to those whose religious views agreed with the poems and treatises preserved in the valleys of Piedmont. And I will add only one other observation, that the whole amount of Roman Catholic testimony to the descent of the Vaudois from Valdo is by no means great. Even were intentional misstatement and the influence of prejudice entirely out of the question, very little evidence is offered which, when the circumstances of time and place are considered, deserves much attention. We have already seen what are the quality and the quantity of this evidence, as adduced by Bishop Charvaz.

¹ See p. 415 of this volume.

² With reference, of course, to his first work only.

³ Herzog, De Orig., &c., p. 2.

We may now return to the examination of Dr. Herzog's thesis. It appears that the Roman Catholic authors upon whose testimony he depends are in general the same with those quoted by Bishop Charvaz. Of the Vaudois documents, in so far as they have been published, he says it is evident that they have been written by men living at very different times and in very different circumstances. But he ascribes the highest authority to the poems called La Nobla Leyczon, La Barca, Lo Novel Sermon, Lo Novel Confort, Lo Payre Eternal, Lo Desprezzi del mont, and L'Arangeli de li quatre semenz, and to the prose compositions called La Potesta dona a li Vicaris de Xrist, Sermon del Judyçi, Epistola amicus, Epistola fideli, De la temor del Signor, De las Tribulacions, and Glosa Paternoster.² Concerning the language in which they are written, he quotes Raynouard as to its general identity with the language of the Troubadours, and thence infers that the language affords no proof that they were written in the regions now inhabited by the Vaudois.³

¹ Herzog, De Orig., &c., pp. 36, 37.

² Herzog, De Orig., &c., pp. 4, 5.

³ See Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 15, and particularly pp. 446-448 of this volume.

Dr. Herzog bestows a chapter on the question, Whether or not the Vaudois books were known to the Catholic authors whom he has enumerated? and this he decides in the affirmative, but only on such grounds as these, that they tell us of books which the Vaudois of their age used; that they mention a translation of the Bible, or of part of it, into the vulgar tongue, as having been made and used by the Vaudois, and that such a translation exists, and is claimed by the Vaudois of Piedmont as the work of their ancestors; and that the Council of Tarragon, in 1242, decreed that those should be treated as persons suspected of heresy who heard the preaching or reading (lectio) of the Inzabbati (another name of the Vaudois); the word lesson (leyczon, lectio) being one of very common occurrence in the Vaudois documents. It will not seem very presumptuous to assert that this chapter is of little value in reference to the question of the origin of the Vaudois, and cannot even be regarded as containing any proof that Stephen De Borbone, Yvonetus, and the other Roman Catholic authors quoted by Dr. Herzog, were very intimately acquainted with the people or sect from whom the existing Vaudois poems and treatises have been inherited. Of evidence that they knew anything of the works now existing, there is not a shadow. Nor if there were, would it greatly affect the main question.

Dr. Herzog next enters into learned and interesting inquiries concerning the religious opinions of the Vaudois, and spends a number of pages in proving that the authors of the Vaudois poems and treatises, and the sect whose religious opinions they represented, were perfectly free from the Manicheism, and other gross errors usually ascribed to the Cathari; and after many quotations from Bonacursus, Moneta, Reinerius, Ermengardus, and other Catholic authors, concerning these errors of the Cathari, and from the Vaudois documents, but particularly the Noble Lesson, asserting the most opposite doctrines, he condemns in the strongest terms the opinion of Bishop Charvaz, who, without assigning any reason, supposes the Noble Lesson to have been the work of some one belonging to the sect of the Cathari. ("Profecto igitur ridicula sententia episcopi Pinerolæ esse videtur ter dicentis, nullo argumento allato, auctorem carminis Nobla Leyczon e Catharorum numero fuisse. Tantum enim abest, ut ejus auctorem potius contra hos aliquoties tacite pugnare credideris, veritatem asserendo errori oppositam." ¹)

That the ancient Vaudois did not agree in all doctrines and practices with the Protestants of the present day, but retained many things which are now retained only in the Church of Rome, Dr. Herzog has no difficulty in proving, and with this a considerable part of his thesis is occupied; but how this bears upon the question of their descent from Valdo, or origin anterior to him, I confess myself unable to perceive. For if a theory can be easily framed to account for this fact, upon the supposition that Valdo was the founder of the sect, it seems not very difficult to frame a theory by which it may be as completely accounted for upon the opposite supposition. The historic inquiry concerning the doctrines and practices of the Vaudois, anterior and long anterior to the Reformation, is indeed extremely interesting. But Dr. Herzog's thesis has a special reference to the question of the origin of the Vaudois, and the chapters which he bestows upon the subject of their religious opinions and practices have no other bearing upon that question, than as showing that the Vaudois poems and treatises have really been produced by authors belonging to the same sect of which we obtain information from Stephen De Borbone, Reinerius, Yvonetus, and other Popish authors. I refrain from attempting to follow him in his exhibition of the tenets of the earlier Vaudois, for which, it may be observed, that notwithstanding his anxiety to establish the authority of the Popish authors as to the point of descent from Valdo, he depends rather upon the Vaudois documents than upon their testimony.

¹ Herzog, De Orig., &c., p. 12.

We have seen already by what a fallacious argument it is that Dr. Herzog persuades himself to receive the testimony of the Popish authors, who assert Valdo to have been the founder of the Vaudois. But he finds a difficulty which must be removed if this opinion is to be adopted—the alleged date of the Noble Lesson—a date not affixed to any MS., but embodied in the poem itself.¹ But why, Dr. Herzog asks, if the author meant to reckon eleven hundred years from the birth of Christ, did he not plainly say so? He thinks, therefore, that the reference must be to the time when the New Testament was written—and that the time which, in unusual phraseology, is said to have been written (“fo scripta l'ora”), must be the εσχάτη ώρα spoken of by the Apostle John in his first epistle, chap. ii. 18. And he adduces evidence to show the expectation which prevailed of the destruction of the world in the year 1000, the similar expectation still prevailing after that dreaded date was past, and the kindred apprehensions of the coming of Antichrist, in connection with which he quotes the warning in the Noble Lesson against participation with Antichrist. And after this, and from these premises, he, without hesitation, concludes that the Noble Lesson was written about the end of the twelfth century, after Valdo had taught for a considerable time; a conclusion confirmed, he says, by the perfect agreement of all which it contains with what we learn from Catholic authors of the doctrines, actings, and sufferings of the Vaudois. (“Itaque constat, illud carmen sub finem seculi duodecimi, postquam Waldus jam diu docendi initium fecit, scriptum esse. Id quod eo maxime comprobatur,” &c.) It seems almost incredible, that with no other show of arguments than this, Dr. Herzog should think it proved that the Noble Lesson belongs to the end of the twelfth century. His dismissal of this important document is somewhat too summary.

“Ben ha mil e cent anez compli entierament Que fo scripta l'ora, car sen al dernier temp;”

He proceeds to examine into the antiquity of some of the other Vaudois documents. He easily disposes of the exact dates assigned to some of them by Léger,² arguing from the want of dates in most of the MSS. used by the earlier historian Perrin, and holding these dates, even when affixed to the manuscript volumes, to be no trustworthy evidence. And this must certainly be admitted: a date may have been inscribed upon a MS. by another hand than that which wrote it, and does not necessarily prove anything either as to the time of composition or of transcription. And Léger shows no reason for thinking that the dates which he quotes, as if they were indisputably accurate, are anything else than dates thus affixed.

Dr. Herzog adopts the argument of Bishop Charvaz, concerning the Treatise on Purgatory, that it cannot belong to the beginning of the twelfth century, because it contains a quotation from the Milleloquium, the author of which is known to have died in 1328. And to Monastier, who,—in his History of the Vaudois, has sought to repel this objection by saying that he has had in his hands a MS. of the Treatise on Purgatory, in which the quotation from the Milleloquium does not occur, so that it appears to have been inserted by some later copyist,—Dr. Herzog replies that he has omitted to advert to a very important circumstance, namely, that in the very copy upon which he depends as authentic, mention is made of Hugh of Saint Victor, who died in 1141. Dr. Herzog derives his knowledge of this circumstance from Monastier himself. The quotation from Hugh of Saint Victor, is from his book De Sacramentis. And Dr. Herzog refers to authorities in proof that he is known to have written this book towards the end of his life. The reply to Monastier is in fact a new argument, and which, besides turning upon a question of a few years only, not of a century or half a century, is manifestly liable to be set aside, unless supported in some other way, upon the general ground stated by Dr. Muston,¹ of probable or possible interpolation by transcribers. For it is most improbable that either one or other of the copies now existing is the original copy of the Treatise on Purgatory.

¹ See pp. 458, 459, of this volume.

² See pp. 441, 445, of this volume.

Against the antiquity assigned to the Book of Antichrist, Dr. Herzog urges reasons substantially the same with those upon which Dr. Muston comes to the same conclusion,² and at the same time he uses an argument founded upon his own peculiar interpretation of the passage in the Noble Lesson, which is so generally regarded as containing the date 1100, and in which mention is made of the last time. Insisting strongly upon the incomplete separation of the Vaudois from the Church of Rome, until the period of the Reformation, as a reason for holding that the Book of Antichrist does not express such sentiments as they entertained, Dr. Herzog thinks himself warranted in not only concluding it to have been produced after the Synod which met in 1532, at Angrogna, but in supposing that the author has imitated the language of the ancient Vaudois ("sermonem veterum Waldensium plus minusve bene imitatus est"), and that both he and the person who affixed the date have been guilty of a pious fraud, which however is not to be imputed to the whole congregation.³ I will venture to express my opinion, that even if the Book of Antichrist were proved to be a work of the Reformation period, there is not the shadow of a reason for suspecting a pious fraud on the part of its author, and that even the date may have been affixed afterwards in perfect good faith, although erroneously. This suspicion of pious fraud against men whose principles give no ground for it, is one which ought not to be lightly admitted.

The Confession of Faith, to which Léger assigns the date 1120, Dr. Herzog unhesitatingly sets down as a production of the Reformation period, as Dr. Muston also does, and on much the same grounds.⁴ He quotes passages to show its even verbal correspondence with the letter of the Vaudois delegates to Ecolampadius.⁵ He regards the Book of Antichrist, the Treatises on Purgatory and on the Invocation of Saints, the Catechism, and the Confession of Faith, as all indicating a knowledge of evangelical truth more perfect than was possessed by the earlier Waldenses, or than the Noble Lesson indicates.⁶

Finally, he examines the names Valdo and Vaudois, in order to determine their relation to one another. Against the derivation of Valdo's name, from his connection with a people previously bearing the name of Vaudois, he uses arguments which probably may not appear to many quite so powerful as he expresses his confidence that they are. ("Quam sententiam prorsus falsam et erroneam esse, firmissimis argumentis probatur.") FIRST OF ALL, he says, according to the testimony both of the Catholic writers and of the Vaudois themselves, this was not a name which they themselves assumed. Ebrard, he admits, does say that they called themselves Vallenses, but he easily sets aside

¹ See pp. 444, 445, of this volume.

² Herzog, De Orig., &c., p. 40.

³ Herzog, De Orig., &c., pp. 40, 41.

² See p. 445 of this volume.

⁴ See pp. 478, 479, of this volume.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 41, 42.

Ebrard's testimony, "Qui in hanc rem non accuratè inquisivit." (So that it would seem a testimony is to be received or not, for no other reason than its agreement or disagreement with a foregone conclusion. This is not a point on which the testimony of Ebrard is liable to the same suspicion which affects the evidence of Popish authors on some other points concerning the Vaudois.) The use of the name Vaules in the Noble Lesson, in the line already well known to the reader, he contends, is such that it appears to have been a name reproachfully given to the Vaudois by their adversaries. And in accordance with this, he proceeds to show that they rejected the name, for in the letter which they addressed to Ladislaus, king of Bohemia, they call themselves "Lo petit tropil de li Chrestiens apella per fals nom falsament Paurres o Valdes;" and Samuel Cassini, a Franciscan, who wrote a book against the Vaudois in 1610, has these words, "Dicis, te non esse Waldensem sed meinbrum ecclesiæ Christi."¹ It seems scarcely necessary to state the ready explanation of which all this admits, and which renders it of no moment whatever in reference to the point as to which it is adduced by Dr. Herzog. IN THE SECOND PLACE, he says that the name Vaudois is certainly not derived from vallis. But as his argument under this head is not long, and as it appears to me, in so far as it has any bearing upon the subject, altogether to tend to a conclusion contrary to that which Dr. Herzog draws from it, I think it best to give it entire, and in his own words. "Porro certissimum est, nomen Waldenses, Valdesii, Vaudes, Valdes, Waldos omnino non a valle trahendum esse, nec vertendum Thalleute. Quæ sententia ex mera inscitia linguæ Romanæ et Franco-gallicæ orta est.² Vox enim val, vau in illis linguis significat vallis, valles. Unde dictum popolare: par monts et par vau (über Berg und Thal). Ita quoque in Mircour du monde, p. 177. Ab hoc verbo differt vox Vaud, Vaules, Vaudois, Valdes, Waldensis, &c. Cujus differentie insigne testimonium in pago Waldensi Helvetico invenitur. Rodolphus rex Burgundorum anno 1011 dono dedit Henrico Lausannensi episcopo comitatum Waldensem; v. Memoires et documents publiés par la société d'histoire de la Suisse romande (t. vii. p. 2). Idem nomen sæpius usurpatur in aliis diplomatibus. Eginolfus episcopus vocatur in pago Waldense (t. vi. p. 4). Ludovicus Sabaudicæ dux Dominus Vaudi vocatur in diplomate anni 1300 (t. vii. p. 78), Seigneur de Vaut in diplomate anni 1331 (t. vii. p. 102). In hoc eodem vero comitatu vel pago Waldensi regio sita est, quæ ab antiquissimis temporibus ad hunc usque diem Vaux, la Vaux vocatur, idemque nomen singulæ ejus partes acceperunt. Ludovicus Sabaudicæ dux illo diplomate anno 1300 jam citato in episcopum Lausannensem omnia jura transfert, quæ in totâ valle de Lustriaco (vau³ de Lutry) habet. Eadem vox usurpatur in diplomate anni 1348 (t. vii. p. 142)."⁴ There may be something here which I have failed to apprehend, yet all seems plain enough; and I can only express my surprise that anything here adduced should be regarded as affording an argument against the derivation of the name Vaudois from Val. Yet it ought to be remembered that this is, after all, a point of mere secondary consequence. For the name Vaudois may have some totally different origin, and yet may be much older than the age of Valdo, and he may have derived from it

¹ Herzog, De Orig., p. 42.

² Concerning this point of knowledge of language, the reader may compare Dr. Muston's remarks in pp. 446-448 of this volume. They refer particularly to a note at the end of Dr. Herzog's thesis, connected with that part of it which is devoted to the question of the religious opinions of the earlier Vaudois.

³ There is certainly a slight inaccuracy in this translation.

⁴ Herzog, De Orig., &c., pp. 42, 43.

his name. But, IN THE THIRD PLACE, Dr. Herzog asserts that Valdo was the only name of the rich citizen of Lyons who became an evangelist and reformer,¹ and that the name Peter was first given to him by mistake by Polichdorf, writing in Germany in the fifteenth century.² And this he regards as of much consequence in proving that the name Valdo was not in any way indicative of his country or race. This by no means appears to follow; and Dr. Herzog omits to account for the occurrence, in the very earliest works in which Valdo is mentioned, of such forms of his name as Valdensis, Waldensis, Valdesius, Valdius, Waldi, &c.; although it must be granted to be very uncertain that he bore the name of Peter, and the name Valdes or Waldo was certainly, as Dr. Herzog asserts, common enough in the middle ages. It is "of very common occurrence," Dr. Gilly says, "in Gallic and Germanic documents, from the ninth to the twelfth century, and w is the Germano-Burgundian spelling;" and Valdo's "prænomen Petrus," he adds, "occurs, we believe, for the first time in a Latin book of Peter de Polichdorf, written during the last half of the fourteenth century."³ It might be interesting to investigate the origin and use of the name Valdo or Waldo, but it seems hasty to conclude, from its occurrence as a proper name both before and after his time, that it was merely so in the case of the Lyonnese reformer of the twelfth century, or that even as used in previous centuries, it had no reference to country or race.

The next work of which it is requisite to take notice, is DIE WALDENSER IM MITTELALTER; ZWEI HISTORISCHE UNTERSUCHUNGEN VON A. WILH. DIECKHOFF, LICENTIATEN UND PRIVATDOCENTEN DER THEOLOGIE ZU GÖTTINGEN (Göttingen, 1851). Dieckhoff's work was published almost immediately after Dr. Muston's Israel of the Alps, which the author had not seen when he wrote.

In his preface he declares the insufficiency of the researches hitherto made into the history of the Vaudois. He regards his own work as merely a contribution to a better knowledge of this subject, and points out how much still remains to be done, particularly in inquiries concerning the Taborites, Bohemian Brethren, and other allied sects of the middle ages, and of their relations to the Vaudois, which he holds to have been intimate. He expresses his regret that the documents connected with the history of the Bohemian sects have as yet been so little studied, and that so many of them have hitherto remained entirely locked up in a language with which the students of ecclesiastical history are in general unacquainted. As to what he himself has accomplished, he expresses himself with confidence that it has opened up the way to a better knowledge of Vaudois history, by removing causes of error which have generally misled inquirers at the very outset. For he holds, as we shall see, that he has succeeded in proving the Vaudois manuscript literature to have been fabricated after the Reformation, and that what existed previously was altered, and can afford no evidence of the previous tenets and circumstances of the Vaudois, or of their existence at the early period to which it has been usually referred. But he concludes with the just reflection, that any change which historic researches may make in our views of the relations of the Vaudois to the Church of Rome, can in no way affect the question of right and wrong in the Reformation, or as between Protestantism and the system to which it is opposed. If, however, it must be admitted that the reference to the Vaudois has often been made in the controversy against Popery neither very judiciously nor very accurately, it by no means follows that there is no important use to be made in that controversy of a reference to them, and to the other opponents of Popish error in the middle ages. Even if we were to adopt all Dieckhoff's conclusions from his researches into Waldensian literature, there would still remain sufficient evidence of a long-continued and widely extended opposition, during the middle ages, to the corruptions and spiritual despotism of Rome. And this cannot be regarded as unimportant even by those who reject, as contemptuously as Dieckhoff himself, the notion of a sort of episcopal succession, purer than that of Rome, transmitted through the Vaudois; who refuse, like him, to link one ancient sect arbitrarily to another for the sake of a mere external continuity, and agree with him in regarding such a demand for external continuity as more in harmony with the principles of Popery itself than with those of Protestantism; who, like him, believe that neither was any of the sects opposed to Rome a witness for the whole of Christian truth, nor the dominant church itself, with all its corruptions, entirely destitute of it; and who look upon the Reformation not as the more extensive adoption of a testimony transmitted without modification through a long succession of ages, but rather as a triumph of the truth within the church, casting away the falsehood by which it had been oppressed ("Wie die Kirche trotz der Irrthümer, denen sie verfallen war, doch nicht aufgehört hatte, die Wahrheit des Christenthums in sich zu haben, so werden wir auch die Reformation als eine Krise betrachten müssen, in welcher die Wahrheit in der Kirche das Falsche von sich stößt.")¹

¹ Compare Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 14.

² See p. 413 of this volume.

³ Gilly, article "Valdo," in seventh edition of Encyclopædia Britannica.

Dieckhoff complains, in the commencement of his work, of the injury done to the interests of historic truth, by the polemical aspect in which every question regarding the Waldenses has been viewed; shows how naturally it resulted from the circumstances in which Vigneaux, Perrin, Gilles, Morland, Léger, and other Vaudois and friends of the Vaudois wrote, that they should anxiously seek out whatever was favourable to the character and antiquity of the sect; and points to Flacius, the author of the Catalogus testium veritatis, and "father of Protestant historic investigation," as having led the way in researches too exclusively limited to what was good in the early Vaudois and agreeable to the Scriptures, and contrary to the errors of Rome. All this may be just, and it may be quite true, that Protestants have in general followed too closely in the track in which Flacius, almost of necessity, prosecuted his investigations; but when we find the author, who finds fault with this, describing the views which Vaudois and Protestant authors have generally adopted concerning the origin and history of the Vaudois as a "post-Reformation tradition,"² we must call to remembrance, what has been, I trust, sufficiently made manifest in previous pages of this appendix, that we have the evidence of Popish authors, writing in a spirit of the greatest hostility to the Waldenses, for the existence of such a tradition at least as early as the thirteenth century. And this undeniable fact takes away, I think, all value from the consideration, to which Dieckhoff and others attach great importance, of the opposition of this Waldensian "tradition" to the statements of these Popish authors.

But looking to this conflicting evidence, on the side of the Vaudois and on that of the Church of Rome, Dieckhoff proposes to himself the task of a critical examination to determine what deserves to be believed. He thinks the testimony of the "Catholic" authors has been too hastily rejected, not on the ground of any incredibility proved to exist in the matter of their testimony, but on the ground that they are unworthy of trust; a ground, nevertheless, which, if we bear in mind the spirit which they display, and the testimonies which men of the same spirit and the same religion have more recently borne concerning the lives of Luther, Calvin, Knox, and other Reformers, and concerning the whole history of the Reformation, we may claim the right still to maintain as good ground for the rejection of their testimony unless corroborated by other evidence. He does not think himself entitled, however, as the value of their evidence is disputed, to make use of it for a test of the authenticity and genuineness of the Vaudois documents. But neither will he receive as accurate and satisfactory the accounts given of the Vaudois by the Protestant historians of the seventeenth century, of whom he asserts that writing with too much regard to apologetic interests, they have kept as much as possible out of view the errors which prevailed amongst the Vaudois before the Reformation. He thinks that with regard to the Vaudois manuscript documents, attention has hitherto been too exclusively devoted to the inquiry what is the earliest date at which they may possibly have been composed, and this with a view to support the opinion that the Vaudois existed before Valdo, but he deems it important to inquire what is the latest date at which they may possibly have been composed, and upon this evidently important question it is of course obvious enough that the question what changes were introduced amongst the Vaudois by the Reformation has an important bearing. That these changes were great, he finds evidence in Protestant and Vaudois authors, from whom he makes a number of quotations, beginning with one, which may here suffice as indicating the general character of the whole, from Crispin's Acta Martyrum: "Valdenses autem, etsi boni erant homines, cumprimis Deum metuentes, summoque verbi Dei studio affecti, tamen luce Evangelii jam exortâ, cognoverunt multa desiderari in suis ecclesiis, quæ ad veram religionem ac pietatem pertinerent: pleraque etiam ignoratione ac temporum culpa jamdiu recepta retineri, quæ a pura Evangelii doctrina Ecclesiæque disciplina abhorrerent."¹ But that upon which he chiefly depends is the evidence as to the doctrines and practices of the Vaudois before the Reformation afforded by their first communications with the Reformers, particularly George Morel's letter to Œcolampadius,² from which he concludes that, contrary to the view generally adopted by Protestant and modern Vaudois authors, all the Acts of the Synod of Angrogna were reforming,³ a conclusion to which he attaches the greatest importance for the further prosecution of historic inquiries ("Erst dann liesze sich ein sicherer Gebrauch von jenem Beschlüssen machen, wenn es feststände, dasz sie alle reformatorische gewesen sind: erst dann würde es gestattet sein, sichere Rückschlüsse auf den früheren Zustand der Sekte zu machen.")⁴ He thinks it certain enough that the author of that letter did not represent things as worse than they actually were, and even hints a suspicion that he may have concealed many things which would have appeared to the disadvantage of his brethren⁵—a most unworthy suspicion, for no document of that or of any age bears stronger internal evidence of candour than that letter of the Vaudois Barba to the Swiss Reformer. It is too easy to see, from the very expression given to this suspicion, with what circumspection it is necessary to follow the steps of Dieckhoff's critical examination of the evidence concerning the Vaudois and their early history. And immediately we find him laying it down as a safe principle on which to proceed,

¹ Pp. 4-7.² Pp. 10, 13, etc.

¹ P. 20; quoting Crispin, vol. i. p. 225.—All the quotations made by Dieckhoff on this point are very interesting, and would have been copied here, but for want of space, although I regard him as exaggerating their importance in the use which he makes of them.

² See Israel of the Alps, part i. chap. 7.

³ Compare Israel of the Alps, part i. chap. 7, and "Bibliography," in this vol., pp. 478, 479.

⁴ P. 19.

⁵ P. 22.

that whenever anything appears in a Vaudois document contrary to any of the errors evinced by Morel's letter to have prevailed at the commencement of the intercourse between the Vaudois and the Reformers, we must conclude that document to be either of later date than the Reformation, or to have been subjected to alteration and interpolation—a principle, the adoption and unhesitating application of which, can only be warranted however by assumptions, which he does not pause to show that we are entitled to make, particularly that there had been no declension in the Vaudois church, nor any Barbas at any time more enlightened than those whose grievous deficiency in education Morel's letter exhibits,¹ and that all his statements were equally applicable to all the Vaudois, those on the Italian as well as those on the French side of the Alps. And it is very obvious that even if we were to adopt the conclusions which Dieckhoff reaches by the application of his rule, in all that relates to the doctrines or practices of the Vaudois before the Reformation, it could lead to no warrantable conclusion as to the important question of their origin. And here it may be incidentally noticed as somewhat strange, that with Morel's letter before him, Dieckhoff should have represented the opinion of the existence of the Vaudois anterior to Valdo as a post-Reformation tradition; for in that letter their high antiquity is twice asserted.² Proceeding, however, to test the Acts of the Angrogna Synod by the account of the Vaudois in Morel's letter, Dieckhoff has no difficulty in concluding them to be entirely of a reforming character. To what extent they are so, is doubtless an important inquiry; but its bearing on the question of the origin of the Vaudois is not such as to make it requisite for us to follow him very closely in his prosecution of it. The principle upon which he proceeds it is necessary for us to have in view, as he seems more anxious to apply it to the Vaudois Manuscript Literature, than to the Acts of the Angrogna Synod; but it is satisfactory to find that when he comes to point out instances of Reformation doctrine in the Vaudois books, he insists chiefly upon such things as are in perfect accordance with the account of the Vaudois in the middle ages, given in the first chapter of the Israel of the Alps, and that the Vaudois works, to which he particularly signalizes as not of the early date ascribed to them, are not those upon which Dr. Muston's arguments rest, one of them being the Confession of Faith, to which Léger, without the support of any evidence, assigns the date 1120, and another, the Treatise on Antichrist, concerning both of which Dr. Muston's opinion agrees with that of Dieckhoff, and is based upon the same grounds.³ In connection with the Treatise on Antichrist, Dieckhoff proposes and briefly considers the question of a possible declension through the effect of persecution from a better state of things to that described by Morel at the period of the Reformation, but it is only in reference to the single point of a complete formal or outward separation from the Church of Rome; and although he adduces no better evidence than that of Stephen De Borbone and Yvonetus, it may freely be admitted that he is probably correct in supposing the separation never to have been so complete before the Reformation as it afterwards became.

¹ It is given by Scultetus in his Annals, and Dieckhoff copies it entire, with the answer of Ecolampadius, in his Appendix.

² Near the beginning of the latter, in the words, "Quandoquidem, ut rem semel capias, sumus qualescunque doctores ejusdam plebis indige et pusillæ, quæ jam plusquam quadringentis annis ino ut frequenter nostrates narrant a tempore Apostolorum, non tamen, ut facile judicarunt quique pii, citra Christi ingentem favorem, inter spinas sævissimas commorata est;" and near the end of it, in the words, "A tempore Apostolorum semper de fide, sicut vos, sentientes concordavimus."

³ See in this volume, pp. 444, 445, and 478, 479.

But taught by the instances which he has found of the evident influence of the Reformation in "some of the most important of the known pieces of Vaudois manuscript literature," to suspect that much more of it may be of the same nature and origin, Dieckhoff proceeds to examine, as is unquestionably very proper, into the history of the manuscripts by which these Vaudois works have become known to us.¹ He admits that there is abundant evidence of the existence of Vaudois books at an early date; but he adduces evidence also to show that the ancient MSS. had become very rare by the end of the sixteenth century, which, if anything to the purpose, can be so only by leading to the supposition that they may completely have perished, and that entirely new works, or copies, thoroughly modified into accordance with Reformation doctrine, may have been substituted in their stead; a supposition to which his remarks on the language of the existing books appear to tend, concerning which he concludes that the dialect in use amongst the Vaudois after 1530 was so similar to the Romance tongue, that a forger or interpolater would find no difficulty, and that therefore the language can afford us no evidence of the antiquity of the books.² He labours more than perhaps was necessary to set aside the authority of Perrin as to the antiquity of manuscripts,³ calling attention to the circumstance that Perrin includes the book of George Morel⁴ amongst the old books which he enumerates, and that he describes as a very old book, "livre fort vieux," a manuscript with the title "Aïço es la causa del nostre despartiment de la Gleisa Romana," the original authorship of which, according to Dieckhoff, is to be referred to the Bohemian brethren and to the beginning of the sixteenth century,⁵ from all which he concludes it to be very probable that many of the manuscripts which Perrin collected were composed after the Reformation. He doubts very much if any of the manuscripts now existing in Geneva and elsewhere were really those collected by Léger, and animadverts upon the circumstance that Léger, although later than Perrin, appears to have had ancient MSS. in greater number, and is more confident in the statement of their dates. The authority of the dates assigned to the Vaudois documents by Léger, he has of course little difficulty in overthrowing; and when he censures Léger's use of manuscript documents as "uncritical," his judgment may be admitted as in all probability quite just; but when he imputes to the persecuted Vaudois minister the tricks of a literary impostor, it is not easy to repress a feeling of indignation that such a charge should be advanced and sustained as it is by proofs ridiculously slender.⁶ Of the wretched hypercriticism with which he afterwards endeavours to point out dishonesty in Perrin's quotations from Morel's letter, I regret that I cannot exhibit a few specimens. So anxious is he to make out a dishonest intention, that he forgets the possibility of honest quotation in reference to a particular point, whilst what has no immediate bearing on that point is omitted, which consideration is almost of itself sufficient to justify Perrin in all that is alleged against him as to this document. The object of all this labour to make out charges of dishonesty is to throw discredit upon every quotation made by Vaudois historians from old Vaudois documents, and to create a suspicion of forgery concerning the existing documents themselves. Nor does it suffice this author to cast doubt upon the genuineness of what have been usually deemed existing relics of the Vaudois of early times, but he finds it necessary to adopt the theory of an intentional fabrication and corruption of documents, with the intention of deception concerning important historical points,¹ making very little allowance, as it seems, for the easy possibility of mistakes as to the date of documents upon the part of uncritical historians, far from all seats of learning, and in the midst of wars and persecutions, or for the probability of the frequent recension of the works circulated in manuscript among the Vaudois and their accommodation, with no fraudulent purpose whatever, to the reformation which had actually been accomplished.

¹ P. 34.² P. 37.—On this point see Dr. Muston, in "Bibliography."³ See the article on Perrin, in the "Bibliography," pp. 398, 399, of this volume.⁴ See "Bibliography," p. 465.⁵ P. 41.⁶ Pp. 45-50.

From the position which he has thus gained, however, Dieckhoff proceeds with the most perfect confidence in his further critical examination of the Vaudois documents. It would certainly have been necessary for him to have established a charge of fraudulent dealing with documents against more than Perrin (and in all that he says concerning Léger, there is rather a repeated utterance of unworthy suspicions than any attempt to make out a specific charge by proof), it would have been necessary for him also to have adduced some surer proof of fraudulent purpose than his comparison of Morel's letter and Perrin's quotations from it can reasonably be held to afford, ere he proceeded to deal with the Vaudois manuscript literature in general, on the assumption that the same fraud has been practised wherever we find anything favourable to the false notion of doctrines and practices before the Reformation harmonious with those of subsequent times. For this is the weapon of criticism which he now takes into his hand, and shows himself resolved to use unsparingly—"Was wäre durch die Fälschung dieses einzelnen Stückes für den Zweck des Fälschers gewonnen gewesen, wenn er andere Zeugnisse über den wahren früheren Zustand der Sekte unverändert hatte? Gewisz, wenn einmal eine solche Fälschung unternommen wurde, wie sie sich an der waldensischen Umarbeitung des Morel'schen Berichtes herausgestellt hat, so muszte sie auch mit Nothwendigkeit über einen grösseren Kreis von Zeugnissen und Schriften ausgedehnt werden, und die historische Kritik ist vollkommen berechtigt, alles das, was in der waldensischen Manuscripten-Literatur wegen seines, dem falschen Scheine der Uebereinstimmung zwischen Alt- und Neu-Waldensischem dienenden Inhalts verdächtig erscheint, als Produkt derselben absichtsvollen Fälschung zu verwerfen, deren Absicht, wie wir gesehen haben, eben auf die Hervorbringung dieses falschen Scheines gerichtet war.") If Perrin were really proved guilty of fraudulently dealing with Morel's letter, the suspicion thence arising could only affect the other Vaudois works and fragments given in his history, unless we might suppose that there was a conspiracy amongst the Vaudois to deceive the world concerning their whole earlier history, and that all who wrote the now existing Vaudois manuscripts were concerned in it.

But however we may reject Dieckhoff's theory of wilful falsification, the part of his work to which we now come is interesting, from the connection which he certainly exhibits between the Vaudois literature and that of the Bohemian churches. That a connection subsisted, in times previous to the Reformation, between the Vaudois or Waldenses of the Alps and the Bohemian Christians (who were often also called Waldenses) has indeed been long known. But this is a subject well deserving of more investigation than it has yet received. Dieckhoff holds, that in a Confession of the Waldenses in Bohemia in 1431,² he has found the original of a very considerable part of the Vaudois manuscript literature published by Perrin and Léger.³ A document, called by Balthasar Lydius, "Confessio Taboritarum," which however is not properly a confession of faith, but a vindication of themselves by the Taborites against the accusations of John Rokenzana and the Prague "masters," professes to be founded upon an older confession, agreed upon in the year 1431, and it appears itself to have been prepared not long after.¹ Between this Taborite production and some of the Vaudois documents, Dieckhoff points out correspondences which unquestionably are not accidental. He devotes many pages to this subject, and fortunately gives the corresponding passages at great length in parallel columns in an appendix, so that we are enabled the more easily to follow his argument, and to judge of the soundness of his conclusions. Viewed as illustrating the connection between the churches of the Cottian Alps and the churches of Bohemia, the correspondence exhibited is full of interest. Several Vaudois works are found to agree very closely in matter, often even in words, with the parts of this Taborite Confession; in particular the "Almanach Spirituel," the treatise "Del Purgatori Soima," and that "De l'Envoication de li Sanct." But when this exact correspondence is exhibited, what proof is there of a recension executed after the Reformation, and with purpose to deceive? That the Vaudois works, as we now have them, are in some points nearer to our Protestant doctrine than the Taborite Confession is, Dieckhoff thinks, proof enough that they have been subjected to recension since the Reformation, although the instances which he adduces do not seem capable, either singly or collectively, of supporting a very weighty conclusion. But why may not such a recension have been honestly made? Except a reference to Perrin's mode of dealing with Morel's letter, I can find nothing alleged by Dieckhoff as a reason for supposing that these works have been altered in order to support the "modern Vaudois tradition" of antiquity. Yet he seems only to doubt if the translation was altogether executed for the sake of the falsification, or if the falsifier found an earlier and more honest Vaudois translation already in existence!

¹ 1p. 68, 69.² See "Bibliography," in this volume, p. 470.³ P. 73.

But what evidence have we that the Taborite Confession is the original, and that the Vaudois works are mere translations and recensions of parts of it? That the title "Del Purgatori Soima," corresponds with that of a section of the Confession "De Somniato Purgatorio post hanc vitam et mendacis Sacerdotum super illo seminatis," and that we have other such but less notable correspondences in titles, will not of itself prove much. For the supposition of a common and more ancient original might not unreasonably be entertained. And that some of the fragments occur in several of the Vaudois works, and in somewhat modified forms, does not diminish the probability of this supposition. That the Vaudois Treatise on Purgatory contains quotations from the sermons of John Huss,² certainly makes it probable that the original was Bohemian; but the manner in which reference is made to Huss, rather seems to favour the supposition that the Vaudois translation was made before the Reformation. It is not upon any of these documents that the question depends as to the antiquity of the Vaudois church: but all Dieckhoff's labours appear to me to confirm our right to use them, their Bohemian and Vaudois forms being compared, as evidence of what the Vaudois were before the Reformation.

It is interesting to observe, what Dieckhoff is careful to point out to us, the want in the Taborite Confession of any clear statement of the fundamental Reformation doctrine of justification; and that the whole argument against purgatory is framed in a manner different from what it certainly would have been if that doctrine and its relation to the doctrine of sanctification had been well understood. It is interesting also to observe, how in the Vaudois Treatise on Purgatory, whilst the general structure of the argument accords with that in the Taborite Confession, the great truths of the gospel are also more fully introduced. Thus where the Taborite Confession sets forth that men are to be purified from their sins in this life, and speaks of faith and charity, and works of faith and piety, and patience in adversities, and the forgiveness of injuries and the like, as the means of this purification, the whole passage is much modified in the Vaudois treatise, and the most prominent place is given to faith, by which, it is said, "Saint Peter shows, in the fifteenth chapter of Acts, that hearts are purified, and which he shows to be sufficient for purifying men's hearts without any other external aid." To find, in this and similar improvements of the Vaudois recension, proof of a later date, may be reasonable and just; but to regard them as the manifest work of a literary impostor, evinces only the power of a foregone conclusion. The fact that different copies of the Vaudois Treatise on Purgatory differ much from each other, is surely of itself favourable to the supposition of honest rather than of fraudulent recension. But Dieckhoff, comparing them together, and finding in them such an agreement as to incline him to the opinion that there must have been a Vaudois translation earlier than any of them upon which they were more immediately founded, only wonders if this older version was also made with the same purpose of deceit! His incessant repetition of the words Fälschung and Fälscher, in such total absence of proof to support the charge, becomes positively painful. He has by no means even proved, in regard to the Treatise on Purgatory, and other Vaudois treatises of the same series, that there was not a Vaudois original older than any Taborite Confession whatever, and of which the Taborites made use in preparing their Confession of 1431 and the subsequent defence, by which the substance of that Confession is now known to us, against the accusations of Rokenzana and the other Prague "masters."

¹ Pp. 74, 75.

² Dieckhoff shows (pp. 88, 89, and 388-391) that the Master John quoted in this treatise is not John Chrysostom, as Monastier had imagined, but John Huss.

Yet from assuming it as a thing absolutely certain, that this Confession was strictly of Bohemian origin, Dieckhoff derives great advantage for his outset in his next argument, which is directed to the object of showing the Bohemian origin of the Catechism,¹ generally regarded, upon Léger's authority, as a Vaudois Catechism of the year 1100. Of course, the date given by Léger has no real authority whatever; but it may be proper to add that to reject his authority on this point is no impeachment of his good faith as an historian. Nor does the rejection of this date involve the rejection of the Catechism as a document affording evidence of the doctrines of the Vaudois before the Reformation, in order to which the circumstance that it was known and used amongst them is of more importance than the answer to the question, Whether it was composed in the valleys of the Alps or in Bohemia? Dieckhoff's anxiety, however, is great to proceed from probability to certainty, assuming, on the ground of his previous discoveries just noticed, an antecedent probability that it also is of Bohemian origin. And this attempt he prosecutes throughout many pages, comparing the Bohemian form of the Catechism, as it exists in a German translation published in Luther's time, with the Vaudois form. The correspondence between this "Catechism of the Bohemian Brethren" and the Vaudois Catechism has been long known; but it has been generally taken for granted, perhaps too hastily, and only on Léger's authority, that the Catechism was originally Vaudois. The question is not of the highest importance either with reference to the origin of the Vaudois, or to their state during the middle ages. The clear and precise statement in the Vaudois Catechism, as it now exists, of some doctrines which are not so well stated in the Bohemian Catechism, Dieckhoff of course refers, and not without some appearance of probability, to the influence of the Reformation. But his argument, founded chiefly upon a comparison of the arrangement in the two forms of the Catechism, from which he concludes that the Bohemian form is the original, and that the Vaudois Catechism has been derived from it, is of such a nature that no abridgement can do justice to it. Ten pages of his work would require to be copied in order fairly to exhibit it. Perhaps I may be allowed to describe it as wire-drawn. But whatever may be its value as an argument, no great historic question can be much affected by it.

¹ See "Bibliography," in this volume, p. 467, 475.

Taking a retrospective glance, however, Dieckhoff now expresses himself much satisfied with the results of his labours. For he supposes himself to have succeeded in proving the worthlessness of the documents upon which the delusion in regard to the early history of the Vaudois has been based.¹ Let the reader consider what the documents are, of which the value has been discussed, and let him also consider how far the question of the origin of the Vaudois depends upon them, and he will perhaps be surprised at the expression of such an opinion. The Noble Lesson and the other Vaudois poems have not yet been noticed!

I pass somewhat hastily over a portion of Dieckhoff's work, in which he examines into the probable time of that forgery or falsification of documents which he holds to be so certain. It is proper, however, to mention that after all which he has said before, he excuses Perrin, as a man who seems rather to have been himself deceived than to have been a wilful deceiver. His suspicions fasten upon Vigneaux, whose own knowledge of the state of things before the Reformation must have prevented him from being altogether deceived in such a matter. It will be remarked how confidently in all this our German contemporary assumes a very complete knowledge, on his own part, of the state of things amongst the Vaudois before the Reformation, and the amount of change then introduced. His suspicion of Vigneaux it is scarcely impossible to avoid characterizing as equally preposterous and ungenerous. Without having a page of that author's writings in his hands, knowing only the date at which he lived, and the fact that Perrin derived great part of his materials from compilations made by him, this investigator of historic truth points him out as the probable perpetrator of a gross imposture, and, at least, as a principal participator in systematic literary forgeries!² Dieckhoff's theory is indeed a very complete one. The writings which had been used by the Barbas might at first have been changed with no intention of deception as to the former state of things, but merely to accommodate them to continued use: this he at last admits. But this favoured the notion of the unchanged continuity of the sect, and a wide field was opened for pious fraud; and political reasons operated to make it very desirable that the sect should not be identified with the churches of the Reformation, for its members might thus hope to enjoy ancient privileges and to escape persecution, and the fabrication and falsification of documents were employed as means to promote this deception. But who were to be deceived? and how was this deception to serve the political purpose? Did Vigneaux and Perrin suppose that their works would influence Popish bishops or Popish princes? Or were the great ones of the earth very likely to ponder the pages of the Vaudois Catechism and the Treatise on Purgatory? However, it is not necessary to muster many objections against Dieckhoff's theory. It is enough to observe that it is entirely a product of the imagination.

¹ P. 116.² Pp. 124, 125.

Yet this theory, more than any evidence of falsification in any particular instance, seems to have emboldened its author to adopt a new method of solving the difficulty which, if the Vaudois are not believed to have existed before Valdo, arises out of the line of the Noble Lesson so often quoted as indicating its probable date. May not that line be an interpolation?¹ That the Noble Lesson is really the production of a period long anterior to the Reformation, he admits to be certain enough; but seeing that we have such abundant proof of wilful falsification (absichtsvolle Fälschung), why should we hesitate to set down this as another instance of it? Dieckhoff has no hesitation; but besides the reason just indicated, his only other reason is the impossibility of ascribing to this poem so early a date as the beginning, or even the end of the twelfth century, which Gieseler, Neander, and Herzog assign to it. He applies to it the innere Kritik—a powerful weapon certainly, but one which requires cautious handling—and finds that it cannot be older than the year 1230, because it describes a state of things which did not exist till about that date. With like confidence, and on similar grounds, his countrymen fix dates for different portions of Isaiah's prophecies, assigning some of them, therefore, to one author, and some of them to another; although, indeed, they differ a little in the opinions which they so confidently advance. Until some other evidence be adduced to bring down the date of the Noble Lesson to the thirteenth century, we may be contented to learn a little from it as to the state of things before that period. In refusing to accept the date 1100, which so many have imagined that they found in the text of the ancient poem itself, Dieckhoff also proceeds upon what he deems the ascertained historic fact of the descent of the Vaudois from Valdo, concerning which he thinks himself bound to accept the testimony of the "Catholic" witnesses. But he refuses to adopt the method adopted by Gieseler, Neander, and Herzog, of dealing with the date in the poem itself. He cannot believe that the eleven hundred years are to be reckoned from any other period than the beginning of the Christian era; he rejects this as an unnatural interpretation of the line. "Einmal nämlich wird die Rechnung auf diese Weise viel zu künstlich." Moreover, he adopts, as of great weight upon this point, the argument of Muston,² from the description of the Vaudois given in the poem, that it cannot have been composed within a few years of the origin of the sect, and agrees with him that if it could be proved to have been composed, as Gieseler, Neander, and Herzog suppose, in the end of the twelfth century, it would evince the existence of the Vaudois long before the time of Valdo.³

For historical research concerning the Vaudois, he thinks the true point of departure is to be found in the testimonies of the "Catholic" writers. He admits that these are liable to much suspicion, but seems to think that they have been in general too hastily rejected, upon the mere ground of confidence in the Vaudois manuscript literature. In a long and elaborate note he examines the "Catholic" testimonies, upon which he thinks we must depend in this matter—"die zu Grunde gelegten katholischen Zeugnisse." He begins with that of the English clergyman, Walter Mapes,⁴ which, relating as it seems to do to the third Lateran Council, A.D. 1179, he finds not to consist well with his opinion that the Vaudois derived their origin from Valdo, for Valdo had at that time made little progress in his career; and Dieckhoff can by no means assent to the notion, which Hahn and others have entertained, that the heretics described by Mapes were not Vaudois; wherefore, founding upon a general similarity of the

¹ P. 121, note, and pp. 141-144.

² In his first work. But see the "Bibliography" in this volume, pp. 420, 421, and 459.

³ Pp. 142-144.

⁴ See Israel of the Alps, vol. i. p. 15, note.

story of Mapes to a record in the Ursberg Chronicle, of occurrences at a council in Rome in 1210, he concludes that there must be an error in the date! Mapes, indeed, says very expressly, "Vidimus in concilio Romano sub Alexandro Papa III. celebrato," which fixes the date unquestionably as 1179, but Dieckhoff thinks it quite likely that the words "sub Alexandro Papa III. celebrato" were interpolated by some copyist in subsequent times, who was not himself well-informed as to dates, and that the name of Innocent III. should have appeared instead of Alexander III.¹ But we may reject both this arbitrary conjecture and Hahn's notion, that the "heretics" of 1179 were not Vaudois, and easily suppose proceedings of the same kind to have taken place at the Roman councils in 1179 and 1210, unless we are constrained by the necessity of deriving the Vaudois from Valdo. The next "Catholic" author whose testimony Dieckhoff adduces as important is Alanus de Insulis, and he spends some closely-printed pages in distinguishing him from other persons of the same name, and determining the date of his testimony, which he thinks cannot be after 1215, whilst he thinks it cannot be long before 1200. But he finds it necessary again to have recourse to the convenient theory of interpolations; for in the work of Alanus against heretics, mention is made of an excommunication of Waldenses by the Lateran council, which Lateran council cannot have been before 1215,² yet there is reason to think (according to Dieckhoff) that the genuine Alanus de Insulis died in 1202, so that there is really no help for it but to apply the sharp critical knife and cut out all that relates to the Lateran council as an interpolation ("ein späterer, unechter Zusatz"), for which excision, however, many additional good reasons are immediately presented.³ The other "Catholic" testimonies upon which the greatest dependence is placed, are those, already familiar to us, of Bernard of Fontcaude, Eberard of Bethune, Peter of Vaux-Cernay, and Stephen of Borbone.

In what remains of Dieckhoff's volume, are many things both interesting and important, of which it is impossible here to present a complete view, and which have reference more to the state of the Vaudois and their history during the period between Valdo and Luther, than to the question of their origin or of their existence anterior to Valdo. Yet I venture to express the opinion, that even in respect to this question, it is not unimportant to notice the existence, in the earlier part of the twelfth century, of the Poor Men of Lombardy, as a religious denomination, distinguished from the Poor Men of Lyons, although nearly allied, the latter being described by Stephen de Borbone as the true Waldenses—"qui dicuntur Waldenses, a suo heresiarcho." The Poor Men of Lombardy are regarded by Dieckhoff as followers of Valdo, who, having crossed the Alps amidst the distresses arising from the Albigensian war, had mingled more or less with other sects in Italy.⁴ His general view of the state of matters before and after that period, is, that there were many similar religious movements, of which that of Valdo and his followers was only one—a view, the perfect correctness of which is by no means inconsistent with the existence of the Vaudois in the valleys of the Alps for centuries before the birth of Valdo.⁵

¹ P. 344.² The third was in 1179, the fourth in 1215.³ P. 353.⁴ Pp. 159-164.⁵ "Die waldensische Sekte gehört als einzelnes Glied einer weit über sie hinausgreifenden Reihe von Entwicklungen an, die alle durch ein Gemeinsames des Strebens und der Auffassung der zur Geltung zu bringenden christlichen Frömmigkeit beherrscht erscheinen. Hierin ist es begründet, wenn die Waldenser schon in den früheren Bestrebungen eines Petrus von Bruis und eines Heinrich in der ersten Hälfte des 12. Jahrhunderts die ihrigen zu befürworten wollen."—P. 166.

Even the authors who most earnestly contend for the historic apostolicity of the Vaudois, have generally regarded them as connected with other sects on both sides of the Alps, who maintained like themselves, more or less perfectly, a testimony against the corruptions of Rome, and amongst whom was preserved, as amongst the Vaudois, the religion which in earlier and better times had been that of the whole church of these regions.

I deem it not unimportant also, in respect to the question now under consideration, and particularly with reference to the value of the whole of Dieckhoff's previous argument founded upon Morel's letter, that in the latter part of his work may be found proofs of a state of things in earlier times very considerably different from that which Morel's letter depicts. For, in the first place, he admits that before the terrible period of the Albigensian war, the followers of Valdo opposed themselves more openly to the Church of Rome than they did after they had been broken down by persecution.¹ He proves, by no less authoritative testimony than that of Alanus de Insulis, that these "heretics," in the beginning of the thirteenth century, not only maintained their right to preach without permission from the Romish hierarchy, but to perform all spiritual functions, professing themselves bound to obey good prelates only.² He acknowledges that the opposition to Rome was openly maintained in Upper Italy after it had been in a great measure suppressed in France, and that in the "Catholic" accounts of the middle of the thirteenth century, it is no longer the south of France but Upper Italy that is represented as the principal seat of the Waldensian heresy. He quotes Moneta as stating the chief distinction between the Poor Men of Lombardy and the Transalpine (ultramontane) Poor Men to consist in this, that the former stood out in more decided opposition against the Church of Rome, and particularly against its priests and their exercise of their functions, so that, whilst the Transalpine Poor Men submitted to receive the sacraments from the Romish priests, those of Lombardy administered the sacraments amongst themselves.³ Can it be doubted after this that the state of things described in Morel's letter was a declension from better times—a consequence of those persecutions by which the Papal church sought to wear out the saints of the Most High? Does it not even become probable that Morel's letter more accurately describes the state of the Vaudois on the west side of the Alps, than of those in the valleys of Piedmont? It is strange, however, that Dieckhoff seems not in the least degree conscious of anything in all this to weaken the force of the leading argument in the first part of his work, founded upon Morel's letter. Nay, although Dr. Muston, as well as Dieckhoff, deems it a probable argument against the high antiquity of the Treatise on Antichrist, that the Church of Rome is therein very disrespectfully spoken of,⁴ yet we may hesitate

¹ P. 155.

² Pp. 214, 215.—It is rather curious, however, to find Dieckhoff theorizing as to the distinctive peculiarity of the Vaudois sect, and making it to consist in their preaching without authority of the Romish hierarchy, and this upon the ground that the great complaint made against them by their Popish adversaries is for their so doing. P. 167, &c.—How any sect could be supposed to exist without preachers and preaching, he does not condescend to explain. The theory is maintained by a reference to Valdo's preaching, and by proofs that the Vaudois did assert a right to preach without consent of the prelates, one of which, however (from an edict of King Alphonso of Arragon, in the year 1194), is strangely contrary to the theorist's purpose, for it actually represents other heretics equally with the Vaudois, as addicting themselves to funesta predicatio. ("Si quis igitur ab hac die et deinceps predictos Waldenses et Zappatos aliosque hereticos, enjuseunquo fuerint professionis, in domibus suis recipere, vel horum funestam predicationem aliquo loco audire, vel his cibum vel aliud aliquum beneficium largiri presumpserit," &c.

³ Pp. 219-221.

⁴ See p. 445 of this volume.

about concurring with him when we find Rainerius charging the Poor Men of Lombardy with asserting of that church "quod Ecclesia est Ecclesia malignantium et Bestia et Meretrix, quæ leguntur in Apocalypsi."¹ And whatever modifications and recensions may have taken place at subsequent times, nay, although the Treatise in its present form may even be satisfactorily traced to a Taborite Confession, the probability of an old Vaudois original will not seem inconsiderable, if Dieckhoff is right in maintaining that the Taborites derived their views in a great measure from the Vaudois.²

Following the chronological order, I intended now, in the next place, to have noticed an article from the pen of M. E. Cunitz, in the (Strasburg) Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie Chrétienne, for August, 1852, in which the works of Muston and Dieckhoff are reviewed. And if there had been room for it, I would gladly have quoted from that article an extremely clear and succinct view of the early Vaudois as they are represented in the writings of their adversaries, which, however, it is hard to understand how any one can think it right to accept as a fair historic representation of them. But as M. Cunitz does little else than adopt the opinions and arguments of Dieckhoff, following him even to the length of his rejection of the date in the Noble Lesson as an interpolation, we may pass on to the only other work which now remains to be noticed, after mentioning an argument of his own, directed against Dr. Muston, in regard to the language of the Vaudois works, which he denies to afford any proof of their having been produced by the Vaudois of Piedmont; for the same language, he maintains, with slight modifications, prevailed over the whole south of France. "M. Muston denies that the Vaudois of Provence and of Dauphiny could or would have written in this idiom, and yet the Barba Morel . . . belonged to these provinces and used this dialect. Moreover, M. Muston, founding upon the language alone, concludes that he has discovered one of the oldest Vaudois MSS. in a New Testament preserved at Lyons, and yet this MS. could not have belonged to the inhabitants of the valleys, because it is a relic of the sect of the Cathari, and contains their liturgy. Thus the whole argument falls to the ground by which he seeks to prove that all this literature originated in the churches of Piedmont. Every probability is in favour of its rather belonging to the sectaries who were spread over the south of France; who, from the state of civilization around them, were more likely to possess the learning of which some of these works afford evidence, than the poor inhabitants of the remote and lonely valleys which descend from Mount Genevre and Mount Viso." I give his argument in his own words. But the question as to the existence of the Vaudois before Valdo does not depend very much on this question of language; nor would their high antiquity be rendered less probable should it be ascertained that a considerable portion of their MS. literature originated in the south of France, and after the time of Valdo.³

It now only remains, for completion of the design of this Appendix, to give some account of a recent work by Dr. Herzog, whose academic thesis has been already noticed. It is entitled "DIE ROMANISCHEN WALDEN SER, IHRE VORREFORMATORISCHEN ZUSTÄNDE UND LEHREN, IHRE REFORMATION IM 16. JAHRHUNDERT UND DIE RÜCKWIRKUNGEN DERSELBEN, HAUPTSÄCHLICH NACH IHREN

¹ Quoted by Dieckhoff, p. 222.

² Pp. 272, 273, note.

³ The Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie Chrétienne contains, also, in the numbers for June, 1851, December, 1852, and February, 1853, articles by Professor Reusz, of Strasburg, on the Vaudois translations of the Bible, which I regret that I can do nothing more than merely point out as containing much that is of importance to the study of the ecclesiastical history of the middle ages.

EIGENEN SCHRIFTEN DARGESTELLT" (Halle, 1853), and is a work containing much new and valuable information, the fruit of patient research, and displays not only the learning and talents for which the author enjoys a high reputation, but a candour in judgment which, even when venturing to dissent from his conclusions, it is impossible not to mark with respect. It is a work which, upon many accounts, deserves to be noticed much more fully than is possible at present, all that I can attempt being merely to indicate the nature of its contents, and to make somewhat particular mention of those things which most closely bear upon the question of the origin of the Vaudois, the proper subject of these pages.

Dr. Herzog has undertaken and executed a more thorough examination of the Vaudois manuscript literature than was ever previously made. This statement of what may be called the origin of his work, is of itself sufficient to show that it must be entitled to great attention. He visited Geneva, Grenoble, Dublin, and other places where Vaudois MSS. were to be found, carefully perused these MSS., collating them with the printed text in those cases in which the works had already been printed, and making transcripts of the most important with his own hand, or causing them to be made under his eye, and subjecting them to a careful revision. The result of all this is, that we have now through his labours the Vaudois literature more completely before us than ever hitherto, and the several parts of it in a more correct form. The difficulty of reading and transcribing these MSS. being, in some cases, very great, and some of those who previously undertook it being by no means very well qualified for the task, it is not to be wondered at, that in the printed text of Vaudois works there have hitherto been numerous inaccuracies.

Dr. Herzog's work is divided into four books; the first, "Introductory," is occupied chiefly with an historical account of the Vaudois literature and a description of the existing MSS., in connection with which the question is considered of the language in which the Vaudois works are written; the second book is devoted to an examination of the condition and doctrine of the Romanic Vaudois, according to those documents in which a Hussite influence is not manifested; the third book treats of their relation to the Hussite sects, and the influence of these upon their literature; the fourth, of the Reformation and its influences, and particularly with regard to their views and representations of their previous history.

Throughout the whole work, it appears to me, that Dr. Herzog regards the two questions as more intimately connected than they really are, of the origin of the Vaudois, and of the form and measure of their opposition to the Church of Rome. However fully it may be proved that the Vaudois after the Reformation erred (and it was an error into which it may well be conceived that they were very apt to fall without any "pious fraud" whatever), in exaggerating the opposition of their fathers to Rome, and representing their church as having possessed, during the dark ages, a greater measure of scriptural light than it did in reality possess, I confess myself unable to see how from this a conclusion should be drawn unfavourable to its existence before the days of Valdo. It might be natural for the Vaudois to adopt readily, too favourable a view of their past history on both points, but error on the one point does not necessarily involve error on the other.

As to the condition and doctrines of the Vaudois before the Reformation, and before the Hussite influence began to prevail amongst them, Dr. Herzog modestly confesses his inability, from the sources of information which have yet been opened up, to give a full and accurate representation of them.¹ He blames

¹ P. 24.

Dieckhoff, however, for accepting, so completely and unhesitatingly, the accounts given of them by their "Catholic" adversaries. For although, as to the relation of the Vaudois to Valdo, Dr. Herzog still proceeds upon the testimony of these authors, as when he wrote his academic Programma, he does not think it right to receive as perfectly accurate all their statements concerning the doctrines and character of the heretics whom they so cordially hated; and he asserts, concerning the Vaudois of the middle ages, that whilst there prevailed amongst them much Romish error, both of doctrine and practice, they yet maintained the formal principle of Protestantism; and on this ground he accounts for their immediate concurrence in the Reformation when it took place, and contradicts the assertion of Bossuet, so often repeated by Popish writers, that they had more in common with Catholicism than with Protestantism.¹ They were not, he says, as some have represented them, free from error, resisting completely all the influences with which they were surrounded; they appear, from their own literature, more such as we might expect from their whole circumstances; they appear as opponents both of the Romish church and of the heretics who sapped the very foundation of Christianity; they appear as aiming, not without weakness, but really and perseveringly, at the great object of a moral and religious reformation.²

Dr. Herzog thinks it probable that most of the old Vaudois MSS. were destroyed in the persecutions previous to the Reformation, and that after that great event a new period of literary activity began. He thinks also that the productions of this later period were, in some instances, given out as ancient works, in order to sustain the pretensions of high antiquity and hereditary purity. For, to a certain extent, he still maintains the theory of a "pious fraud;" but "this conjecture," he says, "can only be entertained with reference to some of the documents published by Perrin and Léger. The other writings, certainly, do not belong to a time subsequent to the Reformation; for they contain many Catholic elements. Nay, even of those writings which Perrin and Léger have published, some are to be found in Geneva and Dublin, in a form which is certainly older than the Reformation."³ However, he thinks that persons not having opportunity of examining the Geneva and Dublin MSS. were very excusable in extending the conjecture farther.

He thinks it also not wonderful that the evidence of Hussite influence in some of the Vaudois documents, and even of the derivation of some of them from Bohemian originals, should have led to the supposition that all of them are, in this respect, alike, concerning which a date anterior to the Reformation must be admitted. But he unhesitatingly rejects this view, and assures us that the Vaudois writings, in which the Hussite influence has been so clearly traced, form a class by themselves, distinguished by a peculiar character, being more didactic than the rest, and having more of a learned air, more abundant citations, and more of a Latin tint in the language, besides a keener tone of opposition to the Romish church, and the scholastic style of the latter part of the middle ages.⁴

Concerning the language of the Vaudois documents, Dr. Herzog points out that although, as Raynouard says, it substantially agrees with that of the Troubadours, yet there are dialectic differences. But it being now known that there were a number of slightly different dialects of the Romance tongue, he thinks we ought to regard that of the Vaudois documents as having belonged to some particular district, and to inquire what that district was. He does not regard the progress hitherto made in the study of these dialects to be such as would warrant us in saying that the dialect in which the Vaudois writings are composed was peculiar to the Vaudois. But he notes it as a highly significant fact, that hitherto no documents have been found in this dialect except Vaudois documents.¹ As to the district in which this dialect was spoken, he does not express himself with confidence. He refuses to accept the judgment of Vaudois authors as conclusive, whom he thinks biassed by party feeling, and states reasons for dissenting from their identification of the language of the old documents with the present patois of the valleys. And on this point it at least deserves to be considered that the dialects of different districts may have well marked peculiarities; whilst that of one district may yet be readily intelligible to the inhabitants of another. Herzog appears to think it probable that the Waldensian literature originated in the valleys not of the eastern but of the western side of the Alps, although he seems afterwards to admit that the same dialect may have prevailed upon both sides; and of what consequence it is to assign the literature to one side rather than to the other does not clearly appear, nor can the probability in favour of the western side be deemed very great when it is found merely to rest upon the identity of the language of the old Vaudois documents with that of Morel's letter to Ecolampadius, whilst even of this letter it is afterwards shown that it contains more words derived from the French than they do.²

¹ Pp. 19-23.² Preface, pp. viii., ix.³ P. 29.⁴ P. 30.

Comparing the language of the older documents, however, with this letter, and with the works borrowed from the Taborites, Dr. Herzog thinks there is no such difference as would lead to the supposition of a number of centuries of higher antiquity. He thinks we might, from considerations of language alone, regard them as probably belonging to the fifteenth century. But he shows that the contents of them do not accord with the state of things in that century, as we learn it from Morel's letter and other sources, whilst the works themselves bear every mark of proceeding from a people persecuted upon account of their religion, but not long secluded in Alpine valleys from the scenes of busy commerce, wealth, luxury, and gaiety, of all which a knowledge is exhibited such as it is not easy to suppose the inhabitants of Merindol, of Cabrières, or of Lucerna to have possessed. All this points to a higher antiquity, and Dr. Herzog thinks it not improbable that the language of the oldest documents may have been modified by transcribers, so as in the existing copies more nearly to resemble the language of the sixteenth century than it did in the originals.³

Proceeding to the examination of the existing MSS., Dr. Herzog adduces reasons for concluding with certainty that none of the volumes deposited by John Léger, and by his uncle, Anthony Léger, in the Public Library of Geneva, are amongst the five volumes now existing there.⁴—The MS. No. 206⁵ he regards as unquestionably the oldest of the Vaudois MSS. now existing in Geneva, and as belonging to the fifteenth century, probably to the beginning of the century. But the treatises which it contains are evidently transcribed from earlier originals, because some of them are given in an incomplete form.—The MS. No. 207⁶ he regards as belonging to the latter half of the fifteenth century, and quotes the opinion of Dr. Todd, of Dublin, to the same effect. This manuscript has been very generally regarded as belonging to the twelfth century, in consequence of an opinion to that effect expressed by Senebier,⁷ and adopted from him by Raynouard.¹ But Senebier's incompetency to judge in such a matter is illustrated by his error in supposing the previous MS. No. 206, to be in the Catalan tongue, and by his making twenty-two blunders in copying eighteen lines from the poem La Barca. This volume, also, Dr. Herzog regards as evidently containing copies from older originals; and assigns for this opinion the following very conclusive reasons:—That the Commentary on the Song of Solomon is incomplete, wanting the first book; and that the text of the Noble Lesson is marred by omissions which destroy the sense, and exhibits proofs throughout of carelessness on the part of the transcriber.—The MS. No. 208² he assigns to the latter half of the sixteenth century; but in this case, also, he holds that the contents of the volume have been copied from older manuscripts, because, along with a number of treatises, all of which are of Taborite origin, or exhibit the Taborite influence, it contains one piece, the first in the volume, Articles de la fe, which is indisputably of older date.³—He regards the MS. No. 209⁴ as belonging to the latter half of the sixteenth century. The title on the back, Conseils des Barbets du 15^{me} siècle, is, he observes, in a more modern hand than the MS. itself.—The MS. formerly No. 43⁵ has now, it would appear, been ranked along with the other Vaudois volumes, as MS. 409a. Dr. Herzog refers it to the latter part of the sixteenth, or the beginning of the seventeenth century.⁶

¹ P. 32.² Pp. 33-42.³ Pp. 43-46.⁴ Pp. 47, 48.⁵ See "Bibliography," in this volume, pp. 455, 456.⁶ See pp. 456-460 of this vol.⁷ Author of Catalogue raisonné des Manuscrits conservés dans la Bibliothèque de la Ville de Genève, 1779.

Of the MSS. in the library of Trinity College, Dublin (derived from that of Archbishop Usher), the first which Dr. Herzog mentions, is that (Class A, shelf 4, No. 13) containing the Vaudois translation of the New Testament and of part of the Old Testament.⁷ He mentions the date (mentioned also by Dr. Muston, in his "Bibliography," p. 450), and adds, particularly, that it is in the same hand in which the whole is written. From this MS. it was that the gospel of John was edited by Dr. Gilly in 1851. Dr. Herzog caused a copy of all the rest to be made, which he himself revised, and which is now in the Royal Library of Berlin, he having received a commission for that purpose from the Royal Academy of Sciences in that city. He describes the other Dublin MSS., and concerning them all he expresses himself as certain that they are the very MSS. which were used by Perrin, although it appears that Perrin possessed also other MSS. besides those which now remain. In the "Book of George Morel," in particular, Perrin's citations correspond with the very pages of the MS.—Dr. Herzog gives a particular account of the MS. No. 3,⁸ and mentions that it bears the date 1524 near the beginning of the volume, the rest being in a somewhat more modern hand. In his description of the fifth volume,⁹ he mentions that the fragment with which it begins, "Ayczò es la causa del departiment de la gleysa romana," is terminated by a note of the transcriber, "Ayci finis l'obra non complia d'aquest libre per mancament d'exemplar," a clear enough indication of the comparative antiquity, and also of the rarity of

¹ Senebier and Raynouard are not likely to be suspected of pious fraud upon this account. And yet this instance of an error springing up and getting firm root, without any dishonest intention on the part of any one, might show the propriety of a charitable judgment regarding Vigneaux, Perrin, and Léger, of whom much suspicion has been very rashly and confidently expressed.

² See pp. 460–462 of this volume.

³ He mentions that Monastier is mistaken in saying that the MS. of the Treatise on Purgatory, contained in this volume, wants the quotation from the Milliloquium Augustini, and accounts for this mistake by the extreme disarrangement of the leaves.

⁴ See pp. 462–464 of this volume.

⁵ See pp. 454, 455, of this volume.

⁶ Pp. 43–52.

⁷ See "Bibliography," in this volume, pp. 449, 450, and 465.

⁸ Ibid. pp. 466–468.

⁹ Ibid. p. 471.

the originals, from which the copies now existing of these Vaudois books were made.¹

Of the existing Biblical MSS., Dr. Herzog describes the Zürich and the Grenoble MSS. of the New Testament, and of certain parts of the Old Testament and Apocryphal books,² as written in the same language with the Dublin MS., and that the language which prevails in the Vaudois writings.³ These two MSS., he tells us, contain different recensions of the same translation which the Dublin MS. contains; and he mentions instances in which the Grenoble MS. agrees more nearly with the Vulgate than the Dublin MS. does; and, what is much more interesting, he informs us, on the authority of Professor Renaz, that the Zürich MS. is a translation improved from the Greek text.⁴ He says that Muston is mistaken in enumerating two Lyons MSS.; and that which does exist, is not, according to him, a Vaudois MS., but belonged to the Cathari, whose ritual (Consolamentum) is annexed to it, and has been edited by Cunitz (Jena, 1852).⁵ The Paris MS., A of Muston's "Bibliography,"⁶ No. 8086 of the Bibliothèque Nationale (or Du Roi), Dr. Herzog regards as in the language of the Troubadours.

That so many of the existing Vaudois MSS. belong to the sixteenth century, Dr. Herzog in conclusion remarks, is no proof of the recent origin of the works. On the contrary, these MSS. are evidently mere copies; and it is not difficult to account for an increased activity in transcribing at that time. Moreover, the dates which we find in two of them are of that part of the sixteenth century which was previous to the introduction of the Reformation among the Vaudois.

He then proceeds to give a more particular account of some of the works which bear the surest marks of antiquity. Assuming the antiquity of the Geneva MS. No. 206 itself, he begins with the works contained in it, comparing the different existing copies of the same work as he goes on. I regret that it is impossible to do more than merely to indicate the nature of this part of his labours, by which great light is thrown upon the interesting subject of the condition and doctrines of the Vaudois before the reaction upon them of a religious influence from Bohemia. He notes very carefully the points of agreement and disagreement with the Church of Rome, and calls attention to the evidence afforded by the nature of some of the works of an externally flourishing state of society. He does not undertake to determine the dates of most of the works; although showing from the nature of their contents, as well as from the external evidence of the Geneva MS., that they must be older than the time of Hussite influences. Some of them, indeed, appear to have been composed when the circumstances of the Vaudois were comparatively prosperous, and others in times of persecution. The Exposition of the Song of Solomon, in the Geneva MS. No. 207, is referred to a time not earlier than the latter part of the thirteenth century, because it contains the expression fe forma (fides formata), the first use of which is ascribed to Thomas Aquinas,⁷ whilst, if it were not for this

¹ Pp. 51-60.

² See "Bibliography," in this volume, pp. 449, 450.

³ Pp. 61, 62.—In a subsequent place, pp. 99-108, he gives a more particular account of the Dublin MS.; compares the quotations in the old Vaudois books with the text as found in it; shows how it generally agrees with, and how in many cases it departs from the Vulgate; and adduces arguments to show that it is of date much anterior to the Hussite influences.

⁴ P. 108.

⁵ I mention this merely as the opinion of Dr. Herzog and of Cunitz, without venturing to express either concurrence or dissent, which, without more particular information as to the MS. and an examination of the Consolamentum, could have no reasonable foundation.

⁶ Pp. 450, 451, of this volume.

⁷ But is it certain that he was the first to use it?

circumstance, Dr. Herzog evidently inclines to think that there are other indications of an earlier origin—particularly in the polemical character of the work, which is very much directed against heresies more prevalent at an earlier period. The Articles of Faith, in the Geneva MS. No. 208, and in the third Dublin volume, although they are found amongst works which are of Hussite origin, are unhesitatingly referred to an earlier date, because of their agreement with the Articles of the Confession of Faith, which a Strasburg MS.,¹ of the year 1404, represents the Waldenses as demanding from their ministers at their ordination. The Treatise on Tribulations, in one of the Dublin volumes, mentions a persecution under a Pope of the name of Innocent, and describes the faithful as compelled to flee to the mountains, and to abide in solitudes, where they suffer from hunger, cold, robbers, and wild beasts. Dr. Herzog thinks there are indications of an earlier date than that of the persecution under Innocent VIII., in the latter part of the fifteenth century, and concludes with the remark, that if we could with certainty refer this treatise to the time of the persecutions under Innocent IV., the early date of at least a great part of the Vaudois literature would receive the strongest confirmation.²

But more particular attention must be given to what Dr. Herzog says, in this part of his work, regarding the Noble Lesson; as its evident antiquity, and the date which it contains, supply the strongest arguments employed to prove the existence of the Vaudois before Valdo, whilst all who reject that view find it necessary to dispose, in some way or other, of the apparent evidence of the date. Dr. Herzog, in his anxiety to maintain the descent of the Vaudois from Valdo, would evidently be glad to accept Dieckhoff's theory of an interpolation of the two troublesome lines. But this he does not find himself warranted in doing, as the lines are certainly present in all existing copies of the poem, in print and MS., and thus certainly appear not to have been interpolated since the Reformation. However, he still accepts what help the possibility of an interpolation may give to his main argument; and even contributes his best endeavours to make the possibility appear more probable by pointing out the further possibility that another passage may be also an interpolation, as the removal of it would not destroy the sense, a principle of criticism that would make strange havoc if applied to many a work, both ancient and modern. He maintains, indeed, that the Noble Lesson is certainly of Vaudois origin, in opposition to Dieckhoff, who, in a long note,³ sets forth reasons for thinking that it may have been originally a production of the Bohemian Brethren. But as I did not think it necessary to state Dieckhoff's arguments, so neither do I think it necessary now to exhibit those by which Herzog refutes them. Dieckhoff's observations on his mode of explaining away the apparent date, Dr. Herzog does not meet. In favour of that mode of explanation, already placed before the reader in the notice of his Programma, he now advances no better argument than that the date of the poem must be later than the time of Valdo, because it is certain that the Vaudois derived their origin from him. Upon this he founds as an ascertained truth, to the certainty of which everything must be made to bow.⁴ And thus when he proceeds to exhibit in his second book, the doctrines and condition of the Vaudois, before the Hussite influence was felt, he begins as from this starting point, and traces the whole character of the Vaudois movement to the original impulse which it received from Valdo. In particular, the much use made of the Scriptures, and high reverence paid to the Scriptures, which distinguished the Vaudois above all other Christians of

¹ Published in Niedner's Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1852.

² Pp. 66-99.

³ Die Wgld. im Mittelalter, pp. 337-340.

⁴ Pp. 76-91.

the middle ages, he regards as originating in that love of the Scriptures which Valdo manifested. But how his mind was so strongly directed to the Scriptures, Dr. Herzog regrets that there is nothing to show. Now, it may be permitted to ask, if another explanation would not accord with the facts at least as well as that which Dr. Herzog has chosen; and what then is there in all these facts inconsistent with the supposition of the existence of the Vaudois before Valdo.

I think it ought to be here mentioned that Dr. Herzog¹ points out a flagrant error of Yvonetus, who does not hesitate to say that the Vaudois reject the Old Testament—a statement plainly contrary to the whole character of the old Vaudois literature. But this Yvonetus is one of the “Catholic” witnesses, upon whose testimony the chief reliance is given as to the origin of the Vaudois.

I have endeavoured to present a brief analysis of that part of Dr. Herzog's work which more immediately bears upon this great question in ecclesiastical history. Of the remainder of the work I cannot attempt any such analysis. But its contents are highly important with respect to the period between Valdo and the Reformation, and the condition and doctrines of the Vaudois during that period. That Dr. Herzog is sometimes biassed in his judgment by his determination to derive the Vaudois from Valdo, in deference to the “Catholic” witnesses; and that he sometimes shows that disposition so general in the present day amongst his learned countrymen to build too confidently on the narrow basis of a single critical observation, are circumstances which may render it requisite to follow him with caution, and carefully to test the soundness of all his conclusions, but which do not detract from the merit of his laborious researches in the difficult field of Vaudois literature. He has not only removed the doubt which had been thrown upon the genuineness of many most important documents, but he has discriminated more clearly than was ever done before the products of the different periods of Vaudois history.

It is no inconsiderable advantage to the cause of truth when bad arguments are cleared away which have been used in its support. It is well to know that the dates which have so often been relied on as proof of the antiquity of certain Vaudois documents are of no value whatever, and that some of the works to which they have been assigned are of a comparatively recent origin; and that, therefore, it is not by these works that the historic apostolicity of the Vaudois themselves can be proved. But a conclusion, favourable to the claims which we have seen that the Vaudois have put forth, not merely since the Reformation, but since the thirteenth century, at all events, if it is to be reached with greater difficulty now than when these dates were supposed to warrant it of themselves, is reached by such means that it may be maintained with greater confidence; and the date in the Noble Lesson, not affixed, but embodied in the poem, seems so to resist all attempts made against it, that of itself it may be held sufficient proof of the existence of the Vaudois under their present name in the beginning of the twelfth century.

¹ Pp. 129, 130.

THE END.

19